

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. show the exact liability of such indorser, by showing the agreement and understanding of the parties at the time of such indorsement.

(April 9, 1882.)

ERROR to the District Court for Graham County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce defendant's alleged liability on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

As to the nature of the liability of one who indorses a negotiable note before delivery to the payee there is considerable diversity of opinion among the courts of the different states. In some of the states such an indorser is prima facie regarded as a guarantor, in others an indorser, and in others a joint promisor.

In the following cases such an indorser is regarded as a guarantor: Perkins v. Catlin, 11 Conn. 212, 29 Am. Dec. 283; Rauson v. Sherwood, 26 Conn. 47; Rhodes v. Seymour, 26 Conn. 1; Thacher v. ens, 46 Conn. 586; Camden v. McKoy, 4 Ill. 427, 11 Dec. 91; Webster v. Cobb, 17 Ill. 459; Park v. Vail, 73 Ill. 245; Firman v. Blood, 2 Kan. 30; Arnold v. Bryant, 8 Bush, 688; Van Doren v. Jader, 1 Nev. 380, 90 Am. Dec. 498; Greenough v. Mead, 3 Ohio St. 415; Champion v. Griffith, 13 Ohio, 77; State v. Boring, 15 Ohio, 615; Watson v. Hurt, 6 Ill. 633; Orrick v. Colston, 7 Gratt. 189.

And in the following as an indorser: Riggs v. Waldo, 2 Cal. 487, 56 Am. Dec. 356; Jones v. Goodwin, 30 Cal. 493, 2 Am. Rep. 473; Feessenden v. Summers, 62 Cal. 436; Moore v. Cross, 19 N. Y. 227, 75 Am. Dec. 326; Bacon v. Burnham, 37 N. Y. 614; Phelps v. Vacher, 50 N. Y. 69, 10 Am. Rep. 423; Fear v. Dunlap, 1 G. Greene, 331; Slack v. Kirk, 67 Pa. 380, 5 Am. Rep. 438; Elbert v. Finkbeiner, 68 Pa. 247, 8 Am. Rep. 178.

While the following cases regard him as a joint maker, or surety: Killian v. Ashley, 24 Ark. 515, 91 Am. Dec. 519; Helise v. Bumpass, 40 Ark. 547; Gilpin v. Marley, 4 Houst. (Del.) 234; Massey v. Turner, 2 Houst. (Del.) 79; Collins v. Everett, 4 Ga. 273; Camp v. Simmons, 62 Ga. 73; Lawrence v. Oakley, 14 La. 226; Chor. v. Merrill, 9 La. Ann. 533; Collins v. Foist, 30 La. Ann. 348; Leonard v. Wilde, 36 Me. 235; Childs v. Wyman, 44 Me. 441, 69 Am. Dec. 111; Ives v. Bosley, 35 Md. 232, 6 Am. Rep. 411; Walz v. Alback, 37 Md. 404; Wetherwax v. Paine, 2 Mich. 559; Rothschild v. Griz, 31 Mich. 150, 18 Am. Rep. 171; Moynahan v. Hanaford, 42 Mich. 329; Pierce v. Irvine, 1 Minn. 377; Stein v. Passmore, 25 Minn. 256; Schneider v. Schiffman, 30 Mo. 571; Martin v. Boyd, 11 N. H. 283, 26 Am. Dec. 501; Currier v. Fellows, 27 N. H. 18 L. R. A.

390; Baker v. Robinson, 63 N. C. 191; Perkins v. Barstow, 6 R. I. 507; Carpenter v. Oaks, 10 Rich. L. 17; McCreary v. Bird, 12 Rich. L. 554; Cook v. Southwick, 9 Tex. 615, 60 Am. Dec. 181; Strong v. Riker, 16 Vt. 567; Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 355; Western Boatmen's Benev. Assn. v. Wolff, 45 Mo. 105; Seymour v. Farrell, 51 Mo. 28; Mammon v. Hartman, 51 Mo. 168; Cahn v. Dutton, 60 Mo. 297; Cayuga County Nat. Bank v. Dunklin, 29 Mo. App. 442; Latham v. Houston Flour Mills, 68 Tex. 127; Rey v. Simpson, 63 U. S. 341, 16 L. ed. 280; Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90, 24 L. ed. 341; Carpenter v. McLaughlin, 12 R. I. 270; Stevens v. Parsons, 6 New Eng. Rep. 644, 80 Me. 381; Schroeder v. Turner, 11 Cent. Rep. 547, 68 Md. 506.

But one who indorses a note payable to the order of the maker and by him indorsed in blank becomes liable as indorser only; the rule that one not a party to the note who puts his name on it is presumed to have done so as surety, does not apply in that case, nor is it material that the note is discounted by the maker and the proceeds applied for the indorser. H. B. Claflin & Co. v. Feltleman, 44 La. Ann. —; Bigelow v. Colton, 13 Gray, 309, 74 Am. Dec. 663; First Nat. Bank of St. Charles v. Payne (Mo.) July 2, 1892; Williams v. Merchants Nat. Bank of Kansas City, 67 Tex. 606; Heidenheimer v. Blumenkron, 56 Tex. 308.

In Killian v. Ashley, 24 Ark. 511, 91 Am. Dec. 519, it was said that if the defendant indorsed the note at the time it was executed he was bound as security for the payment as fully as if his name had been written immediately under that of the principal. The mere fact that the name was written on the back of the instrument did not change the nature of the liability; it was not the making of a new contract, but simply becoming security for the payment of the one being made.

Of an indorser before delivery of a negotiable note, Shaw, Ch. J., in Chaffee v. Jones, 19 Pick. 283, says: "He is not liable as an indorser for the note is not negotiated, or title made to it through his indorsement, nor as guarantor, because there is no separate or distinct consideration; but he meant to give security and validity to the note by his credit, and promised to pay it if the promisor does not."

Messrs. W. W. Guthrie and W. F. Guthrie for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Z. C. Tritt for defendant in error.

Strang, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was brought by the plaintiffs, as plaintiffs in the court below, upon a promissory note executed to them by A. L. Dunnwoody and Mary Dunnwoody, and indorsed by the defendant W. R. Hill. The action was also for the foreclosure of a real estate mortgage given by A. L. Dunnwoody and wife to secure, in part, said note. Hill answered and alleged that, at the time he indorsed the note, he did so only upon the special agreement with the plaintiffs and the other defendants that, if he would indorse the note, they would, when one half the amount of said note was paid, surrender said note, and take a new note for the balance, secured by a mortgage to be given by the Dunnwoodys upon certain real estate. He also says that, subsequent to his indorsement of the note, one half of said note was paid, and the mortgage was given by the Dunnwoodys, and taken by the plaintiffs as agreed, but that, instead of surrendering the old note and taking a new one, the plaintiffs retained the old note and took the mortgage as security for the balance due thereon. A reply was filed, denying generally the allegations of Hill's answer, and the case went to trial on the issue made by Hill. Judgment was taken for plaintiffs against A. L. and Mary J. Dunnwoody for the balance due, and the mortgage was foreclosed. The trial was by the court, which found in favor of Hill, that he was not liable on the note, and he recovered judgment for his costs. Motion for new trial was overruled, and the plaintiffs bring the case here, and allege for error the overruling by the court of

and that upon the original consideration, and therefore he is a promisor and surety; and it is immaterial to this purpose on what part of the note he places his name."

The Massachusetts courts adopted a very stringent rule and held that one who indorsed a note before delivery was liable as an original promisor, and parole evidence was not admissible to show that such was not his real contract. Way v. Butterworth, 108 Mass. 509; Union Bank of Weymouth v. Willis, 8 Met. 504; Brown v. Butler, 99 Mass. 179; Allen v. Brown, 124 Mass. 77; Gilson v. Stevens Mach. Co., 124 Mass. 546.

But by Mass. Stat. of 1874, chap. 404, it was provided that "all persons becoming parties to promissory notes payable on time by a signature in blank on the back thereof shall be entitled to notice of the non-payment thereof the same as indorsers."

Distinction between negotiable and non-negotiable instruments.

The New York courts have made a distinction between cases where notes have words of negotiability and where they have not, and whilst admitting the signer's liability as original promisor in the latter, they maintain that in the former he is only chargeable as indorser. Dean v. Hall, 17 Wend. 214; Seabury v. Hungerford, 2 Hill, 80; Hall v. Newcomb, 7 Hill, 416, 42 Am. Dec. 82; Ellis v. Brown, 6 Barb. 282; Waterbury v. Sinclair, 26 Barb. 456; Phelps v. Vischer, 50 N. Y. 69, 10 Am. Rep. 483.

In New York it is the settled law that a person making such an indorsement is presumed to have intended to become liable as second indorser, and that, on the face of the paper, without explanation, he is to be regarded as second indorser, and therefore not liable on the note to the payee. Coulter v. Richmond, 59 N. Y. 478.

In this case the defendant's intestate had indorsed the note at the request of the maker to enable the latter to purchase from the payee United States bonds. For three years prior to the making of this note the maker had borrowed the same bonds, giving as security on each occasion his note signed by the indorser as security. It was held a legitimate inference that the indorser knew the purpose of the note, and that it was given to obtain credit.

In Bacon v. Burnham, 37 N. Y. 614, it was held that where a person indorsed a note, payable to another or order, the legal presumption was that he stood in the position of a subsequent indorser to the payee; and that, there being no proof showing him in a different position, the payee could not recover against him, and further that no right of action could be acquired by transfer, from the payee.

In Hall v. Newcomb, supra, the chancellor said: "The question for our consideration is whether a person who puts his name in blank upon the back of a negotiable note, which is drawn in such a form that he may be charged as indorser in the usual mode, if a demand is made and notice of non-payment given, can be charged as a general surety without such demand and notice, by parole evidence merely."

"Where a note is made payable to an individual or his order, and is indorsed by him in blank, and in that situation is presented to another person for his accommodation indorsement, who indorses it accordingly, the legal effect of his indorsement is to make him liable in the character of second indorser merely; and he can in no event be made legally liable to the first indorser. And if the maker, or the first indorser, or any other person into whose hands the note might subsequently come, should, without the consent of the second indorser, fill up the first indorsement specially, without recourse to such first indorser, so as to deprive the second indorser of his remedy over in case he should be compelled to pay the note, it would be a gross fraud upon him, if not a forgery. But when such a note is presented to the accommodation indorser, and is indorsed by him without having been previously indorsed by the person to whose order the same is made payable, the latter may, at the time he puts his indorsement upon it, indorse it specially without recourse to himself; so as to leave the second indorser liable to any person into whose hands it may subsequently come for a good consideration, and without any remedy over against the first indorser. Or, if the object of the second indorser was to enable the drawer, as in this case, to obtain money from the payee of the note, upon the credit of such accommodation indorser, he may indorse it in the same way without recourse; and by such indorsement may either make it payable to the second indorser or to the bearer. And such original payee may then, as the legal holder and owner of the note, recover thereon against such second indorser, upon a declaration stating such special indorsement by him and subsequent indorsement of the note to him by the second indorser. Or he may recover on the common money counts, under the statute, by serving a copy of the note, and of the indorsement so made thereon, with his declaration. But as the second indorser, if he has not waived notice of the demand of and non-payment by the maker, cannot be made liable upon his indorsement without proof of such demand and notice, the plaintiff at the trial must prove the same, or he cannot recover."

Judge Daniel in his work on Negotiable Instru-

the objection to the reception of evidence under the answer of defendant Hill. And, secondly, they allege that the court permitted Hill, over their objection, to introduce evidence in proof of a concurrent parol agreement limiting his written liability on the note sued on.

The first inquiry in this case is, What is the character of Hill's liability on the note sued on? Hill was a stranger to the note. What liability did he incur by writing his name across the back thereof? This question was settled, in this state, at a very early day. In the case of Firman v. Blood, 2 Kan. 497, this court declares that the liability incurred by an irregular indorsement of a promissory note, that is, the writing of his name by a stranger to the note across the back thereof, is prima facie that of a guarantor. Judge Kingman, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "If the note is designed for the payee, then he cannot be held as an indorser. He is a stranger to the note. He must be held either as an original promisor or guarantor. Holding, then, that, in settling this question for the first time, it is well to follow those decisions that seem best to interpret the original understanding of the parties, we think, in the absence of proof, Wilder and Morrow should be held as guarantors." Wilder and Morrow, strangers to the note, had written their names across the back of said note. They sustained, prima facie, the same relation to the note sued on in that case that Hill does to the note sued on in this case. The case of Fuller v. Scott, 8 Kan. 25, follows the Firman Case. In that case it is said: "The indorsement of the name of a third person upon the back of a promissory note is prima facie evidence of a contract of guaranty." In the case of Whittenhall v. Korber, 12 Kan. 620, the Firman Case is again recogments, § 714, says: "It would seem to us that such a party ought to be regarded as a first indorser. If he intended to be a second indorser, he should have refrained from putting his name in the note until it was first indorsed by the payee. By placing it first he enables the payee to place his own afterwards; and prima facie the facts would seem to indicate such intention. There is nothing in the objection that there is no title in him to indorse away. Prior parties could not be sued without payee's indorsement; but he being an indorser can be sued by any one deriving title under him. In fact, his position seems to render his liability strictly analogous to that of the drawee of a bill upon the maker in favor of the payee; and so to regard him simplifies, as it seems to us, a question which, unless such analogy be followed, is exceedingly complicated and difficult."

In Indiana, also, this distinction between negotiable and non-negotiable instruments is declared. In Wells v. Jackson, 6 Blackf. 40, the leading case in Indiana, it was held that where a third person wrote his name on the back of a note not negotiable as an inland bill of exchange, prior to or at the time of its inception, without any agreement expressing the real nature of the obligation intended to be assumed, he thereby conferred authority on the payee to treat him as a surety or joint promisor; while a similar act in respect to a note negotiable as an inland bill of exchange subjected the person so signing, presumably to the liability, as well as the privileges and immunities of an indorser.

The following cases sustain this rule and settle the law in that state: Pool v. Anderson, 1 L. R. A. 712, 116 Ind. 88; Moorman v. Wood, 117 Ind. 144; De Pauw v. Bank of Salem, 10 L. R. A. 46, 126 Ind. 553; Kealing v. Van Sickle, 74 Ind. 529; Houck v. Graham, 3 West. Rep. 670, 106 Ind. 196; Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 95, 24 L. ed. 343; Knopf v. Morel, 10 West. Rep. 512, 111 Ind. 570.

In Rothschild v. Grix, 31 Mich. 150, 18 Am. Rep. 171, Graves, Ch. J., criticised the rule which recognizes a distinction between negotiable and non-negotiable instruments, in the following words: "If not misapprehended, it makes the backer's undertakings, when entered into, assume the character of an indorser's contract, or that of the contract of an original promisor, according to whether the note does or does not contain words which permit the paper to be rendered negotiable, and it neither regards any extrinsic arrangement or understanding bearing on the quality of the undertaking, or the circumstances that when the backer's contract is complete, and defined by delivery to the payee, the words of negotiability still remain dormant, 18 L. R. A.

mant, and the note without an indispensable quality to make it presently negotiable. Now, the backer's contract takes effect simultaneously with that of the party who signs upon the face, and the right of the payee against each inures at the same time. The note, it is true, then contains words of negotiability, but they are without function. They have a potential force only. The note is still not in shape to be negotiable, and cannot be negotiable, until the payee, or one in his shoes, elects to indorse. The effect of putting in the words of negotiability not being to constitute the paper presently negotiable, but to convey to the payee and his privies the power, to be exercised at their election, to invest it with negotiability. Still, the contract relation of the backer to the payee is constituted at the outset. If the backer's attitude to the payee is not then that of indorser, it cannot grow into it by mere lapse of time. The possibility that the note may be made subject to an indorser's contract does not make it subject thereto when it is delivered. The payee may choose, under the right exclusively vested in him, not to indorse at all; and if such is his choice the paper will never come into a negotiable state."

In Connecticut the indorsement in blank of a negotiable note by a third person for the better security of the payee, prima facie imports the same contract as the blank indorsement of a note not negotiable. Perkins v. Catlin, 11 Conn. 213, 29 Am. Dec. 282; Ranson v. Sherwood, 26 Conn. 437.

Presumption as to date of signature.

An indorsement by a stranger, if without date, is presumed to have been made at the inception of the note. Gilpin v. Marley, 4 Houst. (Del.) 284; Cook v. Southwick, 9 Tex. 615, 60 Am. Dec. 181; Webster v. Cobb, 17 Ill. 459.

The defendant's signature on the back of the note had the same effect to make him an original promisor as if he had signed on its face, and there being no other date than the date of the note, the presumption is that he signed it when the maker did, or agreed to sign it, and subsequently did so, in pursuance of such an agreement. Childs v. Wyman, 44 Me. 453, 69 Am. Dec. 111; Leonard v. Wildes, 36 Me. 235.

But oral evidence is admissible to show when the indorsement was made. Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90, 24 L. ed. 341; Essex Co. v. Edmonds, 12 Gray, 275, 71 Am. Dec. 758.

Intention of the parties controls liability.

A stranger who writes his name on the back of a promissory note before it is delivered, whether nized, and referred to as stating the law on this question. See also Sarbach v. Jones, 20 Kan. 497; Withers v. Berry, 25 Kan. 378; Talley v. Burtie, 45 Kan. 151, and cases there cited.

The liability of Hill being fixed, prima facie, as that of guarantor, instead of that of commercial indorser, parol testimony may be given to show his exact relation to the other parties to the note, and the exact liability assumed by him when he put his name thereon. Firman v. Blood, supra: "The difference is this: in Massachusetts he is presumed to be an original promisor, in Ohio he is presumed to be a guarantor; but in either state parol evidence is received to rebut the presumption, and show what liability it was intended he should assume, and what relation he should sustain to the paper." In Fuller v. Scott, 8 Kan. 25, the court says: "The liability incurred by a stranger to a promissory note, by writing his name across the back thereof, is that of an implied guaranty unless the same is inconsistent with the understanding of the parties; clearly recognizing the right to show, by parol proof, the exact liability so incurred, according to the understanding of the parties, at the time of the indorsement and delivery of the note. In Withers v. Berry, supra, one, a stranger to a note, who had written his name across the back thereof, was permitted, when sued thereon, to show that, at the time the note became due, the maker thereof was solvent, and that the note could have been collected of him by the exercise of reasonable diligence but that afterwards the maker became insolvent;" and such showing was held a good de-it be negotiable or non-negotiable, according to the law-merchant, does so in order to give the maker credit or the note currency, and with the intention to pledge himself in some shape for its payment. Ellbert v. Finkbeiner, 68 Pa. 243, 8 Am. Rep. 176; Pool v. Anderson, 1 L. R. A. 712, 116 Ind. 68.

It is sufficient that the indorser knows that a credit is to be obtained of the payee, and it is not necessary that he should know the precise nature of it. Coulter v. Richmond, 59 N. Y. 478.

The effect of an indorsement before delivery depends upon the party's intention. Boteler v. Dexter, 19 Wash. L. Rep. 874.

The liability of one whose name appears upon a promissory note, no matter when or where it is written or what the character of the note is, must depend upon a contract which is either expressed in words or implied by law. Seymour v. Mickey, 15 Ohio St. 515.

The act constitutes a contract which is to be construed in such a way as to render it available to carry into effect the intention of the parties, consistent with settled rules of law. Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90, 24 L. ed. 341; Rey v. Simpson, 63 U. S. 341, 16 L. ed. 260.

In Rey v. Simpson, supra, it was held that when a promissory note, made payable to a particular person, is first indorsed to a third person, such third person is held an original promisor, guarantor, or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the understanding of the parties at the time the transaction took place. If he put his name on the back of the note at the time it was made, as surety for the maker and his accommodation, to give credit with the payee, or if he participated in the consideration for which the note was given, he must be considered as a joint maker.

"Whether the contract was one of indorsement or suretyship depended, not upon the intent of one of the parties, but on the mutual understanding and intent of both." Kealing v. Vansickle, 74 Ind. 529.

The liability of one who places his name on the back of an inland bill of exchange, before its delivery, in order to give the maker credit with the payee, is, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, that of an indorser entitled to notice of dishonor, and this liability can in no way be affected by any understanding or agreement between the maker and payee. De Pauw v. Bank of Salem, 10 L. R. A. 46, 126 Ind. 559.

Where a person indorses a note in blank and intrusts it to the maker to deliver to the payee, he does not clothe the maker with authority to change, by agreement with the payee, the liability of indorser to that of a surety. Ibid.

The liability of indorsers for a note in blank cannot be changed by the subsequent writing of a guaranty above their names without their authority. Peters v. Chamberlain, 36 N. Y. S. R. 1000.

Intention may be shown by parol.

Parol evidence is admissible to show the liabilities intended to be assumed at the time of the transaction. Ives v. Bosley, 35 Md. 262, 6 Am. Rep. 411.

As between the parties to the real transaction it may be shown that one who signed his name was an indorser, but not as to a bona fide holder. Schneider v. Schieffman, 20 Mo. 871; Houck v. Graham, 106 Ind. 195; Browning v. Merritt, 61 Ind. 425; Bronson v. Alexander, 48 Ind. 244; Nurre v. Chittenden, 55 Ind. 462; Roberts v. Masters, 40 Ind. 461.

In Seymour v. Mickey, 15 Ohio St. 515, Scott, J., said: "It is the well-settled law of this state . . . that the mere indorsement upon a note of the name of a stranger in blank is prima facie evidence of a guaranty. But if it be shown that such indorsement was made at the execution of the note, and the party making it has not prescribed the limits of his responsibility, he authorizes the holder to regard him as a maker, and he is to be treated simply as a surety. These ordinary presumptions may, however, be rebutted by parol proof of a different intention and agreement of the parties."

In Collins v. Everett, 4 Ga. 273, it was said that such an indorser was, according to the common law, a second indorser, and not liable as surety or promisor; and that if parol testimony could fix the liability of surety or promisor it could only be by proof of an agreement; and that such an agreement ought to be specially averred. In this case, however, under the Act of 1820, the indorser was liable as surety. The Act of 1826 excepts paper payable at chartered banks, and, therefore, paper so payable is under the operation of the common-law rule as laid down above. But even in such a case it is open, under Ga. Code, § 3808, to explanation by parol. Neal v. Wilson, 79 Ga. 733.

In Pennsylvania, prior to January 1, 1866, when the Act of April 23, 1855, went into effect it could have been shown by parol evidence that the intention of the irregular indorser was to guarantee the payment of the note to the payee. Leech v. Hill, 4 Watts, 448; Taylor v. McCune, 11 Pa. 460.

The effect of that act was to make parol evidence of such a guaranty unlawful. Jack v. Morrison, 48 Pa. 113.

"But surely, under the statute, a memorandum in writing, signed by the party, is admissible to show that the agreement upon which the indorsement was made was a guaranty that the note should be paid to the payee." Ellbert v. Finkbeiner, 68 Pa. 247, 8 Am. Rep. 176. A. P. W.

fense. In the case of Talley v. Burtis, 45 Kan. 147, the same principle is recognized. Counsel cite the case of Doolittle v. Ferry, 20 Kan. 230, 27 Am. Rep. 166, to show that oral testimony may not be received to affect the liability of an indorser on a note. The distinction between that case and this is that in this case Hill was a stranger to the note he indorsed, and in law became, prima facie, a guarantor thereof, while, in the case cited, Ferry and Watson were the payees in the note, and by their indorsement became liable as commercial indorsers. Their indorsement carried with it the title to the note, while in the case at bar Hill's indorsement did not in any way affect the title to the note. A different rule prevails in the cases because of the different liabilities incurred by the indorsement of a note by the payees therein and by a stranger to the note. We think the defense of Hill was one that could properly be set up and proven in the case, and, the court having made a general finding in favor of Hill thereon, the case must be affirmed, and it is so recommended.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Charles ULRICH, Appt.,

v.

Edward ULRICH, Exr., etc., of Barbara Ulrich, Deceased, Resp't.

(.....N. Y.)

There is no presumption of law against an agreement by a parent to pay a child for personal services where there is evidence tending to show such an agreement although if there is no such evidence there is a presumption that the services are gratuitous.

(Andrews, Finch and O'Brien, JJ., dissent.)

(November 29, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover compensation for services alleged to have been rendered to defendant's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Nelson Smith, for appellant:

There is no presumption of law against any valid claim nor against any valid defense.

McQueen v. Babcock, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 132; Barnett v. Meyer, 10 Hun, 109; Bank of Kinderhook v. Gifford, 40 Barb. 659; Union Nat. Bank v. Bassett, 3 Abb. Pr. N. S. 359; Grant v. McCaughin, 4 How. Pr. 216.

All that the law presumes is that where there is no contract for services, there can be no recovery.

Mr. Edward W. S. Johnston, with Mr. Edward P. Orrell, for respondent:

In Spraker v. Dow, 16 N. Y. S. R. 297, the court held that claims of the nature of the one here asserted against the estate of deceased persons based upon no agreement clearly expressed or satisfactorily established by reliable evidence should be carefully scrutinized by the courts to the end that speculative or fictitious claims should not be encouraged.

Where there is near relationship between the alleged promisor and promisee, it is the rule that transactions between them do not give rise to the ordinary presumptions that result from business dealings.

Collyer v. Collyer, 12 N. Y. S. R. 878.

In cases of this character the law does not imply a promise to pay for services rendered or for board and lodging furnished, but will presume that they were rendered and furnished gratuitously, and in order to overcome this presumption there must be an express promise to pay proved together with evidence showing that the parties expected to be paid, and payment.

Lynn v. Smith, 35 Hun, 275; Roblee v. Galentine, 19 N. Y. Week. Dig. 153.

Claims withheld during the lifetime of an alleged debtor, and sought to be enforced after his death, are always to be carefully scrutinized and only admitted upon satisfactory proof.

Kearney v. McKeon, 85 N. Y. 187.

In Havens v. Havens, 21 N. Y. S. R. 958, Pratt, J., says: "The fact that the plaintiff resided so long with his father and no accounting seems to have been had, renders it probable that plaintiff never intended to charge, and the father never expected to pay for, any of the items claimed."

See also Ross v. Ross, 6 Hun, 184; Moore v. Moore, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 303.

Mere performance of the services is not enough; it must affirmatively be shown that there was an agreement to pay an agreed recompense for them.

Carpenter v. Weller, 15 Hun, 184; Hall v. Finch, 29 Wis. 278; Updike v. Titus, 18 N. J. Eq. 152; Griffin v. Potter, 14 Wend. 210; Lynn v. Lynn, 29 Pa. 369; Gaylord v. Gaylord, 7 N. Y. S. Peckham*, 16 Vt. 150; Shakespeare v. Markham, 72 N. Y. 400; Ikerd v. Beavers, 106 Ind. 488;

NOTE.—The limits of the presumption as to gratuitous services to kindred are more sharply defined than usual by the above decision.

Ayres v. Hull, 5 Kan. 419; Greenwell v. Greenwell, 28 Kan. 675; Wotherspoon v. Wotherspoon, 17 Jones & S. 160.

Loose expressions of an infirm parent expressive of gratitude for the personal services of a child, and of a desire that compensation should be rendered after his death, are not in the least degree indicative of the term of a contract to pay therefor, and are insufficient for submission to the jury from which to find whether or not such a contract existed.

Ulrich v. Arnold, 120 Pa. 170; Vansickle v. Furguson, 122 Ind. 450; Houck v. Houck, 99 Pa. 552; Hertzog v. Hertzog, 29 Pa. 465; Wright v. Senn, 85 Mich. 191; Hill v. Hill, 121 Ind. 255; Ellis v. Cary, 4 L. R. A. 55, 74 Wis. 176; Wiley v. Bull, 41 Kan. 206; Burgess v. Burgess, 109 Pa. 312; Re Kirkpatrick's Estate (S. C.) July 28, 1891; Zimmerman v. Zimmerman, 129 Pa. 235; Woods v. Land, 90 Mo. App. 176; Barhite's App. 126 Pa. 404; Lewis v. Trickey, 20 Barb. 387.

The presumption of law is certainly against a claim of this kind and the courts have more than once said so. The presumption of law is against the liability for services of this character, and the courts have repeatedly so held.

Shakespeare v. Markham, 72 N. Y. 400; Ulrich v. Arnold, supra; Spraker v. Dow, 16 N. Y. S. R. 297; Kearney v. McKeon, 85 N. Y. 137; Carpenter v. Weller, 15 Hun, 134; Harri-man v. Sampson, 23 Ill. App. 159; Lynn v. Lynn, 29 Pa. 369; Funk v. Lawson, 12 Ill. App. 229; Woods v. Evans, 113 Ill. 186, 55 Am. Rep. 409.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action against the executor of his mother's will to recover from her estate the value of services, which he alleged had been rendered by himself and his wife to his mother at her request. A jury rendered a verdict for the defendant, and the only question which demands our consideration, upon the plaintiff's appeal from a judgment affirming the defendant's recovery, arises upon the exception of the plaintiff to a part of the trial judge's charge. After stating what the action was for, the trial judge said: "As a general rule, children are bound to care for their parents in their old age, and filial affection should prompt children to do so. The consequence is that the presumption of law is against such a claim as has been advanced in this action." The plaintiff excepted to this portion of the charge, and insists that it was an erroneous instruction to the jury. The trial judge, it is true, continued by charging that "if the plaintiff has overcome the presumption by proof, and has clearly shown that the services sought to be recovered for were rendered by himself and his wife pursuant to his mother's express promise, . . . the plaintiff is entitled to recover." Under the facts of the case, as they had appeared in the evidence, the charge relating to the obligations of children, and as to the legal presumption, was such as possibly to convey to the minds of the jurors an erroneous understanding of the law. It may well be that the trial judge had before his own mind the moral aspect of the case, and did not intend that his observations should have any other weight with the jury than as moral reflections; but the nature of the case, the sequence of the remarks, and the stage of the case, or the circumstances under which uttered, were such as, in my judgment, to require us to grant a new trial. There is no presumption of law against the maintenance of such a claim. If the plaintiff had established to the satisfaction of the jury the existence of an agreement between his parent and himself, under which he and his wife were to attend upon and to care for her, and she was to pay for such services, he was entitled to their verdict, as much as he would be upon any other valid claim.

A "presumption" has been defined to be a rule of law that courts and judges shall draw a particular inference from particular facts, or from particular evidence, unless and until the truth of the inference is disproved. Steph. Dig. Ev. chap. 1, art. 1. No presumption existed here as a presumption of law. The right to draw any presumption as to the fact of an agreement having been made from the other fact of the relationship between the parties was within the exclusive province of the jury. Justice v. Lang, 52 N. Y. 323. There is no rule of law which compels an inference, from the fact of such a relationship, against the existence of an agreement by the parent to compensate the child for services to be rendered. The law does presume, where there is no proof of a contract, under which the services were performed, that there was no promise or agreement to pay for them; that is, that they were gratuitous. That is the general rule. So far as the relation of parent and child is concerned, it is quite as competent for the parent to contract with his adult child for support and care, and a claim for the compensation due thereunder is quite as valid as it would be in any other case between individuals. The liability of a child to support its parents, who are infirm, destitute, or aged, was created in England and here by statute. The statute in that respect created duties unknown to the common law. Reeve, Dom. Rel. 284; 1 Bl. Com. 448; Edwards v. Davis, 16 Johns. 281.

Had the trial judge confined his observations to the suggestion that filial affection should prompt children to take care of their parents in their old age, I should find no reason for criticising the correctness of his charge. But the state of the case was such as that, with the moral sense alert, and naturally quick to respond to impressions adverse to the plaintiff's claim, the jury would readily attach great weight to all expressions of the judge presiding at the trial which cast a doubt upon the validity of the claim. In every case, to determine whether the error pointed out has been such as to prejudice the party, the court may consider the nature of the case, and how delicately the scales were balanced between the parties. Here the plaintiff had shown by the evidence of his wife that, after the death of her husband, the testatrix, who was very aged and feeble, told plaintiff and his wife to stay on with her, and that she would pay them for the work they did; that she gave as a reason her helpless condition; that they remained with her until her death, and during that time performed many more or less important services in nursing and caring for her; and that she repeatedly said she would pay them, without mentioning any amount. Her evidence was more or less corroborated by that of witnesses who variously testified to hearing the old woman state that she made the plaintiff and his wife stay with and take care of her, and that she would pay them, or that she would "make it all right with them." In opposition, the defense gave evidence to show that plaintiff and wife received their board and lodging; that the deceased was an active woman, and not dependent upon others for services, or in need of care; that plaintiff was a shiftless fellow, and would occasionally drink to excess; and that, under the will of deceased, plaintiff received an equal interest in her estate with the other children. When the evidence was all in, and the case ready to be sent to the jury for their verdict, while the plaintiff's evidence of an agreement that they should remain and care for the deceased, and that their services were to be paid for, was uncontradicted by direct evidence, it was seriously attacked by evidence of facts which, if it did not make the agreement appear an improbable one, yet was of such a nature as might justify the jury in discrediting the evidence for the plaintiff.

On the one side was positive evidence which, if believed, entitled plaintiff to a verdict. According to the evidence given for the plaintiff there were no rambling expressions of a sense of obligation, or of promises to make compensation by testamentary provisions. There was a request to remain, and an agreement to pay for the work to be done. On the other side, there was circumstantial evidence negating or tending to negative the making of the alleged agreement, which the jury were at liberty to accept, and upon which they could base a verdict for the defendant. In that condition of things, the just balance of their minds might be disturbed, and their judgment easily led, by any suggestion from the trial judge which seemed to militate against the legality of plaintiff's claim, and which would seem to accord with an aversion of the moral sense. It appears from the record that at the conclusion of the evidence but little time was left, and that the trial judge hastened, as he said, to "finish the case this evening" and he made a very brief charge, in which he left it to the jury to say whether the plaintiff had "made out a case which meets every requirement of the law as he had laid it down." He had in mind, I do not doubt at all, that he had previously merely commented upon the obligation from the child to parent, as such exists in nature, and not as having led them to believe that any rule of law stood in the way of such a claim in such cases. But I am constrained to the belief that prejudice may have been worked to the plaintiff's case by the observations of the trial judge. He had observed that it was "a general rule that children are bound to take care of their parents in their old age," and that "the consequence" of that rule, and of the promptings of filial affection, was "that the presumption of law was against such a claim as had been advanced in this action." Both statements were incorrect as legal propositions; for, of course, there is no such general rule of law, nor such a presumption. Coming from the lips of the judge, from whom they were to take the law applicable to the case, can we, and should we, say that they had no influence upon the minds of the jury, or that, if they did have, the error was cured by the subsequent instruction to the effect that, "if the plaintiff had overcome the presumption by proof," he might recover? I think not. This was essentially a case for decision by a jury upon the evidence before them, as they believed the facts and weighed the probabilities. They might well have understood that there was a rule of law, which amounted to a presumption, against the validity of such a contract and claim, and the plaintiff should therefore have a new trial, in which a verdict may be reached without the possible influence of an erroneous idea leading to its formation.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to the appellant to abide the event.

All concur, except Andrews, Finch, and O'Brien, JJ., dissenting.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

William MANSFIELD et al., Appts.,
v.

William D. PLACE et al.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Courts should not give a construction to a deed in direct conflict with that which the parties have themselves put upon it, especially after a time long enough to create prescriptive rights thereunder.
2. A prescriptive right to the ice on the whole surface of a pond and not merely to those portions of it from which ice has been out, is acquired by those who have exercised the right without objection from any one to cut and gather ice at any point or points they choose during a time long enough to create prescriptive rights under the Statutes of Limitation claiming the right under a deed which gave the right to the flowage by which the pond was created.

As to sale of ice, see Morse v. Moore, 13 L. R. A. 224, 83 Me. 473; Murchie v. Cornell, 14 L. R. A. 492, 155 Mass. 60.

ing defendants a portion of the ice of a certain pond, in an action brought to settle the rights of the parties to such ice. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mitchel & Hawley and John C. Blanchard, for appellants:

The entire use of the waters of Prairie Creek, with all the rents, issues, and profits thereof, was conveyed to John C. Dexter, his heirs and assigns forever.

This right is not a mere easement, but a grant of a right in fee.

See Hall v. Ionia, 38 Mich. 493.

The right to the ice which from year to year forms upon the waters of said pond, is a part of the issues and profits granted and conveyed by said deed.

The words "rents, issues, and profits," when they appear in a grant or devise, are given a very liberal construction, and may be extended beyond their natural meaning.

Schermerhorne v. Schermerhorne, 6 Johns. Ch. 70, 2 L. ed. 48.

The word "profits," says Sir Thomas Palmer in Allen v. Backhouse, 3 Ves. & B. 65, does ex vi termini include the whole interest, as a devise of the profits would pass the land itself.

And in Earl v. Grim, 1 Johns. Ch. 498, 1 L. ed. 220, the court said that a devise of the rents and profits of land is a devise of the land itself, is a rule acknowledged throughout the books.

Cromie v. Wabash & E. Canal Trustees, 71 Ind. 208, shows that the ice and the proceeds thereof are a part and parcel of the rents and profits to be derived from the building of the ice dam and the ponding of the waters.

Ice formed in water over the land of a private proprietor may, like the water in which it is formed, be taken and carried away by him, unless others have acquired paramount rights in it by agreement with him or by authority of law.

We call the court's special attention to Huntington v. Asher, 96 N. Y. 604, 48 Am. Rep. 652, where it was held that the right to cut and gather the ice upon a millpond passed as an appurtenance to land conveyed bordering on the margin of said pond.

Where it has been held that the riparian owner was the owner of the ice which formed upon the waters of the pond, the millowner in such case had simply the right to maintain the dam and flow the land for mill purposes.

When a party is in possession, pursuant to a state of facts which of themselves show the character and extent of his entry and claim, such facts, whatever they may be in a given case, perform sufficiently the office of color of title.

If a man enters into possession in good faith, claiming title thereto, and believing that he is the owner thereof, his possession is under color of title and is coextensive with the supposed limits of his grant, and no matter how defective his deed, or even if it fails to convey any title whatever, or whether he has any deed or not, if he enters in good faith, believing that he has title, it is all the law requires, providing the facts and circumstances in connection therewith indicate the extent of his claim.

Our adverse possession covers the whole entire pond.

La Frombois v. Jackson, supra.

If one stands by and encourages another, though but passively, to lay out money under an erroneous opinion of title, or under the obvious expectation that no obstacle will afterwards be interposed in the way of its enjoyment, the court will not permit any subsequent interference with it by him who formerly promoted and encouraged these acts.

Complainants would have the right under the deed to bring this water to the city of Ionia to supply its inhabitants. They therefore own the waters of the pond, and have the right to use it for any purpose they see fit, and instead of bringing it to the city in ditches or pipes, they can allow the same to freeze into ice and bring it in wagons, as they have done for the last twenty years.

Where the right conveyed is of that kind and character, that in order that the full and complete benefit of it may be enjoyed by the grantee, he must have the possession and dominion over the lands affected by such conveyance, in such case, the fee of the land itself, at least to the extent necessary for the full enjoyment of such right, is conveyed. But where the nature of the right conveyed, in order to its full beneficial enjoyment, does not deprive the grantor of the possession and dominion over the lands to be affected thereby, but simply gives to the grantee certain rights and privileges on the lands of the grantor, of a nature which does not deprive the grantor of the possession and beneficial enjoyment of the same, in such case, an easement, and not a fee, is conveyed.

Durand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill is filed in this case for the purpose of settling the ownership of the ice forming from time to time on a body of water known as the "Prairie Creek Pond." On April 25, 1855, John P. Place and Laura Place, his wife, executed and delivered to John C. Dexter a warranty deed in the usual form, con-vveying to him certain property mentioned in the deed, and described as: "The following described parcels of land in Ionia county, Michigan, on section 21, in township 7 north, of range 6 west; being all the land lying south of the center of the highway leading through said section 21 from Ionia county seat to Lyons, and north of the north line of Detroit & Milwaukee Railroad, which belongs to the said parties of the first part west of a point on said center of said highway thirty-five rods east of the center of Prairie creek, where the said highway crosses the same, embracing in the above the mill yard and location of the sawmill lately burned; also the right of building and maintaining a dam across Prairie creek on the said highway, or at any point or place north of same, sufficiently high to flow the lands of the said parties of the first part on said section 21, and on the south half of the southwest quarter, and the west half of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter, of section 16, in said town, back to the north line of the last-described pieces, together with the right to flow said lands north of and on said highway; also embracing in the above rights all of the present mill race, together with the east bank of said race; also the right of making and maintaining a mill race on the east side of said creek, and north of the center of the highway, at any suitable point, together with the right of taking earth from the hill on the east side of the creek, and north of the center of the highway, so much of and as often as the same may be necessary to make, maintain, or repair said dam or mill race; also the right of entering upon lands adjoining said dam and race whenever it may be necessary to repair the same; also the right of keeping and floating logs in said pond or race; also the right of cutting timber in and clearing out the timber and logs in the pond; also the right of making and maintaining a race across the south half of the southwest quarter of section 16, in said town, along the high bank or hills on the west side of said creek at any height, and thence, in a straight line, to the highway, near where the said highway crosses the west line of said section 21, together with the right of entering upon lands adjoining said race only so much and so often as may be necessary to repair said race. The said parties of the second part and their heirs and assigns, are to make and maintain suitable bridges across the said race where necessary for crossing. Together with all and singular the hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in any wise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues, and profits, thereof; and all the estate, right, title, interest, claim, or demand whatsoever of the said parties of the first part, either in law or equity, of, in, and to the above-bargained premises." Afterwards, through various conveyances to and from different persons, the title finally passed into the complainants, the same as that conveyed by the Dexter deed, and they have succeeded to all the rights granted to him under such deed. The defendants are heirs of John P. and Laura Place, and they have succeeded to all the rights formerly held by them, and which they had not disposed of or lost through their acts or omission to act in reference to the subject now in controversy.

In 1863 the owners of the Dexter title built a flouring mill and erected a dam which set back the water of Prairie creek, and overflowed the land mentioned in the deed, and thereby created the pond of water known as the "Prairie Creek Pond," and which is situated near the city of Ionia. At the time of the giving of the Dexter deed, Ionia was a small place, but in 1869 it had grown into a town of considerable size and importance; and during the winter of 1869 and 1870 one Norman S. Goodrich, under a lease from the then owners of the Dexter title, proceeded to put the pond in condition for the ice business, and begun to cut and harvest ice for sale to his customers in Ionia. This he continued to do during those years, and also during the winter of 1871. On January 30, 1872, in consideration of the sum of $480 by him paid, he obtained from the owners of the Dexter title a lease for the period of ten years of all "the territory known as the 'Prairie Creek Mill Pond,' for the express purpose and benefits of the ice which shall or may accumulate thereon during the term of this lease, together with all and singular the benefits and liberties to the said premises for such purposes belonging." This lease was duly witnessed and acknowledged and recorded in the office of the register of deeds for Ionia county. Under this lease, Goodrich proceeded to build ice houses adjoining the pond upon land which he leased of Mrs. Laura Place for that purpose. He improved the pond by taking out stumps and trees, and cutting down the brush so as to make a clear field for the ice to form upon, and constructed a road to enable him to draw the ice, when cut, from the pond to the city. During all this time Mrs. Place occupied the farm and lived in sight of the pond,—knew all that was being done,—and her sons and hired man were employed by Goodrich at different times to assist him in conducting his ice business. Goodrich continued to operate the ice business under this lease for about eight years, when, finding he could not get an extension of it when it should expire, he sold out the business, including the balance of the term of the lease, to Isaac P. and Anson Hoag, for $1,450. Before buying out Goodrich, they obtained a promise from W. D. Place, one of the defendants, who it appears was at that time managing the business for his mother, that if they bought out Goodrich they could obtain the title of the land upon which the ice house stood. The purchase was thereupon consummated, and the ice business was continued as before, Mrs. Place receiving $10 per year as rent for the ice-house property for the remaining two years of the lease, and at that time she executed a deed of the same according to the evident understanding of all the parties for a consideration of $800. The land conveyed was about one acre in amount, situated upon the bank of the pond, and the price received by her for it was evidently many times its actual value, and the large price paid for it was clearly because its value was enhanced by reason of the ice business, and for which use it was intended. The ice business, as established, was continued thereafter and without objection from any one until near the time when the bill was filed in this case. The property acquired, as stated, for ice-house purposes, through different conveyances, also became vested in the complainants, including the rights conveyed to Isaac P. and Anson Hoag by Goodrich.

There has never been any concealment on the part of complainants, or on the part of any one from whom they have derived title, of the claim which they made and still make to the ice. Their occupation and use of the pond for that purpose has been open and notorious. The lease to Goodrich, as well as the conveyances in the chain of the Dexter title, under which the complainants claim, have been recorded from time to time in the office of the register of deeds for Ionia county; and in addition Laura Place, and at least some of her heirs, and who are defendants in this suit, were fully advised of all that was being done from time to time, as well as of the claims made by the owners of the Dexter title, and not only made no objection to it, but by leasing and selling property to be used in connection with the business as then established and being carried on, as well as by buying ice from and engaging in the employment of those who were conducting the business, acquiesced in the claim made by them to the exclusive ownership and use of the ice forming from time to time on the pond. Some of the conveyances were made with special reference to the value of the ice business, and the bill alleges that when complainant Mansfield purchased his one-half interest in the ice-house property and business, paying $2,000 therefor, he did so with the honest belief and understanding that he thereby became the owner of the undivided one-half of all the ice which would form from year to year on the pond, as well as of one-half the ice business which had been established in connection therewith.

The bill also alleges that the defendants, as heirs of Laura Place, claim that, because they are the owners of the fee of the land covered by the waters of the pond, they are the owners of the ice forming from year to year upon its surface, and the court has asked for a decree settling the rights of the parties as to the ownership of the ice, and to restrain the defendants from laying claim to or interfering with it. The answer generally denies that the complainants, either through the Dexter chain of title or by long-continued use of the property in the manner stated, have any right or title to the ice, and deny that, under all the circumstances of this case, they are estopped from claiming that they, as the owners of the fee, are entitled to it. It may be considered as settled law in this state that the owner of the soil under the water is ordinarily the sole and exclusive owner of the ice forming upon such water, and that his riparian ownership of the bed of a stream will carry with it the right to the ice forming upon the surface of such stream, as far as his riparian right to the soil extends. This doctrine is fully established in Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18, 77 Am. Dec. 485; People's Ice Co. v. The Excelsior, 44 Mich. 229, 38 Am. Rep. 246; Clute v. Fisher, 65 Mich. 48; Bigelow v. Shaw, 65 Mich. 341. We reaffirm the principle established by these cases, and this controversy could be easily disposed of if there were no other questions to be considered except the abstract proposition urged by the defendants,—that they, as owners of the land covered by the waters of the pond, are entitled to the ice forming upon its surface. But there are other and more serious contentions in reference to the extent of the grant in the Dexter deed, and the construction to be placed upon it, and also in reference to the prescriptive and other rights acquired by the complainants in the subject-matter of this suit, in consequence of the acquiescence of the defendants, and of those through whom they obtain title, in the claim which complainants have made for many years, and are now making, as to the ownership of the ice in question. These become important questions, which must be given fair consideration in the determination of the rights of the respective parties to this litigation.

Under our view of this case, as it appears to us in the light of all the facts and circumstances surrounding it, we are not called upon to construe the Dexter deed, or to decide upon the extent of the right conveyed by it. The parties have themselves construed it, and, except when there has been mistake or fraud or concealment of important facts, courts should not give a construction to a deed in direct conflict with that which the parties have themselves put upon it, especially after such construction has been in force and assented to by all the parties for a period of time long enough to create prescriptive rights and equities under the statutory limitations of the state. And this is so, even when the terms employed in the deed are doubtful. When a water easement is granted in general or indefinite terms, rendering the construction doubtful, contemporaneous acts of the parties, giving a practical construction to the grant, will be deemed to express their intention. Gould, Waters, § 318a and cases cited; Mudge v. Salisbury, 110 N. Y. 413-417. Where the uniform and continued acts of the parties for many years have placed a construction upon a contract or deed of conveyance, the court will give effect to the contract or deed as the parties themselves have construed it. Johnson v. Gibson, 78 Ind. 282; Reisner v. Ozley, 80 Ind. 580; Kingsland v. New York, 45 Hun, 198; Lyles v. Lescher, 108 Ind. 382. The same general doctrine is laid down in Fitzsimons v. Foley, 80 Mich. 518.

Applying this principle to the facts of this case, it is clear that the right to the ice forming on this pond from year to year is in the complainants. The evidence shows conclusively that, ever since the ice in question has been of any value, the owners of the Dexter title have always claimed the ice forming upon the pond, and have exercised the right to cut it and dispose of it as their own. They have done so openly and without opposition from any one. They exercised and enjoyed this right uninterruptedly for more than 15 years before the death of Laura Place, with her full knowledge and consent, and she rented and sold some of her own land at a large price, to furnish them with better facilities to carry on the ice business. Acting upon her open acquiescence in the right which complainants make to the ownership of the ice, a large amount of money was invested in the business.

Sales and transfers of portions of the ice business and property have been made from time to time with the fullest acquiescence on the part of Laura Place in the fact that the owners of the Dexter title were the owners of the ice forming on the pond, and no objection was at any time made by her to this claim. She would certainly be estopped from denying complainants' right, and her heirs have no more rights than she owned at the time of her death, and cannot be heard to assert a claim which she, if alive, could not assert.

In giving the construction to the deed which the parties gave to it, and for a period exceeding fifteen years, the complainants have acquired a prescriptive right to the ice in question. A grant to them is implied, for, in order to establish a right or easement in the lands or waters of another, it is only necessary that the enjoyment be adverse and under a claim of right, and with the knowledge of the owner. That it be contrary to the interests of the owner, and of such a nature that it is difficult to account for it, except on the presumption of a grant to him, and that it has continued in that manner for the period of limitation fixed by the statute; and the knowledge of the exercise of this right in the manner stated is binding, not only on the owner, but his grantee as well. The adverse and uninterrupted use and enjoyment of an easement of this character, in the manner stated, for more than fifteen years under a claim of right, and with the knowledge of the owner, is strong ground on which to found the presumption of a grant, and when unexplained, it is presumed to be under a claim of right, and adverse, and is sufficient to establish a title by prescription. Gould, Waters, §§ 334, 335, 341, and cases cited.

We cannot agree with the defendants' contention that complainants have, if at all, only acquired prescriptive rights in the ice forming on such parts of the pond as they have actually cut upon. It has never been treated in that way. They, and those from whom they derive title, have claimed the right as extending over the entire pond, and they have cut and gathered ice at any point or points they chose without objection from any one. This claim, too, has been made under color of title. The Dexter deed gave the right to the flowage which creates the pond, and, whether or not the deed conferred the right now contended for yet it would be idle to say in this case that it was not even a color of title, when it is clear that the parties themselves agreed that it was not only a color of title, but an actual title, and when able and learned lawyers, after much thought and attention, honestly disagree as to whether or not it actually conveys the right claimed for it by complainants. It is sufficient to say that the court must treat it as the parties themselves did, and which related to the entire pond, and not to any parts or portions of it.

It follows that the decree of the court below, dividing the ice upon different parts of the pond between the respective parties, must be reversed, and a decree will be entered here in accordance with this opinion, settling the ownership of the ice in the complainants, and restraining the defendants from interfering therewith, as prayed for in the bill. Complainants will recover the costs of both courts.

The other Justices concurred.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

John W. WARTMAN, Pff. in Err.,v.
William H. SWINDELL.

(.....N. J.....)

*1. If, in an action of tort, the defendant relies upon the defense that the act he did was by way of a joke, it is a question for the jury to decide whether the parties had been perpetrating practical jokes upon each other in such a way that the defendant had a right to believe that the plaintiff would accept his act as a joke.

2. The maxim "de minimis non curat lex" does not apply to the positive and wrongful invasion of another's property. The right to maintain an action for the value of property of which the owner is wrongfully deprived is never denied.

ERROR to the Supreme Court at Circuit in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of the lines from defendant's harness. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John W. Wartman, for plaintiff in error:

The right of property is an absolute right inherent in every Englishman and consists "in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land."

1 Bl. Com. 138.

A fundamental right of the plaintiff was invaded, and he was entitled to establish in the action his right of property.

In an action of trespass, Bronson, J., said: "If the plaintiff succeeded in showing an unlawful entry upon his lands, or that his fences or any portion of them were improperly thrown down and his fields exposed, he was entitled to a verdict for nominal damages at least. It was not necessary for him to prove a sum, or that any particular amount of damages had been sustained. Every unauthorized entry upon the land of another is a trespass, and whether the owner suffer much or little, he is entitled to a verdict for some damages."

Dixon v. Clow, 24 Wend. 188; Carter v. Wallace, 2 Tex. 206.

Even if the result of the trespass benefits the plaintiff, instead of damaging him, he is entitled to nominal damages.

Jewett v. Whitney, 48 Me. 242.

The maxim, de minimis non curat lex, is never applied to the positive and wrongful invasion of another's property.

Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 948; Seneca Road Co. v. Auburn & R. R. Co. 5 Hill. 170; Pullan v. Stearns, 30 Vt. 443. See Whittemore v. Cutter, 1 Gall. 429.

That maxim has reference to the injury, and not to the resulting damage.

*Headnotes by VAN SYCKEL, J.

If a person has a right to vote at an election, and he is refused this right, he may have his action, even though the person for whom he proposed to vote should chance to be elected. Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938.

So if a sheriff neglect to return an execution the creditor may have his action for nominal damages, although no damages appeared to have resulted from the neglect.

Kidder v. Barker, 18 Vt. 454.

Where a clear right of a party is invaded, in consequence of another's breach of duty, he must be entitled to an action against that party for some amount, and there is no authority to the contrary.

Clifton v. Hooper, 6 Q. B. 467.

Actual, perceptible damages are not indispensable; they will be presumed to follow.

In a case where the sum of one dollar and forty-seven cents was in question, Van Syckel, J., said: "The deficiency was very insignificant, but the defendant has no right to withhold anything due the plaintiff."

Wright v. Belreue, 49 N. J. L. 415.

Court would not oust justice of jurisdiction where the verdict was half a cent above the limit fixed by statute.

Darnel v. Sheldon, 8 N. J. L. 523.

The fraction of an hour in the forbearance of a note is not a proper case for the application of the maxim in these practical times.

Hockenbury v. Meyers, 34 N. J. L. 346.

Messrs. Scovel & Harris, for defendant in error:

The objection that the value of the suit is too trivial to justify the court in taking cognizance of it, though not specially assigned as a ground of demurrer, may be taken advantage of by special motion to dismiss the bill, or the court may, of its own motion at the hearing, order the bill to be dismissed on this ground.

Swedish Evangelical L. Church of Swedesborough v. Shivers, 16 N. J. Eq. 457.

The case comes clearly within the maxim, de minimis non curat lex.

Though a wrongful act has been done against a person, yet if he has not sustained any damage from it, either actual or constructive, no action lies.

Nichols v. Valentine, 86 Me. 322; Lambard v. Pike, 38 Me. 141.

The policy of the law is to take no notice of trifling, vexatious, or vindictive suits.

Swedish Evangelical L. Church of Swedesborough v. Shivers, supra; Paul v. Slason, 22 Vt. 231, 54 Am. Dec. 75; Williams v. Mostyn, 4 Mees. & W. 145.

The law should hold out no inducement to useless or vindictive litigation.

NOTE.—The above decision as to the validity of a defense that an injury complained of was committed only by way of a joke makes an otherwise 18 L. R. A.

trifling case one of considerable importance as well as novelty.

Sedgwick, Damages, pp. 55, 56; Paul v. Simon, supra.

There is no fixed rule as to what exact amount the courts have held the maxim to be applicable.

Chenery v. Stevens, 97 Mass. 83.

The maxim was applied to a case where sixty-eight town orders for about $2,000, were barred by the Statute of Limitations, when one order for $15 was not so barred.

Schriber v. Richmond, 73 Wis. 5.

Also to a case where the plaintiff rightly recovered substantial damages for one cause of action, though nominal damages may have been improperly given for another cause of action.

Middleton v. Jerdee, 73 Wis. 39.

The maxim was also applied where an error as to the time when an item of $3 became due is alleged.

The rule of damages for the conversion of a horse and carriage which have been returned to the owner, is their market value at the time of the conversion, less their market value at the time of the return.

Lucas v. Trumbull, 15 Gray, 306.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In September, 1891, the clerk of the plaintiff in error, who was plaintiff below, drove the horse and carriage of the plaintiff to the sheriff's office in Camden, and there tied the horse to a post at the curb line of the street. While the clerk was in the sheriff's office, the lines, worth about three dollars or four dollars, were taken from the horse by the defendant in error, and the clerk was left without the means of driving the horse. He thereupon demanded the lines of the defendant, who refused to return them to him. The clerk then went to the office of the plaintiff, and informed him of the occurrence, and was instructed to return to the court-house, and again demand the lines of the defendant. A second demand was made, and the defendant refused to comply with it. Thereupon the plaintiff brought suit against the defendant for damages. On the trial of the cause in the court below the plaintiff, after proving the facts above stated, rested his case. On the cross-examination of the plaintiff's clerk it appeared that the defendant said to him that the plaintiff had taken a small article from the defendant, and the clerk, in reply to the question whether the defendant did not take the lines by way of a joke, said he "supposed perhaps he did it in a joke, but he did not know what it was done for when it was first done." When the plaintiff had rested his case, the trial judge said: "If the defendant will make a tender of these lines now, I will dismiss this case upon the ground de minimis non curat lex." The defendant thereupon tendered the lines to the plaintiff, and the court dismissed the jury from the further consideration of it. This disposition of the case is the error complained of in this court. The trial judge acted upon the idea that the conduct of the defendant was intended as a joke, and that the matter involved was too insignificant to claim the attention of the court. If the defendant relied upon the fact that he removed the lines by way of a joke, it was a question for the jury to decide whether the parties had been perpetrating practical jokes upon each other in such a way that the defendant had a right to believe that the plaintiff would accept this act as a joke. That question could not legally be taken from the jury, and settled by the court; nor, in my judgment, was the maxim de minimis non curat lex applicable to this case. In Seneca Road Co. v. Auburn & R. R. Co., 5 Hill, 175, Mr. Justice Cowen said this maxim is never applied to the positive and wrongful invasion of another's property. The right to maintain an action for the value of property, however small, of which the owner is wrongfully deprived, is never denied. A trespass upon lands is actionable, although the damage to the owner is inappreciable. The celebrated Six Carpenters' Case, reported in 8 Coke, 439, involved a trifling sum. But as the case in hand stood at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, I am not prepared to say that a verdict for substantial damages would not have been justifiable.

In my opinion, the trial court erred in dismissing this case, and the judgment below should, therefore, be reversed.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the A Circuit Court for Douglas County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a contract for the erection of a crematory. Affirmed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

This action was brought upon a contract made between one McCann and the village of Superior, organized under chapter 40 of the Revised Statutes and Acts amendatory thereof, for the erection of a crematory according to the Kilvington patent for the destruction of garbage, dead animals, etc. The work was let to the lowest bidder, but prior thereto Kilving-ton, the owner of the patent for building the crematory, appeared before the village board while in session, and agreed he would allow it and its legal successor the use of his patent and improvements as long as it should be operated by it for a total sum of $1,500, and he would superintend the construction if they would pay his expenses to Superior and while there superintending the work; also that any contractor who took the contract of erecting the crematory could have his said patent and services at the same rate; that such facts were generally known and publicly stated both before the board and throughout the village, and were generally known among contractors in that kind of work. McCann, having been the successful bidder, entered into contract to build the crematory according to said patent and improvements for $4,500, upon premises to be designated by the village. On the day of making the contract Kilvington entered into a contract with McCann to furnish the patent, render services, and superintend the erection of Substantially the same decision was made in Hastings v. Columbus, 42 Ohio St. 555, in which the fact that contractors owned a patent which must be used in executing the contract was held immaterial where before the contract was let the city had acquired the right to secure at a reasonable cost the right of the patent with respect to the improvement for any successful bidder for the work so that the bidders were placed in this respect on substantially equal terms.

But in the absence of any such arrangement the fact that one person or company has a monopoly of the right to use a patent in a city where a contract is to be performed is held by the decisions in New Jersey, Louisiana, and California, as well as Wisconsin, to prevent letting a contract which shall require the use of such patent where the law requires municipal contracts for that class of improvements to be let to the lowest bidder. State v. Elizabeth, 35 N. J. L. 351, citing the unreported case of Coar v. Jersey City; Burgess v. Jefferson, 21 La. Ann. 143; Nicolson Pave. Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 699; Bean v. Charlton, 23 Wis. 590, 99 Am. Dec. 205.

The same decision was made in Dolan v. New York, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 397. But this decision cannot be regarded as authority in New York state, as exactly the contrary is decided by the court of appeals. Re Dugro, 50 N. Y. 513.

In Re Eager, 46 N. Y. 100, the objection that a contract for a patented pavement could not be let where the charter required it to be let to the lowest bidder had not been properly raised and so was not decided, but the court held that a single contract could not be let for several kinds of work which could be separately done if some only were covered by a patent.

The decisions in Michigan as in New York hold that a municipal contract let to the lowest bidder is not invalid because the performance of the contract will require the use of a patent. Hobart v. Detroit, 17 Mich. 246, 97 Am. Dec. 185; Motz v. Detroit, 18 Mich. 515.

The same doctrine is also established in Missouri and the fact that no competition is possible will not prevent letting a contract for a street pavement covered by a patent under the charter requiring such contracts to be let to the lowest bidder. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Hunt, 8 L. R. A. 110, 100 Mo. 22.

In People v. Van Nort, 65 Barb. 331, it was held that a provision for letting contracts to the lowest bidder did not apply where the subject of the contract was patented and could be obtained from one party only.

The same rule is declared in Baird v. New York, 96 N. Y. 537, although in that case the court held that the provision for letting the contract to the lowest bidder had been in fact repealed by implication.

But in Worthington v. Boston, 41 Fed. Rep. 23, it was held that the necessity of advertising for proposals, etc., as required by law was not obviated by the fact that a pumping engine purchased by a city waterworks board embodied a patented attachment. This case may be distinguished from the New York cases just mentioned in the fact that the patented attachment was only a portion of the thing to be purchased.

The sharp conflict between the courts of California, Wisconsin, Louisiana, and New Jersey on the one hand, and those of New York, Michigan, and Missouri on the other hand, can hardly be explained away, but in California and Wisconsin the fact that abutting owners have an option under the statutes to do the contract work themselves seems to be regarded as of some importance, while in the Louisiana case the provision as to letting the contract to the lowest bidder was contained in a particular section authorizing the improvement on petition of the owners of one fourth the frontage of the street to be improved while the city had full authority in the exercise of its general powers under other charter provisions to lay the patented pavement so that it was not debarred by the decision from the use of patented improvements.

In Yarnold v. Lawrence, 15 Kan. 123, Judge Brewer inclines toward the Michigan and New York doctrine, but holds that the statute in question did not require in fact a letting to the lowest bidder.

Somewhat analogous to the cases as to patents is a decision in Harlem Gaslight Co. v. New York, 33 N. Y. 324, that a city contract for gas with a gas company which has a legislative monopoly is not within a statute requiring a contract for supplies to be let to the lowest bidder. The court says the other construction would lead to the absurd result of giving a gas company power to extort whatever price it chose.

Also a decision in People v. Flagg, 17 N. Y. 584, that such a provision as to letting contracts for "work" does not apply to a contract for the services of a surveyor which require scientific knowledge and professional skill.

the crematory for the sum of $1,500, as he had promised. A place for erecting it was designated, and the work was commenced. The city of Superior was organized in the year 1889, and succeeded to all the liabilities and rights of the village. McCann continued the work until the 22d of April, 1889, and was willing to go on with it, but the board of public works refused to permit him to proceed to complete the contract; and he had expended and become liable for $2,091.39, and his profits on the completion of it would have been $900. He assigned over his claim against the city on said contract to the respondents, Kilvington and Paden, and they presented it to the common council, when it was disallowed, and the respondents appealed to the circuit court, where they filed a formal complaint on the said contract, and claimed damages, as above stated. The defendant demurred to the complaint. The court overruled the demurrer, and the city appealed to this court, and claimed (1) that the contract was void, on the ground that the village board had no power, express or implied, to contract for the erection of a garbage crematory; (2) that, if it had such power, then the work of building it according to the Kilvington patent could not be let to the lowest bidder in the mode prescribed by law, because it was a patented method, and could not be the subject of competition in bidding for the work.

Dean v. Charlton, 23 Wis. 590, was decided by a divided court, Justices Cole and Paine holding the contract for the Nicolson pavement void while C. J. Dixon dissented and contended it was valid.

The following courts have arrived at the same conclusion as this court did:

California: Nicolson Pav. Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 699 (Nicolson pavement); Louisiana: Burgess v. Jefferson, 21 La. Ann. 148 (Nicolson pavement).

The dissenting opinion of Judge Dixon has been sustained by the following courts:

In Michigan:

The case at bar differs from Dean v. Charlton, 23 Wis. 590, 99 Am. Dec. 205, in the following particulars: First, in this case there were competitive bids; second, the patent was but one third of the cost; third, it would be paid for out of the general fund and bind the city at large; fourth, the owners of the patent were willing to sell, and did sell the patent as proposed; fifth, the plaintiffs are only seeking to recover for materials and labor furnished, and not for the patented article.

Where a city or municipality receives the benefit of money, labor or property, upon a contract made with due formality, or which it had no power to make, and which it refuses to execute, it will nevertheless be liable to the person conferring the benefit to the extent of the value of what has been received and appropriated, unless the contract was prohibited by the statute or in violation of public policy.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The village of Superior was a public corporation created for purposes of local civil government. All its powers "not specifically given some other officer" were vested in its village board. The contract, for a breach of which this action is brought against the city of Superior, the successor in interest and liability of the village, was entered into by and between the board of trustees of the village of Superior and McCann, the assignor of the plaintiff, for the construction, at a designated place, of a furnace known as the "Eagle Garbage Cremating Furnace," with Kilvington improvements, and all processes for consuming by fire manure, garbage, and dead animals, as a means of conserving the health of the city, and of abating nuisances, and preventing sickness and disease. The authority of the village to make the contract is denied. It is urged that the village board had no power, express or implied, for that purpose. Aside from what may be fairly considered within the general powers of the village to carry out the public purposes for which it was created, the village board had express power "to appoint a board of health, to declare what are nuisances, and to prevent or abate the same; . . . and to prevent persons from bringing, depositing, or leaving within the village any putrid carcass or other unwholesome substance; to require the owners or occupants of lands to remove dead animals, stagnant water, or other unwholesome substance from their premises;" and "to ordain and establish all such ordinances and by-laws for the government and good order of the village . . . and the promotion of health, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States or of this state, as they shall deem expedient." Rev. Stat. § 892, subds. 20, 26. The powers vested by subdivision 26 were to be exercised by ordinances and by-laws, and, being for the enactment of general and permanent rules, cannot, it is contended (and many authorities are cited to that effect), be exercised in any other manner; while the powers conferred by subdivision 20 may be exercised "by ordinance, resolution, law, or vote." Section 892. The power "to prevent or abate nuisances"—that which occasions public hurt or inconvenience—is necessarily a very broad and comprehensive one, and essential, if not indispensable, to the purpose for which the village was created. It would hardly be questioned by any one that if garbage, manure or dead animals were found within the village, in the interest of good order, cleanliness, and public health, the board of trustees would have power to abate such nuisances by removing or otherwise making suitable disposition of them. To this end it might provide for destroying them instead of fouling the waters of a lake or stream of water with them, to be again cast up, to the prejudice of the public, or depositing them where they would create a new nuisance. To this end, if a garbage crematory becomes necessary, the board may, within a fair and bona fide exercise of their discretion, contract for its construction, and the village will be bound by the contract. Speaking of the powers of such corporations in Spaulding v. Lowell, 23 Pick. 74, Shaw, Ch. J., says: "They can exercise no powers but those which are conferred upon them by the Act by which they are constituted, or such as are necessary to the exercise of their corporate powers or duties, and the accomplishment of the purposes of their association." French v. Quincy, 3 Allen, 12. This rule has often been affirmed in this state with the just qualification that such corporations may resort to the usual and convenient means of executing the powers granted; that is to say, as applied to this case, that the village, in order to prevent or abate nuisances, might resort to such means as were usual and convenient. Mills v. Gleason, 11 Wis. 510, 78 Am. Dec. 721; Gilman v. Milwaukee, 61 Wis. 592; Bell v. Platteville, 71 Wis. 142; Meinzer v. Racine, 68 Wis. 241. The power to prevent and abate nuisances is an express grant of power, and not an implied one; and "it has long been an established principle in the law of corporations that they may exercise all the powers within the fair intent and purpose of their creation which are reasonably proper to give effect to powers expressly granted. In doing so, unless restricted in this respect, they must have a choice of means adapted to ends, and are not confined to any one mode of operation," and their discretion in this respect cannot be revised or interfered with by the courts, except where the substantive power is exceeded, or fraud is shown, or there is a manifest invasion of private rights. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 91, 94, and cases cited; Benson v. Waukesha, 74 Wis. 32; Kelley v. Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 88; Schanck v. New York, 69 N. Y. 444; Spaulding v. Lowell, supra.

It was not necessary, therefore, that there should have been express power conferred on the village to build, or contract for building, the crematory. The village board might contract for it as a means adapted to the end of preventing or abating nuisances and as a health measure, and so within the general purpose for which the village was organized.

2. Upon the authority of Dean v. Charlton, 28 Wis. 590, 99 Am. Dec. 205, it is contended that, as the mode of building the crematory was a patented one, the contract was void, on the ground that there could not be fair competition in bidding for the work, which by the charter was required to be let to the lowest bidder. Rev. Stat. § 921. The case of Dean v. Charlton was decided by a divided court, and there was a vigorous and able dissenting opinion by Chief Justice Dixon. The Legislature subsequently validated the assessment so held void in that case. Mills v. Charleton, 29 Wis. 400, 9 Am. Rep. 578; Dean v. Borchsenius, 30 Wis. 286, — in which cases the validity of this legislation was sustained. Since that time the direct question involved in that case, which was in respect to assessments against abutting lots for paving the street, has not been before the court; but in Dean v. Charlton the majority of the court, after commenting upon the case of Harlem Gaslight Co. v. New York, 38 N. Y. 309, expressly disclaimed deciding whether the city might not have contracted for laying such pavement at its own expense, under its general municipal powers, which is really the question here presented. In view of the legislation which followed Dean v. Charlton, and the fact that it was decided by a divided court, and the general tenor of subsequent decisions, and the further fact that patented methods and processes now enter so largely into various classes and kinds of public work, we are not disposed to extend the rule of that case beyond the particular point there decided. In Hobart v. Detroit, 17 Mich. 246, 97 Am. Dec. 185, and Molz v. Detroit, 18 Mich. 515, decided at about the same time, a contrary conclusion was reached; and in Nicolson Pave. Co. v. Painter, 3 Cal. 699, and Burgess v. Jefferson, 21 La. Ann. 143, the rule of the majority of the court in Dean v. Charlton was sustained. Since then, in Re Dugre, 50 N. Y. 518, the question has been decided in conformity with Hobart v. Detroit, supra, and other like cases, and in Yarnold v. Lawrence, 15 Kan. 129, Brewer, J., notices the diversity of judicial opinion on the question, and is inclined to favor the views of the courts of Michigan and New York. Baird v. New York, 96 N. Y. 567.

In the present case there was a definite, well-settled price for the patent and specifications, at which it was held and offered to the city and all contractors, which would limit the recovery of the patentee, so that in fact there was free competition for the work and materials, and all else except the patent. The city had the benefit of all the competition of which the nature of the work admitted; and in such cases, where the entire work is done at the general expense of the city, the statute ought not to be so construed as to exclude the city from availing itself of desirable patented works or improvements, as to which there is but one price, and for which there can, in the nature of the case, be no competition, and when, for performing the work and furnishing materials, the advantage of competition is secured. While the rule of Dean v. Charlton may be upheld as applied to assessments charged against abutting lots where the lot-owners have the right secured to them to construct in front of their property the improvement for or in which a patented method or process is used, we cannot see that there is any good reason to hold that the statute applies to the patents, mode, or process, when in respect to all else the statutory requirement of competition is secured. Under any other theory a municipal corporation would be obliged to forego the purchase and use of all patented implements, modes, or processes,—a result which we cannot think the Legislature contemplated.

For these reasons the order of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

F. M. LEIGH, Appt.,

v.

Thomas HARRISON et al.

(.....Miss.....)

Creditors cannot reach the interest of a debtor under a will creating a trust for his support during life and providing that the trustee shall make quarterly payments to him until his death, at least where it does not appear that there is any accumulation of the income over and above the sum needed for his support.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Lowndes County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to compel satisfaction of a judgment which had been obtained by plaintiff against Thomas Harrison out of a fund held in trust for his support. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. C. Beckett for appellant.

Messrs. J. A. Orr and B. H. Lee, for appellees, in support of the will and to establish the validity of the trust, cited —

Pope v. Elliott, 8 B. Mon. 61; Leavitt v. Beirne, 21 Conn. 8; Hill v. McRae, 27 Ala. 175; Garland v. Garland, 18 L. R. A. 212, 87 Va. 758; Jourdain v. Massengill, 86 Tenn. 81; *Lampert v. Per Curiam :

The appellant is a judgment creditor of Thomas Harrison, and has sued out execution of his judgment, which has been returned nulla bona. He then exhibited his bill in the chancery court of Lowndes county against his debtor, and against Mrs. Regina Lee, executrix of the last will and testament of Mrs. Regina Harrison, and trustee thereunder for said Thomas Harrison, and against James T. Harrison, who under the will of Mrs. Harrison was devised an undivided interest in certain lands, the other interest therein having been by said will devised to Mrs. Lee for the life of Thomas Harrison upon the trust which appears. As to James Harrison the only relief sought is partition of the lands as is directed by the will. The will of Mrs. Harrison is as follows:

"I, Regina Harrison, make and publish this, my last will and testament. Item 1st. My residence, and the lot on which it is built, being square 17, north of Main street, in the city of Columbus, I give to my two daughters Regina L. Lee and Mary B. Harrison. All of the personal property, such as books, furniture, etc., in and about the house and on the lot I give to my daughter Mary B. Harrison, except my silver plate, and that will be equally divided by and between my said daughters; and to them I give my lot in the cemetery. Item 2. I give to my daughter Regina L. Lee, in trust for the life of my son Thomas, with the remainder to her, three thousand dollars, and two thirds of my plantation in Leflore county, being the same owned by my husband; and for further description of the land I refer to the deed which vested the title in him; the land to be divided so that the improvements are to be on the two thirds of the number of acres in the tract given her. She will rent the land and lend the three thousand dollars to the best advantage, and use the rents and interest on the three thousand dollars for the support of Thomas during his life, making quarterly payments to him until his death. Then the money at the death of Thomas to vest in my daughter Regina, or, if she is not living, in her son Blewitt H. Lee, Mary, James T., and A. B. Harrison in equal parts. Item 3. I give to my son James T. Harrison three thousand dollars, and the remaining one third in acres of the tract of land described in item 2; the tract will be divided by metes and bounds. Item 4. At the death of Thomas, the two thirds of the place described in item 2 to be divided between my daughters Regina and Mary and my son A. B. Harrison, in this proportion: Regina, or her son Blewitt H. Lee, if she at the time of the death of Thomas is not living, is to have one half, and the other half given in trust to Thomas is to be divided equally between my daughter Mary and my son A. B. Harrison. Item 5. I give to my daughter Regina three thousand dollars in trust for my son A. B. Harrison, the interest to be used by him during his life. Item 6. My daughter Regina can appoint a successor in her trust created in item 2. Item 7. The residue of my estate, not herein bequeathed, I give to, and to be divided equally between, my five children, the shares of Thomas and A. B. Harrison to be held in trust for them, as is provided in the above items. At the death of Thomas, his share is to be divided equally between my other heirs. A. B. Harrison can dispose of his as he wishes at his death. Item 8. I appoint my daughter Regina L. Lee executrix to this will, and direct that she be not required to give any kind of security as executrix or trustee. This will written wholly and entirely in my handwriting, and signed and sealed by me on this, the 27th day February, A. D. 1890. [Signed] Regina Harrison."

The defendants demurred to the bill and the demurrer was sustained, and the bill dismissed.

The question presented for decision is whether, under the will of his mother, Thomas Harrison took such an interest in the property devised to Mrs. Lee in trust for him as that the property or its income can be subjected by his creditors to their demands. It is argued for the appellant that, by the will of Mrs. Harrison, there was conferred upon Thomas the right to the income of the land and the interest on the money, and whatever was given to him will be subject to his creditors. It is contended that the law will not permit an estate to be given to one, to be by him beneficially enjoyed, and yet so hedged about and defended that it cannot be subjected to the payment of his debts. It is also said that if it be conceded that the testatrix might, by apt provisions, have protected the benefit intended to be conferred, she did not do so; and that the provisions of her will in which she directs Mrs. Lee to pay the income arising from the land and the money to Thomas in quarterly payments evidence a clear purpose of the testatrix that he should have such income absolutely and unconditionally. For the appellees it is contended that Mrs. Lee is by the will made trustee in an active, as distinguished from a dry or passive, trust; that the devise is to Mrs. Lee, coupled with an obligation to afford to Thomas a support during his life; but that a discretion is vested in Mrs. Lee as to how and when that support should be given; and whatever remains of the income over and above his support belongs to the trustee; that the provision for the payment of the income quarterly was only introduced to save Thomas the humiliation of having his bills for his support presented to the trustee; and while it would be her duty to make quarterly payments to him in sums sufficient for his support, that duty would cease whenever he should cease to use them for that purpose, and the trustee could thereafter personally supervise the disbursement of the fund in his maintenance; that Thomas could not anticipate the fund or assign it or devote it to the payment of debts, because to do so would defeat the scheme and intention of the testatrix. The appellees contend that there is no reason why the testatrix might not do as she pleased with her own estate, denying that the creditors of Thomas have any just cause of complaint because Mrs. Harrison made such disposition of her estate as debarred them of access thereto; and also contend that the provisions of the will are not unlawful. The industry of counsel for appellant has supplied us with a very great number of cases in support of the proposition that whatever beneficial interest in property is secured to a man may be taken by his creditors in payment of their demands against him. It must be admitted that the decisions in England are almost uniformly in support of appellant's contention, and that in America the decisions preponderate in his favor. But we think the American courts have followed those of England without sufficient appreciation of the radical difference wrought by our registry laws, and the broad public policy disclosed by the homestead and exemption laws of our states, and have failed to observe the difference between equitable interests and legal estates. An examination of the English cases (in many of which the provision for the support of the debtor was subjected to his creditors) disclose that they rest on the following propositions: (1) That the limitation of the use or enjoyment of property to the person of the grantor or devisee is a restraint, repugnant to and inconsistent with the estate granted; and that the liability of an estate in invitum to the debt of the owner is a necessary incident thereto. (2) That it would be a fraud upon creditors to withhold from liability to their claim the estate of the debtor, upon the faith of which credit may have been extended. (3) That it is against public policy that one should be permitted to have, own, and enjoy an estate to which his creditors cannot resort. The reason first noticed, while of very general application to legal estates, has never, even in England, been held to control equitable estates of a certain class, i. e., trusts for the separate use of married women. In reference to such trusts Mr. Perry says: "It was at first thought to be an infringement upon marital rights for a stranger to confer property upon a wife, independent of the husband, upon the ground that the donor of the property, being the absolute owner, has the absolute right to dispose of it to such person and upon such conditions and limitations, not contrary to the law, as he chooses; and as the husband has no rights in such property, it is depriving him of no rights to confer none upon him. Thus it becomes a mere question of public policy, whether rights should be conferred upon a wife independent of her husband. Public policy in regard to the matter has settled down upon the propriety of conferring separate property rights upon married women. Equity has taken one other step in favor of married women, which is not generally permitted in favor of men or unmarried women. In general, conditions or limitations forbidding the alienation of property by persons sui juris cannot be maintained. But courts of equity early sustained a condition or limitation of property upon married women, forbidding them to anticipate the income in any way; that is prohibiting them in any way from settling the property or its future produce for a present sum in hand." 2 Perry, Tr. 646. The equitable rule, then, announced by Mr. Perry, and supported by citations from numerous cases, is, so far as we are advised, universally recognized, and, in so far as at least trusts of this character are involved, it appears that the restraint upon the power of alienation is not repugnant to the estate, nor against public policy, nor forbidden because some third person (the husband,) who, but for the restriction, might have secured a benefit, is by it excluded therefrom. The manifest justice of the equitable rule in relation to trusts for married women commended it for application in other cases, and under its operation trusts for persons sui juris have in several of the states been upheld as against creditors of the beneficiary seeking to subject his interest to their debts in opposition to the will of the donor. Of the decisions sustaining the rights of the donor to exclude by the terms of the trust the creditors of the beneficiary, the following may be noted as containing exhaustive examinations of the principle involved, and vigorous arguments in vindication of the right: Pope v. Elliott, 8 B. Mon. 56, Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 716, 23 L. ed. 254; Broadway Nat. Bank v. Adams, 183 Mass. 170, 43 Am. Rep. 504; Lampert v. Haydel, 96 Mo. 439, 2 L. R. A. 118. It was settled at a very early day in Pennsylvania that limitations of this character were valid, (Fisher v. Taylor, 2 Rawle, 83,) and they have since been frequently upheld, (Ashhurst v. Given, 5 Watts & S. 828; Holdship v. Patterson, 7 Watts, 547; Brown v. Williamson, 86 Pa. 388.) So in Vermont, (White v. White, 80 Vt. 388,) Maryland, (Smith v. Towers, 69 Md. 77,) Connecticut, (Leavitt v. Beirne, 21 Conn. 1,) and Virginia, (Garland v. Garland, 87 Va. 759, 13 L. R. A. 212.) In England the right of the donor to provide for the determination of the estate or interest of the beneficiary upon bankruptcy or insolvency, if there be a limitation over to a third person of the estate or benefit, is recognized and upheld. The denial is of their right to so tie up the estate as that that remaining to the donee may not be taken by his creditors. Cooper v. Wyatt, 5 Madd. 489; Rez v. Robinson, Wightw. 898; Shoe v. Hale, 18 Ves. Jr. 406; Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. Jr. 432. The English rule considered as one in the interest of creditors of the donee, is inconsistent, and affords no protection to them, for the donor has but to provide for the determination of the interest of the beneficiary upon his bankruptcy or insolvency, and, this being done, the creditors take nothing. They could not take less if the estate should be left in the beneficiary free from their claim. Considered as a rule established in the interest of creditors, the effect seems to be to secure to them only the benefit—if it is a benefit—of having a third person take the estate free from the claim, rather than permit the debtor to retain it in the same manner. We confess our inability to perceive how a creditor can be said to be injured or defrauded by the recognition of power in a donor to limit his bounty according to his own will. The creditor has no right to the property in the hands of the donor, and no equity that we can perceive in any disposition which the owner may make of it. If Mrs. Harrison had given Thomas nothing, upon what principle could his creditors complain? How are their rights (if they had none) infringed by any limitations she chose to impose upon the bequest she did make? It must be admitted that the right to make a will is not a natural right, and that no unlawful disposition may be made of the property devised. But what law is violated by disposing of property with a limitation which confines its benefit to the person of the donee? It cannot be said that it is against public policy for a testator to provide a support for a spendthrift child, for the interest of the public is that such child should not become a public burden. Our statutes upon the subject of exemptions indicate a clear public policy that exemption from personal pauperism is of greater concern than the right of creditors. A donation by will or deed, with limitations against liability to debts of the donee, cannot invite to undue credit being given to the donee, for such instruments are required to be recorded, and third persons may by examination of the public records learn the terms upon which the bounty is to be enjoyed. The reason sometimes, if not universally, given, that the limitation is inconsistent with the estate given, presents the most serious objection to the validity. But, as was said by Mr. Justice Miller in Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 716, 23 L. ed. 254: "We do not see, as implied in the remark of Lord Eldon, that the power of alienation is a necessary incident to a life estate in real property, or that the rents and profits of real property, and the interest and dividends of personal property, may not be enjoyed by an individual without liability for his debts being attached as a necessary incident to such enjoyment. The doctrine is one which the English chancery courts have ingrafted upon the common law for the benefit of creditors, and is comparatively of modern origin. We concede that there are limitations which public policy in general statutes imposes upon all disposition of property, such as those designed to prevent perpetuations and accumulations of real estate in corporations and ecclesiastical bodies. We also admit that there is a just and sound policy, peculiarly appropriate to the jurisdiction of courts of equity, to protect creditors against frauds upon their rights, whether they be actual or constructive frauds. But the doctrine that the owner of property, in the free exercise of his will in disposing of it, cannot so dispose of it, but that the object of his bounty, who parts with nothing in return, must hold it subject to the debts due his creditors, though they may soon deprive him of all the benefits sought to be conferred by the testator's affection or generosity, is one which we are not prepared to announce as the doctrine of this court."

In Lampert v. Haydel, 96 Mo. 489, 2 L. R. A. 113, Judge Sherwood, in an instructive opinion, showed that the doctrine that a restraint upon alienation is inconsistent with the estate granted has no application in principle to an equitable estate; that courts of equity dealing with one class of trusts, i. e., those created for the benefit of married women, have uniformly upheld limitations against alienations to effectuate the intention of the author of the trust, and declare that "it is difficult to see why, with a like object in view, i. e., the effectuation of the gift just as the author intended it to be effectuated, such court may not lay down and declare a rule in such a case as this, which shall be equally effectual in preventing the intention of the donor from being thwarted,—a rule which injures or defrauds no one, which violates no rule of public policy, and which gives stability and protection to a provision which originating in the warmest ties of affection, seeks to afford the beneficiary a sure and unfailing relief against the vicissitudes of fortune." The argument in favor of the validity of the limitation impresses us as both sound and conservative. Our statutes against perpetuities would seem to express the whole legislative will on the subject, and to fix the limit which may not be exceeded, but within which restraints against alienations may be lawfully imposed, at least upon equitable estates for life which, whatever may be the rule as to legal estates, either in fee or for life, would seem not to be subject to the objection that the limitation is in derogation of the estate. We can perceive no reason why courts of equity, whose principles and administration give rise to and protect these estates, should not so mold and preserve the trusts declared as to protect and give effect to trusts for improvident and spendthrift persons who are objects of solicitude to their parents and friends. It is not more generally true that married women need the intervention of equity to protect their estate from the avarice or improvidence of husbands than that the unfortunate class called "spendthrifts" require like restraint from the consequence of their own vice and extravagance. The affection of parents may be relied on to prevent the imposition of such limitations except in cases in which the interest of the individual and the public will be subserved.

But it is said that the devise in favor of Thomas Harrison is subjected to the demands of creditors by section 1204 of Rev. Code, which is as follows: "Estates of any kind, holden or possessed for another, shall be subject to like debts and charges of the person to whose use, or for whose benefit, they are holden or possessed, as they would have been subject to if the person had owned the like interest in the thing holden or possessed, as he may own in the uses or trusts thereof, whether the trusts be fully executed or not, and may be sold under execution at law, so as to pass whatever interest the cestui que trust may have; and before a sale under a mortgage or deed of trust the mortgagor or grantor shall be deemed the owner of the legal title of the property conveyed in such mortgage or deed of trust, except as against the mortgagee and his assigns, or trustee, after breach of condition of such mortgage or deed of trust." The effect of this statute is to subject equitable estates to sale under execution at the law; but since the complaint is a proceeding in a court of equity, in which such estates might always have been subjected, we do not perceive that anything can be added to his position by invoking the statute. The statute can have no operation upon the estate of the trustee, nor subject it to the debts of the cestui que trust, unless he has an equitable estate in the property of which the trustee has the legal title. It is uniformly held that, when an active, as distinguished from a dry or passive, trust is created, the Statute of Uses does not apply. It is equally well settled that the use remains a mere equitable estate when an agency, duty, or power is imposed on the trustee to collect and pay the rents, income, and profits to the beneficiary. Mott v. Buxton, 7 Ves. Jr. 201; Wheeler v. Newhall, 7 Mass. 189; Chapin v. First Universalist Soc. in Chicopee, 8 Gray, 580; Garth v. Baldwin, 2 Ves. Sr. 646; Anthony v. Rees, 2 Crompt. & J. 75; Vail v. Vail, 4 Paige, 817, 3 L. ed. 452; Silvester v. Wilson, 2 T. R. 444. Under the will of Mrs. Harrison, it is clear that Mrs. Lee has imposed upon her certain duties, the performance of which requires the execution of the legal estate in her. She is to divide the land in Leflore county, and thereafter rent the portion set apart to her, and collect the rents; she is to lend the money, and use the income arising from land and money in the support of Thomas Harrison. The manifest purpose of the testatrix is that Thomas shall have assured to him an annual support, to be personally supervised and applied to his use by the trustee. It is true that, by the clause of the will directing that the trustee shall make quarterly payments to Thomas during his life, an apparent inconsistency is presented, and it is this claim which creditors have seized upon as transferring the income absolutely and unqualifiedly to Thomas, by reason of which a liability to their debts is claimed. To subject the whole income to the debts of Thomas would be to nullify the scheme of the testatrix, because of a mere defect in the mode of its administration. The paramount purpose of the testatrix was that Thomas should have from year to year a fixed and sufficient support. He was insolvent when the will was made, and when the testatrix died, as fully appears in the bill and exhibit. Mrs. Harrison must be presumed to have known his condition, and to have acted with reference to it. She knew that, unless the fund should be protected from the creditors, a devise to him would be in effect a devise to them, and, for the manifest purpose of securing a support to him, she vested the fund in the hands of a trustee, who was to use the same in the support of Thomas, making quarterly payments to him during his life. The office of courts is to discover the will of testators, and it being found, if lawful, to effectuate it. We are now asked to seize upon a clause inconsistent with the general scheme, and, by construction, use it as a lever to overthrow the whole structure. This we cannot do. It is our duty to uphold the whole will, and, to do so, we should disregard subordinate and administrative provisions, rather than enlarge their effect, to the destruction of the whole scheme. We do not construe that clause which directs the trustee to make quarterly payments to Thomas as excluding the power and duty of the trustee to apply so much thereof as may be necessary to his comfortable support and maintenance according to his condition in life. As long as the fund may be in that manner applied in accordance with the will of the testatrix, it is permissible, for the trustee so to disburse it, but when, and if, either by reason of willful misapplication by Thomas, or a diversion of it by the act of his creditors, the scheme of the testatrix is or may be frustrated, it is within the power and duty of the trustee to intervene, and so control and apply a sufficiency thereof as to afford to Thomas the support contemplated by his mother. There is no averment in the bill that the fund is more than sufficient for the support of the beneficiary. We have, therefore, dealt with the question on the assumption that it is not. What we have said has application to so much of the income as may be necessary to effectuate the scheme of the testatrix. If in the course of time it may appear that there is an accumulation of the income over and above the sum needed for the support of Thomas, such excess would seem to be liable to creditors by reason of the fact that the whole income is given to him, and as to such excess the direction to the trustee to pay it to him quarterly would be absolute and unconditional. We cannot concur in the suggestion of counsel for appellees that Mrs. Lee would take beneficially such excess. The authorities relied on by them are found to be cases in which the bequests have been made to the widow for the education and maintenance of children, and proceeding upon the presumed intention of the testator to supply a fund for the maintenance of the family, and that the widow, as the head of the family, should take the surplus. *Hadow v. MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Charles B. OLMSTEAD, Appl.,

Henry BACH, JR., et al.

(.....Md.....)

A satisfied judgment for one week's wages in a suit brought after wrongful dismissal from service is not a bar to a subsequent suit for wages thereafter accruing under the same contract where the employé continues ready to work and his employment was "at a salary of $50 per week payable weekly" although there was an express provision that the contract should continue for one year.

(November 18, 1892.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Baltimore City Court sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's reply in an action brought to recover wages alleged to be due and unpaid. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. Marshall and William L. Hodge for appellant.

Messrs. Thomas M. Lanahan and Frank Gosnell for appellee.

Page, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The narr. in this case alleges that the appellees, by their contract in writing under seal, agreed to pay the plaintiff "a salary of fifty dollars per week, payable weekly, as a compensation for the services of the plaintiff as a cutter;" the said contract to "continue in full force and virtue for one year from February 1, 1892, to February 1, 1893;" and that the plaintiff performed service thereunder until the 5th day of April, 1892, when the defendants refused to permit him to further perform his part of the contract, or to pay him the salary to which he is entitled after the 9th of April, 1892. It further sets out that the plaintiff is, and has always been, ready and willing, and has offered, and still offers, to perform his part of the contract, but the defendants have refused, and do still refuse, to permit him so to do, or to pay him his salary of $50 a week, "since the 9th day of April, 1892." To the first four of the defendants' pleas the plaintiff joined issue. The fifth and sixth pleas set up as a bar to this action that, after the dismissal of the plaintiff, and before the institution of the present proceeding, he brought suit before a justice of the peace upon a cause of action in the following words: "Charles B. Olmstead vs. Henry Bach, Jr., and Joseph A. Myers, partners trading as Henry Bach & Son, for one week's pay as cutter, as per written contract, week ending 16th of April, 1892." That the written contract referred to is the same mentioned in the declaration in this case, and that upon trial the plaintiff recovered judgment, which was paid before the present suit was instituted. To these pleas replication was entered that the plaintiff "presented and offered himself to the defendant as ready and willing to perform his part of the contract," and "continuously" so offered; that he "did not quit the service of the defendant by reason of the pretended dismissal," but has always been "ready and willing to perform his part; and that the suit mentioned in said plea was to recover his salary for one week under said contract." The defendants demurred, and, upon the demurrer being sustained, and judgment entered thereon, the plaintiff appealed.

The single question involved in this case is whether, under such a contract as is set out in the declaration, the recovery of a judgment for one week's salary, followed by a satisfaction of the judgment, is a bar to this suit for salary for subsequent weeks, no part of the salary now sued for having been due at the time of the institution of the suit in which the judgment was rendered. It was strenuously contended at the argument that the decisions in the cases of Keedy v. Long, 71 Md. 885, 5 L. R. A. 759, and Keedy v. Crane, 71 Md. 895, are decisive here. These cases presented "identically the same defense," and were determined upon the "reasons assigned in the Long Case." Keedy v. Crane, 71 Md. 896. In Long's Case the plaintiff was employed for a year as a music teacher, at a specified salary, payable weekly. She was discharged before the expiration of two months, having been paid one month's salary prior to her discharge. She then sued, and recovered judgment for the value of her services from the end of the first month to the time of her discharge, being a period of twenty days. After this judgment was paid, she brought an action to recover damages for a breach of the contract. Upon this state of fact this court held that "a servant wrongfully discharged has two remedies open to him at law: . . . First, he may treat the contract as continuing, and bring a special action against the master for breaking it by discharging him, and this remedy he may pursue whether his wages are paid up to the time of his discharge or not; or, secondly, if his wages are not paid up to the time of his discharge, he may treat the contract of hiring as rescinded, and sue his master on a quantum meruit for the services he has actually rendered. . . . If he elects to sue upon a quantum meruit, he must treat the contract as rescinded (Bull v. Schubert, 2 Md. 57); and he will not be allowed to maintain afterwards an action for damages, which action is founded on the assumption of the continuance of the very same rescinded contract. And so, conversely, where he treats the contract as a continuing one by suing for a breach of it, occasioned by his having been wrongfully discharged, he cannot be permitted to recover also upon a quantum meruit, when a recovery presupposes the total rescission of the agreement." 71 Md. 890, 891. Inasmuch, therefore, as the suit pleaded in bar was brought by Long on a quantum meruit, and the judgment thereon had been paid, the plaintiff had elected to pursue that remedy, which was founded on the assumption that the contract was rescinded, and she was therefore precluded from resorting afterwards to a special suit, which presumed the continuance of the contract. In the case now under consideration there is no such rescission of the contract, either express or implied. The suit before the justice of the peace was not brought on a quantum meruit. Nor did the act of the defendants, in dismissing the plaintiff, work a rescission. To rescind a contract requires the concurrence of both parties. Franklin v. Miller, 4 Ad. & El. 599. The refusal of a contractor to perform his part of a contract is not sufficient to work such a result; though, if he do so refuse, or render himself unable to perform his part of the contract, the other contractor may, if he please, rescind; such act or refusal being equivalent to a consent to the rescission. 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 6th ed. p. 87 (notes on Cutler and Powell and authorities there cited). The cause of action filed with the justice of the peace, on which the judgment set out in the plea was obtained, was, in this case, for one week's pay "as cutter, per written contract, week ending 16th April, 1892." The recovery, therefore, was under the contract and assumed its continuance. In Keedy v. Long the suit pleaded in bar was founded upon the assumption that the contract was at an end, and for that reason the plaintiff could not maintain an action which rests upon an assumption exactly the contrary. In this case the plea set out a proceeding founded upon the assumption of a continuance of the contract, and for this reason is not within the decision in Long's Case. Notwithstanding this, however, it is well-settled law that only one action can be maintained for the breach of an entire contract, and the judgment obtained in one suit may be pleaded in bar of any second proceeding; but if an "agreement embraces a number of distinct subjects, which admit of being separately executed and closed, the general rule is that it shall be taken distributively, and each subject be considered as forming the matter of a separate agreement after it is closed." Dugan v. Anderson, 86 Md. 585, 11 Am. Rep. 509. So in Keedy v. Long, supra, "we are not to be understood as questioning the well-settled law that, where the contract is divisible, a judgment recovered for the breach of one separate and independent provision does not bar a subsequent suit for a distinct breach of a different condition." 71 Md. 894. Is the contract set out in the declaration a divisible one? In Keedy v. Long this question did not arise. The plaintiff in that case having elected a form of action in the first suit which presumed a rescission of the contract, she was precluded from bringing another action, whether the contract was divisible or not. The court has stated in express terms that what they meant to decide "is this: Where the master wrongfully discharges the servant, the servant has two alternative remedies, . . . and that the pursuit of one of these remedies will prevent the other from being invoked." The agreement in that case, however, differs in some respects from the one set out in the narr. In this case. There the contract was for a yearly hiring, payable weekly; here it is for a weekly hiring, payable weekly. Here the narr alleges that the appellee "agreed to pay to the said plaintiff a salary of fifty dollars per week, payable weekly, as a compensation for services of said plaintiff as cutter," etc., and "that said contract . . . should continue in full force and virtue for one year." The terms of the hiring are entirely distinct from that part of the agreement which provides for a continuance of the contract. As long as the contract continued, and the plaintiff performed service according to its terms, or, being ready and willing to do so, was prevented by the act of the defendants, the sum of $50 became due and payable to the plaintiff at the end of each week. "A contract for the payment of distinct sums of money at different periods is very much in the nature of distinct contracts. An action of debt lies for each sum as it becomes due, and when the sum is paid the debtor or contractor is forever discharged from the contract to pay it." Chief Justice Marshall, in Faw v. Marteller, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 10, 2 L. ed. 191.

With respect to installments of money due at successive days under the same contract, if the action be covenant or assumpsit, the action may be for each successive installment as it becomes due. Bendernagle v. Cocks, 19 Wend. 207, 32 Am. Dec. 448; Badger v. Titcomb, 15 Pick. 414, 26 Am. Dec. 611. In Rodemer v. Hazlehurst, 9 Gill, 204, there was a stipulation in the contract for graduating a section of a railroad for a monthly estimate by the defendant's agents of the quantity and value of the work, four fifths of which value were to be paid immediately, and it was held "that a separate assumpsit arises, and an action could be sustained at each of these monthly periods respectively," etc. See also Secor v. Sturges, 16 N. Y. 548. Here the plaintiff bound himself to devote his time and attention to the business of the defendants, and as a compensation for his services he was to be paid $50 per week. The value of the services were definitely determined by the express terms of the contract, and were due and payable, not as an aliquot part of a year's salary, but as compensation for one week's work. In Dugan v. Anderson, supra, this court laid down a rule for determining in what cases the contract is entire or divisible when it stated that "courts must be guided by a respect to general convenience, and by the good sense and reasonableness of the particular case." Applying this rule, we think this contract is a hiring by the week, and that each week's work was to be paid as the party earned it, and that by another and independent stipulation it was further agreed that the contract should continue in force for one year; or, in other words, that the defendants would give the plaintiff work for a full year, and pay for it on the terms stated. "A severable contract," says Judge Story, "is a contract the consideration of which is, by its terms, susceptible of apportionment on either side, so as to correspond to the unascertained consideration on the other side; as a contract to pay a person the worth of his services so long as he will do certain work." 1 Story, Cont. (ed. 1847) § 21; Perkins v. Hart, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 251, 6 L. ed. 467.

The contract being divisible, and the suit before the justice of the peace being founded upon a continuance of it, the full measure of damages the plaintiff was entitled to recover therein was the one week's wages due at the time it was brought. It is true, the plaintiff possibly could have brought an action for an entire breach of the contract, claiming that "the eventual non-performance may therefore, by anticipation, be treated as a cause of action." This is what was attempted in Dugan v. Anderson, supra, under the authority of Hochster v. Delatour, 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 157, but the court did not then find it necessary to determine that question. Or he might have waited until all the installments were due, and included them in a single suit. But he was not bound to do either. He had the right to treat the contract as still subsisting, and could maintain an action for each installment as it fell due. It has been so held in the following cases: Isaacs v. Davies, 68 Ga. 169; Armfield v. Nash, 31 Miss. 861; Colburn v. Woodworth, 31 Barb. 831; Thompson v. Wood, 1 Hilt. 97; Fowler v. Armour, 24 Ala. 199.

Being of opinion that the fifth and sixth pleas do not present a sufficient defense, the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer, and the judgment must accordingly be reversed.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful ejection of plaintiff from defendant's train. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bronaugh, McArthur, Fenton & Bronaugh, for appellant:

Statements made by an agent relating to a transaction are admissible only when part of such transaction, and when relevant to the issues made.

A written contract made by a carrier to transport a particular person for a single fare over its road and other connecting roads, and to furnish such transportation as one passage, upon certain written conditions and at a reduced rate, is an entire contract as to such person and as to each road, and such passage can be demanded only by such person, upon his showing that he is the contracting party. Messrs. McGinn, Sears & Simon, for respondent:

The cause of action is clearly for trespass in ejecting respondent from the train.

An allegation merely that the appellant, at specified time and place, assaulted respondent, would have sufficed to found a recovery upon. Superfluous allegations vitiate nothing.

The contract was entire as to a passage over the line of each road, which, when begun, must be completed. It was severable as between the different roads. It was a distinct contract as to each road. It follows, therefore, that it was assignable, in the absence of any prohibition thereon, though there is no evidence that the ticket was ever purchased by one other than respondent.

When the ticket was tendered on the train by respondent, Blue, in the line of his duty, was required to accept or reject. He was also required to assign the grounds of his rejection of the ticket tendered, and no other objections than those named could be employed afterwards.

Hill's Or. And. Laws, § 854.

Lord, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to recover damages from the defendant for ejecting the plaintiff from his car. The judgment was for the plaintiff, from which the defendant has brought this appeal. As appears from the evidence, the ground upon which the defendant ejected plaintiff from his car was that he was not the original purchaser of the ticket upon which he claimed the right to ride on his car from Portland to San Francisco. With the exception hereafter noted, the ticket was as follows:

On its back was stamped these words: "Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, April 8, 1891, Columbus Ohio, City Ticket Office." The evidence shows that the plaintiff bought this ticket on the 20th day of April, 1891, in Seattle, for $12, and there signed it; that he was not in Columbus, Ohio, on the 8th day of April, 1891, when the ticket purports to have been issued; that the ticket is just as it was when plaintiff bought it, with the exception of his signature, and the coupon slip, entitling him to ride from Seattle to Portland, which the conductor detached during his passage between these places, on the 20th of April, 1891; that the plaintiff went aboard of defendant's cars at Portland on the night of the 21st of April, 1891, in continuation of his journey to San Francisco, and that soon after the train started, and when only a short distance from Portland, Mr. Blue, the ticket inspector, demanded to see the plaintiff's ticket, which he produced and handed to him, it being the same ticket as the above, who, after examining it and requiring the plaintiff to write his name on the back of it, informed the plaintiff that he was not the original purchaser of the ticket, and that he must pay his fare or get off of the train, and at the same time put the ticket in his pocket, and refused to return it to the plaintiff, when he subsequently demanded it before leaving the train; that the plaintiff, finding when the train reached Oregon City that force would be used to expel him unless he paid his fare, and not having sufficient money for that purpose, got off of the train, and came back to Portland the next day.

Substantially upon this state of facts the trial court charged the jury, in effect, that "if the plaintiff was in possession of the ticket within the time limited upon its face when it should be used, and went on board of the cars of the defendant, and presented this ticket as an evidence of his right to ride, and he was put off the car upon the ground that he was not the original purchaser of the ticket, then the expulsion of the plaintiff from the car was wrongful, and the plaintiff would have a right to recover;" that "the holder of the ticket was not precluded from transferring it to another at the end of any particular section of this journey, which the ticket indicated that the holder might perform, and that there was no prohibition in law or in fact against the transfer of such ticket as this, at the end of any particular part of the journey indicated by the coupons which made up the ticket originally, and it was no valid objection to this man's riding upon the train that he was a different person from the person to whom the ticket was originally delivered when first purchased;" that "if there had been a stipulation on the face of this contract that the ticket was not transferable, the rule would have been different. That would be a valid and sufficient contract, and the party taking the ticket would be bound by it, and, if not, the original purchaser would have no reason to complain, if put off the train."

While there are some other assignments of error arising out of exceptions taken to the evidence, and to other instructions of the court, some of which include the same objection, and to which we shall presently advert, the main ground of contention is based upon the alleged error contained in the instructions referred to above. This contention is that the ticket or contract is entire and personal, and not assignable. Upon its face the contract indicates that the ticket was issued by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, as principal as to its own lines of railroad, but as agent as to the lines of other railroads to be passed over, including the defendant company's road. The contract was entire as to a passage over the line of each road, which, when begun, must be completed, but was severable as between the different roads. It was a distinct contract as to each road. Each company, through the agent selling the ticket, made a contract for passage over its road. Between tickets of this sort, usually denominated "coupon tickets," which entitle the holder, not only to passage over the line of the company issuing them, but also over connecting lines to reach his destination, and the ordinary ticket, which entitles the holder to passage only over the line issuing it, there is usually this distinction: that, in the absence of a contract for a continuous passage only, or through transportation, the holder of a coupon ticket is not bound to continue his passage without intermission when once begun, but may stop off at the end of each line for a reasonable time without losing his right to resume it, while the holder of an ordinary ticket cannot temporarily discontinue his passage when once begun without losing his right to resume it, unless otherwise agreed. Hutchinson, Carr. §§ 577, 578.

In cases of this last sort, both parties are held to a continuous performance, when the transportation is once begun, until it is completed. As Walker, J., said: "When the company has entered upon the performance of their contract, the passenger has a right to insist that it shall continue until completed. On the other hand, the right is reciprocal. When the passenger presents his ticket, and the road has entered upon the fulfillment of their contract, they have an equal right to insist that it shall be continuous till completed; that they shall not be required to perform it in fragments." Churchill v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 67 Ill. 893. But in cases of coupon tickets, where the first carrier acts as agent for the succeeding carriers, the contract does not contemplate a continuous passage over connecting lines when once begun, unless such tickets so stipulate on their face, or there are circumstances from which such stipulation will be implied; otherwise the holders of them will be entitled to stop-off privileges at the end of each line represented by such tickets. This goes to show that such contracts or tickets as the above set out are not entire, but several, as between the different roads. It is only entire as to the passage over the line of each, which, when begun, must be completed. In Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Dean, 43 Ark. 530, 51 Am. Rep. 584, it was held that a purchaser of such ticket over several connecting lines of railroad was not bound to make a continuous trip from the starting point to the place of destination, but that, when he started on his journey over any of the connecting lines, he was bound to continue without stop to the point of that line named in his coupon. See also Auerbach v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 89 N. Y. 281, 42 Am. Rep. 290; Brooke v. Grand Trunk R.

Co. 15 Mich. 332. Nor is there anything in Walker v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 15 Mo. App. 333, in conflict with our position. There it was expressly stipulated on the face of the ticket that it was good only for a continuous passage, and necessarily, when the journey was once begun, it required that the passenger should pursue it continuously or without intermission. Hence the court held that the holder of such ticket is not, after beginning the journey, entitled to stop off at an intermediate point, and subsequently resume the journey. In such case, the transit is an entire thing, and necessarily not assignable. As Thompson, J., well observed: "If the contract does not allow the passenger the privilege of stopping off at a particular place, it is still more difficult to understand any principle upon which he is entitled to stop off at such place, and then, instead of resuming the journey himself on a subsequent train, to introduce some one else in his stead, and compel the carrier to complete the contract by carrying such other person on a subsequent train." Hence the court held that a purchaser of a "train check" issued to another person upon a limited ticket, and expressed to be good only for a continuous passage, is not entitled to subsequently pursue the journey begun by the purchaser of the ticket.

But it is argued that the ticket in question is not assignable, for the reason that its terms purport a sale at a reduced rate. But it is not perceived how that alters the nature of the obligation. The general rule is that a railroad ticket issued without limitations or restrictions is transferable; that the property in it passes by delivery, and entitles the holder to ride upon it. Nor is there anything in the fact that a railroad ticket is issued and sold at a reduced rate to alter the nature of the obligation, so as to affect its assignability, unless it is expressly conditioned that, in consideration of such reduced rate, it shall not be transferable. Nor do any of the authorities cited by counsel hold any different view. In all of them there were words of limitation or restriction upon the tickets which affected their assignability, and made their transfer unauthorized, and not binding upon the company. It will only be necessary to refer to a few of them to illustrate this, and show their inapplicability to the case in hand. In Drummond v. Southern Pac. R. Co. (Utah), 25 Pac. Rep. 733, the tickets were sold at Blue Rapids, Kan., by an agent of the Union Pacific Company, and used to Salt Lake City, and there sold to the ticket broker, who sold them to the plaintiff and his wife for the remainder of the trip to San Diego, Cal. Those tickets contained this condition: "(3) . . . Or, if presented by any other person than the original holder, this ticket is void, and the conductor will take it up and collect full fare." The court says: "The purchaser, when he bought these tickets, knew that he had no right to ride part way upon them, and sell them for the rest of the way; and the plaintiff knew, by the terms of the tickets, he had no right to buy them." In Cody v. Central Pac. R. Co., 4 Sawy. 115, the ticket contract was for "one continuous emigrant passage from Omaha to San Francisco," and, among other limitations, that it was "not transferable," and was signed by the purchaser. Necessarily the court held that the contract was to carry the same person through the entire route, and that the assignee of it could not ride upon it. In Granier v. Louisville W. R. Co., 42 La. Ann. 880, the following agreement was across the face of the ticket, viz.: "This ticket is good only for persons named hereon, and when presented for or by any other will be taken up and returned to the general ticket office." These cases have no application to the case at bar. There are no words of limitation or restriction upon the ticket in question. It vested in the purchaser of it the evidence of his title to a passage over the line of the company issuing it, and also over the connecting lines represented by the coupons. The obligation of such carriers was only to carry according to its terms. These contained no words restricting the transportation to the original purchaser, nor inhibiting his assignee from riding upon it.

The ticket had been issued and the consideration received for it, and in such case, what principle is violated in requiring the carriers to perform the obligation to carry, whether the carriage or transportation be of A. or B., when the parties have put no restrictions upon its transfer? It is wholly a matter of contract, and to be determined upon like principles which govern other contracts. In Hoffman v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 45 Minn. 58, it was held that after an "excursion" railroad ticket had been used by the holder in going one way over the route, it was valid, in the hands of a purchaser from the original holder, for the return trip, there being no condition in the contract to the contrary. See also Carsten v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 44 Minn. 454, 9 L. R. A. 683. As there is nothing in the terms of the ticket in question indicating that it shall not be transferable in consideration of a reduced rate or other thing, there does not seem to be any substantial reason why it should not be transferable and valid in the plaintiff's hands. As the judgment is conceded to be reasonable, if the plaintiff was improperly expelled from the cars, and the object of the appeal is mainly to secure a decision upon the question of the entirety and assignability of the contract, it is hardly deemed necessary by us, nor do counsel urge us, to consider other assignments of error to any great extent. The evidence shows that Mr. Blue, the ticket inspector, regarded the ticket as genuine and duly issued, and that the only objection that he made to it, and the reason that he required the plaintiff to pay his fare or leave the cars at Oregon City, was because the plaintiff was not the original purchaser of the ticket. Both by exceptions to evidence and instructions, it is claimed to be error to have permitted the declarations of Mr. Blue to be given in evidence as to what he said at the time of the examination of the ticket tending to show that it was genuine and authorized originally. These declarations referred to his reasons for rejecting the ticket, and were made in the line of his duty. He was charged with the duty and clothed with the authority of passing upon the validity of tickets, issued like the one in question. When he demanded the ticket, it was for the purpose of inspecting it, and ascertaining whether the plaintiff had the right to ride upon it; he was required in the discharge of his duties to accept or reject it; and when he assigned, as his only reason for rejecting it, and refusal to allow the plaintiff to ride upon it, that he was not the original purchaser, the defendant ought to be bound by that determination, and the implication arising from it that the ticket was authorized originally and genuine.

There was some evidence tending to show that the defendant had recognized the issuance of such tickets as valid, to which exceptions were taken when allowed as evidence, and also to the instructions in respect to it. In view of other facts to which such evidence was allied, we do not think there can be any doubt of its admissibility, or even without them.

Upon an examination of the whole case, we think there was no error, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Elbridge G. YORK, Admr., etc., of Ida M. York, Deceased,

MAINE CENTRAL R. CO.

(84 Me. 117.)

1. The jury may properly find a railroad company guilty of negligence in making a flying switch across a highway from which the view of its tracks is somewhat obstructed; especially where the trainmen saw a top carriage approaching the crossing at which there was no means of warning the traveler, and the tracks formed an acute angle with the highway so that the train came up behind the carriage.
2. The jury may properly find due care on the part of a traveler on a highway who, upon nearing a railroad crossing, becomes aware of the approach of a train thereto, although after seeing the engine and several cars cross the highway he attempts to cross the tracks without looking out for other cars which may have been cut off from the train for the purpose of making a flying switch.
3. The judge presiding at the trial may properly suggest to the jury possible methods of harmonizing seemingly contradictory evidence, although counsel do not allude to such explanation and it might not without such suggestion have occurred to them.

(December 18, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to a ruling of the Supreme Judicial Court for Penobscot County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence, which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and also motion for new trial. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wilson & Woodard, for defendant:

Plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Chase v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 78 Me. 346; Hooper v. Boston & M. R. Co. 81 Me. 260; Allen v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 82 Me. 111.

If an opinion is expressed by the judge upon a question of fact on trial before a jury, the court may, in its discretion, grant a new trial if the opinion was incorrect.

Curl v. Lowell, 19 Pick. 25.

Anything in the remarks or instructions of the presiding judge to the jury, even if it does not constitute a valid ground of exception, can be made available under a motion to set aside the verdict when it appears upon a report of the whole case that the verdict was manifestly wrong and that the suggestions of the judge may have misled the jury.

Stephenson v. Thayer, 63 Me. 143.

Mr. Jasper Hutchings for plaintiff.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of the case counting on the defendant's negligence in running a train past a highway crossing at East Newport, whereby the plaintiff's intestate, a traveler upon the highway, was injured. The verdict of the jury was for the plaintiff, and the defendant has moved to set aside the verdict as against evidence, and has also excepted to one ruling of the presiding justice.

From the evidence reported the following facts may be gathered: The crossing is a short distance west of the East Newport station. The railroad and the highway (from Newport to Stetson) approach the crossing in gradually converging lines, and for half a mile or more before reaching the crossing are nearly parallel. Near the crossing the railroad curves gradually to the south, and crosses the highway at an angle of about 33 degrees. The grade of the railroad is descending all the way. The grade of the highway is nearly level to the brow of a hill about 800 feet from the crossing. It there descends to within about 50 feet of the crossing, where it again becomes nearly level. The drop from the top to the bottom of the hill is about 15 feet. About 20 rods west from the crossing, and between the highway and the railroad, is the dwelling house of Mr. Colcord.

A traveler on the highway going east had a near and plain view of the railroad on his left for upwards of half a mile before reaching the Colcord house. Near that house the view became more or less obstructed by an orchard, the house and outbuildings, bushes, wood piles, and high land, the railroad and the highway both running somewhat in a cut down is the subject of a note to the case next following in which, as in the above case, that question is presented.

the hill. At a point on the highway some 75 feet west of the crossing the traveler could plainly see back on the railroad track some 800 feet westerly.

Such being the situation, Miss York, the plaintiff's intestate, was alone in a top carriage driving along this highway, easterly towards this crossing. The defendant's freight train of twenty-three cars came along at the same time at a speed of about 15 miles an hour. She undoubtedly heard the whistle, and the train coming up behind her. She may not have looked back, but she was clearly apprised of the train's approach to the crossing. She drove on at a gentle trot down the hill past the Colcord house, and presently saw the locomotive and several cars pass on ahead of her over the crossing, and leave the crossing clear. But some 400 feet back from the crossing the defendant's servants in charge of the train severed the train in order to make a flying or running switch at East Newport station. The locomotive and tender with four cars passed rapidly on and the remaining cars followed more slowly, impelled only by gravity and the momentum, and uncontrollable except by the ordinary hand brake. When the first section of the train passed the crossing the rear section was from 100 to 175 feet behind. No necessity was shown for making this flying switch across the highway.

Miss York evidently did not see or hear this rear section, for after the passage of the first section she drove along to the seemingly clear crossing, to pass it. The rear section, however, rushed on from behind upon the crossing causing the horse to suddenly swerve to the right and throw out Miss York, to her injury. There were no gates nor flagmen at this crossing. The brakeman on the rear car of the first section testified to making signs to Miss York of the danger of crossing there; but it does not appear that she understood, or even saw, these signs. There was also evidence of other minor circumstances which it does not seem to us necessary to state.

Two questions, of course, were directly involved in the trial of this case: (1) Was it negligence in the defendant company to separate its train to make a flying switch over that crossing? (2) Was it contributory negligence in Miss York, the plaintiff's intestate, not to look back up the track for possible cars or trains when she arrived at the crossing?

Negligence may consist of the doing an act which a reasonable and prudent man, mindful of his own conduct, and of the safety and rights of others, would not ordinarily have done under all the circumstances of the situation; or it may consist of the omission to do an act which such a person under the existing circumstances would ordinarily have done. The duty to do or not to do is measured by the usual conduct of reasoning, prudent men, and by the exigencies of the occasion. The standard of duty is what thoughtful, prudent men, mindful of themselves and of others, might reasonably be expected to do or not to do under all the circumstances of the particular case. The type is not the very prudent, the very circumspect man, but the man who answers to the popular conception of a prudent, reasonable man. The thing to be done or left undone is what would seem to such men to be suggested by all the appearances, probabilities, and other circumstances of the time, place, and events.

All such circumstances may be undisputed, and in such case the only question is whether the act or omission under consideration comes up to the above-stated legal standard of duty, or falls below that standard, and into the class of negligent acts or omissions. In our system of jurisprudence the determination of this last question is within the province of the jury. Not only is it the duty of the jury to ascertain what was done or omitted, and all the attendant circumstances, but it is also the duty of the jury to determine whether under all those circumstances, the act or omission was up to the standard or was negligent. The theory is that 12 men of the average of the community, conversant with every-day affairs, and with what men do and don't do; more or less familiar in their own experience with similar circumstances and conditions and with the usual conduct of men under them; coming together into consultation from various modes of life, occupations, and points of view, and applying their separate experiences and observations,—can by their unanimous conclusion form the best attainable judgment upon such a question. Twelve men of affairs, such as juries are supposed to be composed of, would naturally have a wider experience and broader observation in such matters than any single judge, however learned.

In some cases, however, the act or omission, under all the circumstances, may be so plainly and indisputably negligent or otherwise, that there can be no need to ask for the judgment of the jury upon the question. As said by the Chief Justice in Lasky v. Canadian Pac. R. Co., 83 Me. 470, when the facts are undisputed, and the conclusion to be drawn from them is indisputable, the question may be determined by the court.

For instance, if a railroad company should make a flying switch across a frequented street in the night-time, without providing any signal of danger, or giving any notice or the approach of the rear section, such an act, measured by the standard, would be unmistakably and indisputably reckless or negligent. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Converse, 139 U. S. 467, 35 L. ed. 218. Again, if a traveler upon a highway approaching a railroad crossing, where there are no indications that a train may be expected, should omit to look or listen for a train, his omission, unexplained, would be so clearly negligent, the court would not hesitate to take the case from the jury. Chase v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 78 Me. 846.

To apply these principles to the facts above stated:

1. The railroad and the highway being nearly parallel for some distance, and crossing at an acute angle, the train came up behind the traveler, so that a traveler near the crossing would have to look back over his shoulder to see what was coming on the track. There was more or less obstruction to the view from a point 50 feet distant from the crossing back some 800 feet on the highway. The highway was a thoroughfare between two towns, one of them at least of some importance. The men in charge of the train saw the traveler in a top carriage approaching the crossing. There was no flagman or other means of giving warning at the crossing.

Was it a prudent act, under these and all the other circumstances, for the train men to make that flying switch at that time and place? Would a prudent man be reasonably expected to do that act, assuming him to be reasonably prudent and mindful of the rights of others? The jury under full, clear, and correct instructions have answered in the negative.

2. The plaintiff's intestate, Miss York, had presumably seen and heard the train as it came up behind her. She saw a locomotive and several cars pass on across the highway and leave the crossing clear. She could rightfully suppose that the railroad company did not permit trains to follow within five minutes of each other. Such, indeed, is the well-known rule. Seeing the crossing cleared by the passing train, she drove on in her turn. By turning her head partly around to look over her left shoulder she could have seen the rear section of cars also approaching the crossing. She did not so look back. Was it contributory negligence in her not to do so? Was there any reason to apprehend the passing of another train, or section of train, at that moment, one having but just passed? Would a reasonably prudent person, under all the circumstances, be reasonably expected to look back? The jury has answered these questions also in the negative.

The question for us now is not whether, in our opinion, this conclusion reached by the jury is right. We may not ourselves think it right, but such an opinion alone would not authorize us to reject the jury's judgment. The question for us is whether this conclusion—this judgment—could be arrived at by fair-minded men by any reasonable inference from the evidence, even though other and contrary inferences might seem to us more reasonable. To set aside the verdict of the jury is to say that the inference drawn by the jury is indisputably wrong; that no such inference can be fairly drawn by any fair-minded men; that the contrary inference is not only the more reasonable inference, but is the only reasonable inference.

It seems to us that the very statement of the case and the question shows we ought not to assume so much. In Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Converse, 189 U. S. 467, 85 L. ed. 218, above quoted, the justices of the United States Supreme Court declared that, in their opinion, the railroad company was plainly negligent in making a flying switch across a highway in the evening, and they declined to say that the traveler was negligent in not looking back for the rear section. In Phillips v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co., 77 Wis. 349, 9 L. R. A. 521, the railroad crossed the street with its main track and some switch or side tracks. The plaintiff's intestate, approaching the railroad, saw a train of cars pass across the street to the west. He then started across the track, and was killed by two cars which had been "kicked" back without warning from the train just passed. He evidently did not look along the track to the west at the moment of crossing. The justices of the court declined to say that the jury drew wrong inferences in returning a verdict for the plaintiff. French v. Taunton Branch R. Co., 116 Mass. 537, was very similar in its circumstances to the case now at bar. The railroad company made a flying switch across a highway as a traveler was approaching the crossing. The traveler (a woman) saw the locomotive and some of the cars pass over the crossing, and then started to cross in her turn, without looking up or down the track, although she could have seen some distance either way. She was struck upon the crossing by the rear section of the train and injured. The court would not say that it was unreasonable for the jury to find the defendant guilty of negligence and the plaintiff free from contributory negligence. For further instances, see Bonnell v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 89 N. J. L. 189; Randall v. Connecticut River R. Co. 183 Mass. 269; Brown v. New York Cent. R. Co. 82 N. Y. 603, 88 Am. Dec. 858; Duane v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 72 Wis. 523.

It is true that a traveler upon a highway, before crossing a railroad, should look and listen for approaching trains. It is usually clear, indisputable negligence in the traveler not to do so, as has been repeatedly held by this court. Chase v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 78 Me. 348, and cases cited. If nothing indicates to the contrary, trains of some kind, or at least locomotives, are liable to pass at any moment, and the traveler should be continually on his guard against them.

But sometimes there may be indications that nothing will pass along the railroad for some minutes at least. The gates (where there are gates) may be up,—a standing assurance to the traveler that no cars or engines are coming. Hooper v. Boston & M. R. Co. 81 Me. 260. The retiring of a flagman from the crossing may inform the traveler that he may now cross safely. In view of the well-known and necessary rule requiring considerable space and time between successive trains, the passage of one train may be an indication that no other will pass the same way for some minutes. These and other acts upon the part of the railroad may throw the usually prudent traveler off his guard, and free him from the reproach of negligence in attempting to cross at such a time.

The defendant's counsel strongly urges that the defense before the jury was unduly prejudiced by a suggestion made by the presiding justice in the course of his charge. It was one theory of the defense that Miss York's horse was frightened by the whistle and first approach of the train, and became unmanageable from the beginning, and, before she could get him under control, threw her out. This theory was based on the testimony of witnesses as to Miss York's statements to that effect after the injury, as no one seems to have observed that the horse was unmanageable. The testimony by these witnesses was that she said she heard the train and the whistle, and the horse heard the train, and started up, and she could not control him. The plaintiff's theory on this point was that the horse was not frightened until he encountered the rear section at the crossing. In support of this theory there was testimony that Miss York stopped the horse a little way from the crossing, and only started him again when she saw the first section go by.

There was apparently a flat contradiction. If Miss York stopped the horse, according to some witnesses, it was exceedingly improbable that she made the precise statements testified to by other witnesses. An unskilled or unreflecting person might at first conclude there was perjury somewhere. But it was the duty of the court and jury to be cautious of inferring perjury from seeming contradictions. It was the duty of both to attribute such contradictions to mistakes and misunderstandings, rather than to dishonesty. In this case, upon this point, the presiding justice said: "If she made the statements claimed by the defense, to what time do they refer? Do they refer to the time when she was driving down the hill, or do they refer to the time when she started, if she did start, after stopping, and attempted to go across the crossing? It may be possible that her horse became uncontrollable after she stopped, if she did stop, and when she attempted to cross the track near the detached portion of the train."

This language was a suggestion of a possible explanation of a seeming contradiction,—a suggestion of a possible harmony in the facts consistent with the integrity of all the witnesses. It was a suggestion that Miss York might have stopped her horse, as testified by some witnesses, and yet have said to the other witnesses that her horse was frightened.

The defendant's counsel contends that this explanation—this possible harmony—was not suggested by anything in the evidence, and would not have occurred to the jury had it not been suggested by the presiding justice. He further contends that, as the plaintiff's counsel did not allude to any such explanation, nor make any such point, it was improper for the presiding justice of his own motion to make the point and suggest the explanation.

We think the explanation—the possible harmony—would occur to a skilled, reflecting mind in analyzing and comparing the different parts of the evidence. From what other source than the evidence could it have come to the presiding justice? We also think the presiding justice, in communicating the suggestion or thought to the jury, was clearly within the limits of his official power and duty. A judge presiding in a court of justice occupies a far higher position and has vastly more important duties than those of an umpire. He is not merely to see that a trial is conducted according to certain rules, and leave each contestant free to win what advantage he can from the slips and oversights of his opponent. He is sworn to "administer right and justice." He should make the jury understand the pleadings, positions, and contentions of the litigants. He may state, analyze, compare, and explain evidence. He may aid the jury by suggesting presumptions and explanations, by pointing out possible reconciliations of seeming contradictions, and possible solutions of seeming difficulties. He should do all such things as in his judgment will enable the jury to acquire a clear understanding of the law and the evidence, and form a correct judgment. He is to see that no injustice is done. If a valid defense is disclosed by the evidence, and is admissible under the pleadings, and yet escapes the notice of the defendant's counsel, that defense should be stated to the jury by the presiding justice. If the plaintiff's counsel omits to comment upon or urge an answer to a defense, which answer is disclosed by the evidence and is available under the pleadings, the presiding justice may properly call attention to it. He should so conduct the trial that no truth is overlooked, and no right is forgotten.

To do all these things he must necessarily have a large discretion. Such discretion must exist somewhere, and the law lodges it with the presiding justice of the court. It is a part of his official power, for the proper exercise of which he is responsible to the people.

Motion and exception overruled.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

KENTUCKY CENTRAL R. CO., Appt.,
v.

Austin K. SMITH.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Extraordinary care must be shown by a railroad company in the use of its tracks on one of the principal streets of a city which is constantly used for street travel and in which there are three tracks, in order to exempt it from liability for injuring travelers on the street.

2. Negligence of a railroad company in making a flying switch across one of the principal streets without any

NOTE.—Negligence of railroad company in respect to flying switches or detached cars moving by their own momentum.

Making a flying switch across a street in a town along which people are constantly accustomed to travel is negligence. Alabama v. R. Co., 7 Sumners, 68 Miss. 566; Fulmer v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 68 Miss. 355; Drain v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 95 Mo. 574; O'Connor v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 94 Mo. 150; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Baches, 55 Ill. 379; *Chicago & A. R. Co. v. v. Dignan, 56 Ill. 487; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Hammer, 72 Ill. 347; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hedger, 106 Ind. 398; Ferguson v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 63 Wis. 145; *Louisville, N. A. & C. R. In French v. Taunton Branch Railroad, 116 Mass. 537, the same doctrine is held where there is nothing to show that the crossing was other than an ordinary highway crossing.

So in Hinckley v. Cape Cod R. Co., 120 Mass. 297, watchman at the crossing or any lookout on the front of the cars, which are being pushed by an engine 80 feet away, although the bell is ringing, is so gross as to make the railroad company liable for injury to a boy thirteen years old, who is struck at the crossing just after he has got out of the way of a train going in the other direction on a parallel track, even if he was guilty of ordinary negligence and was engaged at the time in picking up pebbles from the street and examining them.

3. Other grounds for a new trial cannot be filed after a motion for a new trial has been overruled and after the expiration of the three days allowed for filing such grounds by Code, § 842.
4. Testimony that the uncle of a boy with whom he lived said he had often warned him to quit playing on railway tracks is inadmissible in an action by the boy for personal injuries at a railway crossing in which the question of his contributory negligence was involved.
5. The refusal of the court to allow a witness on his re-examination to answer a question whether or not he had recovered a judgment against the defendant where, on cross-examination, he had been asked if he had not a controversy with the defendant, sufficiently protects the defendant's rights as against an objection to the question.
6. The refusal to send the jury to view premises at a particular time during the trial and before the close of the testimony cannot be complained of where the place had been fully described and they were sent to make the view at the close of the testimony.
7. The refusal to open the case after the trial had closed on the ground of the discovery of important testimony is not error where the witnesses had been previously summoned, except one who was an employé of the party moving to open the case.

(October 29, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kenton County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hallam & Myers and G. C. Lockhart for appellant.

Messrs. O'Hara & Bryant for appellee.

Pryor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the September term, 1890, of the Kenton circuit court, the appellee recovered a judgment based on a verdict of $15,000 for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by him, and caused, as is alleged, by the negligence of the appellant, the Kentucky Central Railway Company. The appellee, on the 7th of August, 1889, at the instance of Mrs. Spotts, who lived at Eighth and Washington streets, in the city of Covington, had gone to purchase bread at the grocery of one Linn, located at the southwest corner of Ninth and Washington streets. Where Ninth street intersects Washington street there are three separate railway tracks laid on the last-named street.

where the crossing was near glass works in which 500 people were employed with quite a village on one side of the railroad.

And even where the road had little if any travel except in going to and from a county farm it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the severing of a train of cars in the nighttime leaving a part of them uncontrolled otherwise than by ordinary brakes to run across a public highway at grade without some warning by a flagman or by bell or whistle or in some other effective mode that they are approaching constitutes negligence as matter of law on the part of the railroad company. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Converse, 139 U. S. 469, 35 L. ed. 213.

Whether kicking cars across a street is negligence is held in Minnesota to be a question for the jury. Howard v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 82 Minn. 214.

In York v. Maine Cent. R. Co. (Me.) ante, p. 60, the question of negligence in making a flying switch across a highway constituting a thoroughfare between two towns was submitted to the jury.

So in Pennsylvania the question of negligence in making a flying switch at the rate of twenty miles an hour across a country road is a question for the jury. Lehigh & W. Coal Co. v. Lear (Pa.) Apr. 25, 1887.

In some of the cases above cited as to flying switches in towns, the question appears to have been treated as one for the jury. But in every case found it has been determined either as a matter of fact or law that making such a switch across a highway was negligence.

The failure of a railroad company to prescribe suitable rules and regulations for its employes when they make a flying switch is negligence. Rogan v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 98 Mo. 843.

A railroad company's rule against making a flying switch was held admissible in evidence against the company in an action for injury to a person who was struck by cars making such a switch. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Kean, 65 Md. 394.

Where detached cars are running rapidly down grade in making a flying switch it is the duty of the railroad company to have servants upon them in position to give warning as much as if they were attached to a train. Shelby v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 85 Ky. 224.

Signals of alarm from a switch engine are not sufficient to excuse the failure to have a brakeman on the front of cars which are making a flying switch. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Baehes, 55 Ill. 379.

So detaching an engine and running it rapidly over a crossing with detached cars coming behind so that the engine cannot be stopped is the grossest negligence. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. McGirr, 61 Md. 108.

Even to trespassers a railroad company owes the duty of stationing lookouts on cars moving by gravitation where they have broken off from the forward portion of a train. Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 12 L. R. A. 184, 89 Tenn. 370.

Where cars were cut off for a flying switch about three quarters of a mile from the place where the accident occurred and came down rapidly to within 150 feet of the place, where a person was on the side track before the detached cars separated from the train, it was held that the railroad company was guilty of very gross negligence. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Troutman, 11 W. N. C. 453.

Sending a car unattended around a curve at a place where by license of the company the public enjoy a privilege of passage and where persons were likely to be is negligence on the part of the railroad company although it was the owner of

One of the tracks belonged to the Chesapeake & Ohio road, and the two remaining tracks to the appellant, lying east of the Chesapeake & Ohio track. The appellant had a switch on its tracks, the south end of it being, as the proof shows, about one hundred feet from Ninth street. At the time of the injury the appellee (a boy) was about thirteen years of age, and was temporarily residing with his uncle, Dr. Kearns, and, after he had purchased the bread, in order to reach his uncle's house, or that of Mrs. Spotts, who had sent him on the errand, he had to cross Washington street. The Chesapeake & Ohio track was west of the tracks of the appellant, and after he had crossed the Chesapeake & Ohio track, while standing between that track and the tracks of the appellant, he was struck by the cars of the appellant, knocked down, and both legs mashed to a pulp from the feet beyond each knee. Surgeons were at once sent for, and both legs amputated above the knee. It is shown by the testimony, and in no wise contradicted, that the place where the injury occurred on these two streets is in the central part of the city with regard to population, and was used and passed over by its citizens as much as any of the other streets. Both the appellee and the appellant had the right to the use of the street, with the duty on the part of the appellee to exercise such ordinary care and caution as pertains to one of his age to avoid coming in contact with the cars, and on the part of the railway company to use the highest degree of care in order to prevent injuring those who were using the street in passing either on foot or in vehicles. Such a high degree of care must necessarily attach to every railway company when operating its cars on the streets of a densely populated city, and when the travel otherwise than on the cars of the company is as constant as is usual on such streets. The character of the highway, and the travel upon it, often determine the degree of care to be exercised by both the company and the party injured. A greater degree of care must be exercised by the company when running its cars on a public street than is required to be exercised at the ordinary crossings in the country, and when there are three railroad tracks on a principal street, constantly used, as is shown in this case, extraordinary care must be shown on the part of the railroad company before it can be exempted from liability for injuring those who have the same right to use the streets that the company has. It is true the party injured may be guilty of such contributory neglect as to prevent a recovery, and his failure to exercise such care as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise, under the circumstances, may often be interposed as a defense. Whether any such defense existed in this case will be first considered. The train of the appellant was made up of the engine and six cars. The train or engine was running backwards, and was pushing, in advance of it, two gondola cars, and pulling four box cars. The train was going north, and the purpose was to make a running switch; that is, they were to place the four box cars on another track, without stopping the engine or train. While the train was in fact going the ground. Kay v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 65 Pa. 209.

At a place where a railroad company permitted persons to cross a spur track to a warehouse, and had even opened the way for them by shoveling out the snow it is negligence to shunt or kick cars across the path without any signal or any person upon them. Schindler v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 87 Mich. 400.

But an implied license for workmen in a foundry to cross a railroad track for the purpose of reaching a highway does not charge the railroad company with any duty to set the brake or otherwise fasten cars left on its track where they have been kicked past such crossing so as to make the company liable for the death of a workman who is struck by such cars which have started back again when jarred by a passing train. Sutton v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 243.

A railroad company is liable for the death of a boy struck while walking along the track seeking employment in feeding and watering stock on the cars where this is due to negligence in making a flying switch. Shelby v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 86 Ky. 224.

A conductor on the rear end of a flat car making a flying switch, who sees that a person on the track in front of the car is not aware of its approach but has his attention distracted by the blowing of the whistle of a train on the main track, although this was intended to warn him of the detached car, was held guilty of negligence in failing to stop the car until it was too late instead of trying to attract the man's attention by calling to him. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coleman, 86 Ky. 558.

Contributory negligence.

Gross negligence of a railroad company in cutting off an engine and running it rapidly ahead of 18 L. R. A.

the cars following detached does not excuse the contributory negligence of a person struck on the crossing. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. McGirr, 61 Md. 108.

The amount of care which a traveler must take in order to prevent being struck by detached cars at a place where there are five railroad tracks and his view is partly obstructed is a question for the jury. Lehigh & W. Coal Co. v. Lear (Pa.) Apr. 25, 1887.

But it is contributory negligence as matter of law to go on a railroad track in the middle of a bright clear day before a car moving four miles per hour with nothing to obstruct the sight. Woodard v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 309.

So one who goes in day-light with an umbrella over his head directly in front of a box car which would be plainly visible to him if he looked for it is guilty of negligence. Yancey v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 98 Mo. 433.

Where a person was struck and killed by a car making a flying switch in full view of persons approaching the railroad and without any evidence of precaution on his part, a nonsuit was granted in an action to recover for his death. Hinkley v. Cape Cod R. Co. 120 Mass. 267.

Likewise a person fully aware of a railroad company's manner of doing business by permitting detached cars to go down grade on switches is guilty of contributory negligence if he steps on a switch in front of such cars without looking for them. Murphy v. Chicago, R. L. & P. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 661, 38 Iowa, 549.

On the same grounds a new trial was granted on appeal from a motion denying it where a verdict in favor of a track repairer, who after stepping off the track to permit the passage of a train stepped back upon it without noticing the approach of de-north, the head of the engine, or the front part, was south. There were on the train, at the time of the accident, five employes. The engineer and fireman were in the cab of the engine. O'Donnell, the foreman, was on the front part of the engine,—that is, between the engine and the box cars that the engine was pulling,—and was there for the purpose of separating the box cars from the engine when the signal was given. One of the brakemen was on top of the box cars, and another brakeman setting the switch, or preparing to do so. There was no one on either of the gondola cars that were being pushed north to give warning to those on the street, or those crossing it, of the train's approach, and no watchman stationed at the crossing for that purpose. We shall assume that the bell was ringing to give notice to the passengers of the train's approach. The employes on the train so state, and there is no reason for discrediting them. When the time arrived for detaching the box cars the signal was given, and the engine, as the testimony conduces to show, increased its speed to get out of the way of the detached cars; and the boy, being alarmed by the cry of some one as to his danger, stepped back near the track of the appellant, was struck by the car in front that was being pushed north, and mangled as already stated.

He had crossed the Chesapeake & Ohio track on his way with his bread, and while standing at or near the place of the injury a train passed south on the track he had the moment before crossed; so there was a train going south that he had managed to escape, and one backing north at the same time, but on a different track, that inflicted the injury; and it seems to us it would be difficult for one more prudent and careful, by reason of his advanced years, to have heard the ringing of a bell with these trains under headway, or to have discovered that the engine fronting the south was really going north, and pushing the gondolas before it. It is said that the little fellow was picking up pebbles from the street, and examining them, and perhaps he was; but that his life was in peril from the time he undertook to cross the track of these roads is manifest, and one of mature years would probably have met with the same fate; but, whether so or not, if there had been a watchman at the crossing, or even a brakeman on the far end of the gondola, that was at least 60 feet from the engine, this accident would have been avoided. It is true the employes, when they discovered the danger, used every effort within their power to avoid the injury, even to the sacrifice of their own lives; and it may be said that the company, by reason of its neglect in not having watchmen at these crossings, or in making running or flying switches in the streets of a densely populated city, is the cause of this injury, and not those who perhaps exercised all the caution they could exercise with the employes assigned to this train.

It is an improper use of the streets of a city to so use them by railroad tracks and trains as to prevent the use of the streets for ordinary business purposes, or to use the streets for the purpose of making wild switching, that must necessarily endanger the lives of those who are compelled to cross or use them. The elementary books establish the doctrine that it is negligence per se on the part of a railroad company to use a running switch in a populous town or city. "The construction and use of a running switch on a highway, in the midst of a populous town or village, is of itself an act of gross and criminal negligence on the part of the company." Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 8d ed. § 466; Kentucky I. Bridge Co. v. Kreiger (Ky.) 19 S. W. Rep. 788. In the case of Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Baches, reported in 55 Ill. 379, it was held that when a running or flying switch was used in a populous part of a city of attached cars following the train, which he could have seen if he had looked. The general term of the supreme court held that he was not entitled to recover because of contributory negligence. Haley v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 7 Hun. 84.

But when a track repairer suddenly alarmed by a train stepped backwards and was struck by cars making a flying switch without warning, it was held to be a question for the jury whether he was guilty of contributory negligence. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Digman, 56 Ill. 487.

The question of contributory negligence in going before cars kicked in the dark without light or warning after waiting for a train to pass is for the jury. Drain v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 86 Mo. 574.

So the contributory negligence of a person injured just after he had seen an engine and freight cars go by, by cars crossing a highway by their own momentum making a flying switch in the night with no light upon the front, is a question for the jury. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Converse, 139 U. S. 469, 35 L. ed. 213.

Where there is evidence that a person struck by detached cars looked and listened, the question of his contributory negligence is for the jury. Howard v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 32 Minn. 214.

It is for the jury to say whether a person on a railroad track who left it to allow a train to pass and then returned in front of a detached section following by gravitation was guilty of contributory negligence where he did not hear the noise of the approaching cars because of a waterfall near by. Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 12 L. R. A. 184, 89 Tenn. 370.

The contributory negligence of a man who in plain sight of approaching cars which were making a flying switch stood holding his team, which had become frightened and had broken loose and while struggling with them got in front of the cars is a question for the jury. Butler v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 23 Wis. 487.

The same is true of a person who got in front of cars making a flying switch where smoke and steam prevented his seeing them. Ferguson v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. 63 Wis. 145.

So in case of one struck by cars detached where he went on the track after the engine had gone by if there is any evidence to show that he might have been thrown off his guard by the passage of the engine. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hedges, 105 Ind. 398.

A person is not bound to anticipate that a railroad company will make a flying switch across a public highway and the question of his negligence in going upon the track where he is struck by a car kicked over the crossing with no one on it is for the jury where there is evidence that a passing train and two switch engines near by were making noises which prevented him from hearing a warning of the approaching car. O'Connor v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 94 Mo. 150.

ten or twelve thousand inhabitants, at a crossing or along an alley used by the public, and the cars thrown upon the side track having a momentum of five miles an hour, from which an injury occurred, the company was guilty of a high degree of negligence, and the fact that signals of alarm were given from the engine employed in the switching, intended for those crossing the track, afforded no excuse. In this case the engine, with the cars attached, caused the injury, and the decided weight of the testimony is that it resulted in the effort to avoid the detached cars, and to make the switching successful. The momentum of the engine, as shown by the plaintiff's testimony, after it was detached, was eight or ten miles an hour, and from that of the defendant five or six miles an hour; the witnesses for the latter stating that the speed slightly increased when the signal was given. Here, then, was the highest degree of neglect on the part of the company, and ordinary neglect on the part of the injured boy; the one scarcely in a condition to judge of his danger, and the other not even exercising ordinary care, when from the facts the highest degree of care was required. If railroad companies are permitted to use the streets of a town or city, others, who have the right to use them, can require that the utmost care shall be used to secure the safety of these persons. This degree of care is rendered necessary by reason of the danger to which persons are exposed who are compelled to use the streets in common with the railway companies. This rule does not dispense with the duty on the part of one crossing or using the street to use ordinary care and prudence for his own safety, and if he fail to do this, and is guilty of gross neglect as well as the party injuring him, and but for which the accident would not have happened, he cannot recover. Ferguson v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. 63 Wis. 145. We have been referred to no authority by counsel in which a recovery has been denied upon such a state of case as this, or in cases where the facts conduce to show such grave neglect on the part of the company. The neglect consists—First, in the company making flying switches in the street; second, in not having a brakeman or some other employé on the front gondola; and, lastly, in not having a watchman at a crossing, to use the language of a witness, used as much by the people in passing "as any other part of the city," with a population of 30,000.

It is contended by counsel for the appellee that the instructions form no part of the record. After the verdict, a motion for a new trial was made within three days, as provided by section 842, Code. That motion was heard and overruled by the court. The appellant then moved to set aside the order overruling the motion to enable it to file other grounds, and that motion prevailed over the objections of counsel for the appellee. Section 343, Code, provides that the motion must be by written grounds filed at the time of making the motion; and section 342 provides that it must be done within three days after the verdict, unless unavoidably prevented, making as an exception the cause mentioned in subsection 7 of section 340. By an amendment, when there is a special verdict, the grounds must be filed within three days after the judgment on the special finding. The object of requiring the motion to be made within the three days is to enable the court to render a judgment without delay, and when the facts and questions of law are fresh in the minds of court and counsel, and it is the evident meaning and purpose of the Code to close the doors to any other motion for a new trial upon any other grounds than the exceptions made, unless unavoidably prevented. Such, too, is a safe construction of this provision of the Code; for, if motions are permitted

It is a question for the jury whether a person struck by cars coming behind her making a flying switch without warning just after a part of the train had passed on another track was guilty of contributory negligence. Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Summers, 68 Miss. 566.

Neglect of a traveler to look and listen for cars at a crossing will not necessarily defeat the recovery of damages for his death by cars sent back on a switch from a train which he had just seen pass along the main track where there was nothing to lead him to suspect that they were to be sent back and the day was so cold that he had a shawl over his head while the railroad employé instead of taking care of the detached cars and giving warning of their movements left them to go wild and remained on the engine to protect themselves from the weather. Phillips v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 9 L. R. A. 521, 77 Wis. 349.

The contributory negligence of a traveler who is struck by cars which are making a flying switch over a crossing without any warning of their approach where the view of the track is obstructed until very near it, is a question for the jury. French v. Taunton Branch Railroad, 116 Mass. 537.

The contributory negligence of a person who is struck while crossing a railroad by a second car making a flying switch without warning just after he had waited for a train to pass and then for one detached car following it is a question for the jury. Brown v. New York Cent. R. Co. 82 N. Y. 597, 88 Am. Dec. 358.

In Illinois, where the doctrine of comparative negligence prevails it is a question for the jury whether the contributory negligence of a person injured by cars making a flying switch is sufficient to prevent his recovery. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Baches, 55 Ill. 379.

A mere child not old enough to be guilty of negligence may recover for injuries caused by the negligence of a railroad company making a flying switch, at least where its parents are not guilty of negligence. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Schmidt, 126 Ind. 290; Kay v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 65 Pa. 299; Schindler v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 87 Mich. 400.

A child injured by cars making a flying switch while crossing the track where the public had no right to cross is not entitled to damages where there is no evidence of willful or reckless misconduct. Wright v. Boston & A. R. Co. 142 Mass. 296.

An ordinance requiring cars propelled by steam power within the city to have a bell constantly sounded and if backing to have a man at the end furthest from the engine, etc., was held in Merz v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 88 Mo. 672, to be valid as to cars making a flying switch with no one upon them although they were on the railroad company's private grounds, these being unenclosed.

But such an ordinance does not apply to the mere setting of cars in a car yard. Rafferty v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 91 Mo. 83.

to be renewed from day to day during the term, the time of the court would be consumed in hearing motions for new trials, for amendments would likely be allowed whenever the minds of counsel suggested some additional reason for another hearing. This court, in Houston v. Kidwell, reported in 88 Ky. 801, adjudged that additional grounds might be filed after the three days, but was careful to say that such additional grounds must be filed before the motion for a new trial was disposed of, and that construction was given with some doubt, it is true the court may as a general rule set aside orders made during the same term at which they were entered, and under this well-recognized rule of practice may set aside the order refusing a new trial, and grant one; but to permit counsel, after the motion has been overruled, to die other grounds, is in violation of the spirit and meaning of the Code. Counsel realized, doubtless, that the instructions given by the court were more favorable to the appellant than the law authorized, as the employes were confined to the exercise of ordinary care, and required only to give warning of the train's approach by bell or whistle when needed, and, if shown to have been given, would have exempted the company from responsibility. The court also, in effect, said to the jury that if the appellee was guilty of negligence he could not recover, if but for the negligence the injury would not have been sustained, unless the appellant became aware of the danger, and the exercise of ordinary care would have avoided the injury. This boy was only required to exercise that degree of care which an ordinarily prudent child of his age would have exercised, and, if he exposed himself to danger in such a manner as that the injury could not be avoided by the defendant by the exercise of proper care to prevent it, no recovery should be had; but if the child was on the street or crossing where it had the right to be, and was injured by reason of the gross neglect of the defendant, although guilty himself of ordinary neglect looking to one of his age, a recovery must necessarily follow. So the instructions could not be complained of, if in the record.

There were some objections made to the action of the court during the progress of the trial that will not be considered, as there was no abuse of discretion and no harm resulting from such action. The appellant offered to prove by a witness that, at the time the legs of the appellee were amputated, Dr. Kearns, the uncle of the plaintiff, said: "He had often warned plaintiff to quit playing on the railway tracks at the place where the accident happened." This offer was refused for two reasons: Dr. Kearns could himself have testified, and, besides, it was incompetent. The boy was then under the influence of morphine, and, if not, it was incompetent, as it could not have affected the result, and in no wise lessened the care to be exercised by the appellant, or increased that to be exercised by the appellee. A witness was asked, on cross-examination by defendant's counsel, if he did not then have a controversy with the defendant, or was hostile to it; and, when re-examined by the plaintiff's counsel, was asked if he had not recovered a judgment for $12,500. The question was objected to, and the court refused to allow the witness to answer, and thereupon counsel for the defense moved to set aside the swearing of the jury, and the motion was overruled. The court, it seems to us, fully protected the rights of the defense in requiring the witness not to answer.

There was an objection and an exception taken to the action of the court in refusing to send the jury to view the premises at a particular time during the trial, and before the testimony closed. The court refused to do this, but at the close of the testimony sent the jury to view the premises. The place of the injury had been fully described by the witnesses. No misconduct is alleged to have taken place on the part of the jury. Facts constituting the neglect have been clearly established, and we perceive no reason for reversing the cause on that ground. Some affidavits were filed showing the importance of other testimony discovered after the trial had closed; and it appearing that these witnesses had been previously summoned, except one who was an employe of the company, the court refused to open the case. There was no error in this regard.

The judgment is affirmed.

WABASH WESTERN R. CO., Reopt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. An inchoate right of dower is destroyed by a voluntary conveyance executed by the husband alone without payment of any consideration, or a right of way to a railroad company to be used only for railroad purposes, as this constitutes a dedication of the land to a public use.

2. The common consent and opinion of the legal profession as shown by their practice for a long period of time is very good evidence of what the law is.

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Chariton County in favor of defendant in an action for the enforcement of a claim to dower. Affirmed.

Statement by Sherwood, Ch. J.:

The plaintiff by her petition herein claims

NOTE.—The very full discussion by the court of the authorities on the subject of inchoate dower in premises taken for public use, and especially the decision as to the effect of a voluntary conveyance for such purpose, are of unusual interest. See note to the case next following as to power of husband or his creditors to defeat wife's dower right.

dower in a strip of ground 100 feet wide and 275 rods long, which the defendant company occupies as a right of way, and as incident to such claim she asks damages because of being deforced of her dower; this is, in substance, the first count of her petition. The second count of the petition seeks to recover damages by reason of the railroad of the defendant dividing the farm into irregular parcels, thereby impairing its value, and by reason of embankments thrown up in the building of the railroad, whereby about fifty acres of said land were rendered wholly untillable and worthless. The cause was tried on the following agreed statement of facts: "The plaintiff is the widow of Jacob M. Venable, to whom she was lawfully married in 1846, and with whom she lived as his wife until his death, in 1883. During the coverture of plaintiff, on the 19th day of October, 1865, her husband, then lawfully seized in fee of the lands described in the petition, executed, acknowledged, and delivered to the North Missouri Railroad Company a deed, now duly recorded, conveying to said company 'the right of way for the construction, operation, and use of the west branch of the North Missouri Railroad over and through any land owned by him in the county of Chariton, in said state, the same being situate in sections ten, fourteen, eleven, and fifteen, township fifty-three, range nineteen, the said right of way to have the extent of one hundred feet in width through said lands, or as much more as may be necessary for the actual construction and operation of said railroad, according to the nature of the ground,' upon the following condition: 'To have and to hold the same unto the said North Missouri Railroad Company, their successors and assigns, as long as the same shall be required and used for the purposes of a railroad, and no longer, the said right of way to be confined to that part of said land south of the farm on the same.' The plaintiff never joined her husband in the execution of said conveyance, and has not since released or relinquished her right of dower in said land. The North Missouri Railroad Company was at the time and prior to the execution of said deed a railroad corporation, duly organized and chartered under the laws of the state of Missouri, and as such then had lawful authority to construct a railroad from St. Louis to Kansas City, through Chariton county. The North Missouri Railroad Company had a right to acquire a right of way for its railroad either by voluntary conveyance or by condemnation. The conveyance above described was the only one executed by plaintiff's husband, and no condemnation proceedings were ever instituted for acquiring a right of way over the said lands. Immediately after the execution and delivery of said deed, the North Missouri Railroad took possession of the strip of land described in the petition, and constructed and operated thereon a line of railway. The defendant has succeeded to all the right, title, interest, and estate of the said North Missouri Railroad Company in said lands, as fully and completely as the same was originally conveyed by plaintiff's husband to said North Missouri Railroad Company. The defendant is a railroad corporation, organized under the laws of Missouri on the 30th day of September, 1887, and has since that date been in the exclusive possession of a strip of land described in the petition, and has maintained thereon the roadbed and embankments constructed by said North Missouri Railroad Company, and operated its trains thereon. The consideration of one dollar recited in the deed was never paid, nor were any damages ever paid to plaintiff's husband for the injury, if any, done the remainder of said lands by the construction and maintenance of its said line of railway. Plaintiff's husband was seized in fee and was in possession of all of said lands described in the petition at the time of his death, except the strip now held and used by defendant, as aforesaid. Said lands constitute one farm or plantation, whereon his dwelling-house was situated, and where he resided with his family at the time of his death. Plaintiff, his widow, by herself and her tenants, has ever since remained in possession of said dwelling-house and farm. No dower has ever been assigned said widow in any of the lands described in the petition. The embankment complained of in the second count of plaintiff's petition was constructed by the North Missouri Railroad Company in the early part of 1866, more than twenty years before the institution of this suit. Said embankment was, when so first constructed, and has ever since remained, a permanent structure, and no change has ever been made in said embankment since its first construction aforesaid. This action was instituted by the widow in 1888."

Messrs. A. W. Mullens, Thomas Elliott, and Crawley & Son for appellant.

Messrs. F. W. Lehmann and George S. Grover, for respondent:

A dedication of lands to public use is tantamount to an appropriation of lands to public use in right of eminent domain.

The owner of land, as intended by the statutes of Missouri, who may make voluntary relinquishment of the land to the uses of a railroad, and who is to be compensated for the land taken in case condemnation proceedings became necessary, is a person having a vested interest in the land.

Mo. Stat. § 4525; Mo. Const. § 21.

The right of eminent domain exists in the government or in the people in their sovereign capacity, and they may resume possession of private property whenever the public safety, interest or expediency requires it, as where land is needed for a road or other public improvement.

Beekman v. Saratoga & S. R. Co. 3 Paige, 45, 13 L. ed. 50, 23 Am. Dec. 679; Com. v. Erie R. Co. 62 Pa. 286, 1 Am. Rep. 399.

The necessary existence of this right creates a fair presumption that the state, in granting the land to individual citizens, does it with this reserve implied.

Harding v. Goodlett, 8 Yerg. 40, 24 Am. Dec. 546.

The state may exercise its power of eminent domain either directly or by delegation.

The extent of the power and the condition upon which it may be exercised are in either case the same.

No distinction can be made between a dedication or grant to a railroad company and one made to any other public agent or agency, or to the public direct.

Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Sutor, 56 Tex. 496.

It would not be necessary to make a married woman having an inchoate interest in the lands of her husband a party to the condemnation proceeding.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 285; State v. Easton & A. R. Co. 36 N. J. L. 181; Parks v. Boston, 15 Pick. 198.

The enactment, whether that of the charter or that of the general statute providing that we might acquire right-of-way by voluntary relinquishment of the owner, had the effect to subordinate the wife's right of dower thereto. For it has been held in this state, as in many others, that the inchoate right of dower is subject to change by legislative enactment.

Kennerly v. Missouri Ins. Co. 11 Mo. 204.

Sherwood, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The first and the controlling question the record presents is whether the plaintiff is entitled to demand dower in the defendant company's right of way. Touching the validity of such a demand in circumstances similar to those here related, an author of recognized authority says: "(1) In the time of Henry III., the Great Charter of King John was so amended as to withhold from the widow the privilege of quarantine in the castle of her husband. 'This,' says Lord Coke, 'is intended of a castle that is warlike, and maintained for the necessary defense of the realm, and not for a castle in name maintained for habitation of the owner.' Although the language of the Great Charter appears to be limited, in this particular, to the quarantine of the widow, it is nevertheless laid down, by the same author above quoted, that a castle necessary to the public defense is not subject to dower. 'Of a castle that is maintained for the necessary defense of the realm, a woman shall not be endowed, because it ought not to be divided, and the public shall be preferred before the private. But of a castle that is only maintained for the private use and habitation of the owner, a woman shall be endowed.' Here we see shadowed forth the principle upon which the courts, at a later day, have proceeded, in holding the inchoate right of dower extinguished in lands appropriated, according to the forms of law, to the uses of the public. (2) The English Reports furnish no instance in which the applicability of this principle to the case of lands taken for public uses is considered, but it appears to have been assumed in the time of Mr. Park that by such appropriation the right of dower was devested. 'It should also be noticed,' he says, 'as the prevailing impression of the profession, that under enabling Acts, such as those of the West India and London Dock Companies the Grand Junction Canal, and the improvements at Temple Bar, Snow Hill, and Smithfield, the wife's title of dower will be bound by the alienation of the husband, although the title is taken by way of conveyance only, and the purchase money is not invested in other lands or paid into the bank. This is understood to have been the opinion of several gentlemen of high professional reputation, in answer to the requisition of an eminent conveyancer, who, on the behalf of the corporation of London, had called for fines from vendors whose wives had titles of dower, and the writer believes that the subsequent practice in the great majority of cases has been to dispense with fines.' In the United States, however, this question, in different forms, has undergone judicial inquiry on several occasions." 1 Scribner, Dower, 2d ed. pp. 577, 578. And, after mentioning several adjudications in this country, sustaining the position that the widow is not dowerable in such circumstances, he concludes his observations by saying: "The rule fairly deducible from these authorities would seem to exclude dower in all cases where lands are dedicated to the public for a legitimate purpose, and the public have acquired a right to the enjoyment thereof, or where they are lawfully appropriated in virtue of the right of eminent domain. The reasoning of the courts appears to apply as well where lands are granted and used for public parks, public libraries, or other public use of a like character, as where they are devoted to the purposes of a market place or a public highway; and it is difficult to discern any good ground for a distinction between the two classes of cases. In some of the states burial grounds are expressly exempted from dower by statute." 1 Scribner, Dower, 2d ed. pp. 577, 578, 582.

When discussing the same question, the learned author of the work on Real Property gives expression to conforming views, thus: "One mode in which dower may be defeated remains to be mentioned, and that is by the exercise of eminent domain during the life of the husband, or, what is equivalent to it, dedication of land to the public use. This grows out of the nature of a wife's interest in the lands, and whether it is such as ought to be regarded in giving compensation. . . ." Then, after discussing the authorities, he remarks: "The principle involved in the above and similar cases is a pretty important one, nor has it been hitherto well defined. . . . It is difficult to see why it should not apply in all cases where the law authorizes the husband's land to be taken in invitum, and compensation therefor made for the fee of the same, as, for instance, in those states where the millowner is authorized to flow lands which he does not own. At common law, a widow cannot have dower of a castle, since, among other reasons, she could not put it to profitable use; and the same reasoning would apply as to lands, though granted by the husband, which have been appropriated to public uses, such as cemeteries, public parks, and the like." 1 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. p. 279. Treating of the same point, Judge Dillon says: "As dower is not the result of contract, but is a positive legislative institution, it is constitutionally competent for the Legislature to authorize lands to be taken by a municipal corporation, for a market, street, or other public use, upon an appraisal and payment of their value to the husband, the holder of the fee, and such taking and payment will confer an absolute title divested of any inchoate right of dower. Nor is a widow dowerable in lands dedicated by her husband in his lifetime to the public, where the dedication is complete, or has been accepted and acted upon by the municipal authorities." 2 Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 594. In a recent work of pronounced merit, it is said: "A married woman cannot claim dower in lands dedicated by her husband to the public. It is settled that dower is created by law, and does not exist by virtue of contract, and that it is therefore within the power of the Legislature to change or destroy the rights of a married woman at any time before they have vested. This rule prevails where dower has been abolished and an estate in fee substituted. Dedication of land to public use is placed upon the same general principle as that on which rests the right of eminent domain, and it is held that the property interests of the married woman must yield to public necessity." Elliott, Roads & Streets, 108. Another author says: "An inchoate right of dower may be taken during the lifetime of the husband, on giving full compensation to the husband. The inchoate right of dower is not such an interest as is capable of assessment. During the life of the husband he represented the fee, and compensation to him appropriated the fee. It has been well held that, when an estate is taken before the decease of the husband, the value of the widow's inchoate right of dower is deemed too uncertain to admit of compensation; that the husband must be regarded as the owner of the entire estate; and that as such, he is entitled to full compensation for it." Mills, Em. Dom. 2d ed. § 71.

It may not be unprofitable to make some extracts from, and citations of, the adjudicated cases giving support to the positions already quoted from the text-books. Thus in Moore v. New York, 8 N. Y. 110, by virtue of a statute of New York, commissioners were appointed to assess damages to "the respective owners, lessees, parties and persons, respectively, entitled unto or interested in the lands," etc. The wife of one of the owners, not having been made a party in the condemnation proceedings, after the death of her husband preferred a claim for dower against the city. The court held: "In the case under consideration, the land was taken against the consent of the husband, by an act of sovereignty, for the public benefit. The only person owning and representing the fee was compensated by being paid its full value. The wife had no interest in the land, and the possibility which she did possess was incapable of being estimated with any degree of accuracy. Under these circumstances, the Legislature had the power, which I think they have rightfully exercised, to direct that the value of the entire fee should be paid to the husband of the appellant; and that the corporation by such payment, in pursuance of the statute, has acquired an indefeasible title to the premises." In that case the property was of great value, and was appropriated for the purpose of a market place. In Gwynne v. Cincinnati, 3 Ohio, 24, a widow sought to have dower assigned her in grounds occupied by a market house in the city of Cincinnati. The husband during his lifetime, in conjunction with other owners of property in the same square, agreed to open a way or street through it upon which a market house was to be erected. It stood upon that part of the square given by one Platt, a space for a street remaining open on both sides of it. Platt, in his lifetime, conveyed the property he owned in the square, and his wife joined him in the conveyance. It did not appear that any conveyance was made of the ground covered by the market house by either Platt or wife. Gwynne intermarried with the widow of Platt, and brought the bill for dower. It was contended on behalf of Platt's widow that she was entitled to dower, because she had not released it by any act of her own. On the other hand, it was insisted that she was excluded from dower by the grant of the land in question to a public use. The court said: "The street, including the ground in question, was opened, and the market house established, by an agreement with the owners of the ground, and under an ordinance of the city council of Cincinnati. The whole space became subject to the same public regulations as the grounds originally laid out into streets, and for other public uses and purposes. The claim of dower must stand upon the same principles that it would stand on in any case to the ground thus appropriated. The counsel for the complainants insist that it is a case to be distinguished from that of public grounds condemned for public uses, but the court is unable to comprehend the distinction. When a town is laid out, the law requires the plat to be recorded, and by such record the streets become public highways, and the title to the grounds set apart for public uses is vested in the county for the purposes contemplated. The uses thus created are inconsistent with the exertion of any private right while the use remains; consequently, all private rights must be either suspended or abrogated. Such has been the general understanding, not only in this state, but so far as we are informed, in other states also. A claim for dower in the streets of a town, or in the public jail, court-house, or public offices, would be a novel one, and, if sustained, could not be enjoyed without defeating the original purpose and present use of the grant. It cannot be admitted for the same reason that it is not admitted to a castle in England. It could yield nothing to the support of a widow, by a direct participation in the possession, without such an interference with the public right to control the whole subject as to render its enjoyment inconvenient and unsafe, if not impossible." In Duncan v. Terre Haute, 85 Ind. 104, the husband had donated land to be used as a street, the wife not joining in the grant. After his death she preferred her claim for dower. The court said: "The courts of this country seem to have uniformly held, when the question has come before them, that when lands are appropriated by the exercise of eminent domain, or, what is said to be equivalent to it, the dedication of lands to public use, the dower of the wife is defeated."

In Minnesota a homestead cannot be conveyed except by the joint deed of the husband and wife, and yet it has been held in that state that where a part of a homestead has been taken by a railroad company under the law of eminent domain, and payment made to the husband alone, the law of homestead would not prevent him from disposing for his own use of the money thus awarded him. Canty v. Latterner, 31 Minn. 239. In Iowa the same rule of law prevails with regard to the necessity of the husband joining his wife in a deed in order to convey their homestead or any interest therein; but, where the husband alone had agreed in writing to convey to a railroad company a right of way across the homestead, it was held that, notwithstanding the failure of the wife to sign the agreement, a court of equity would decree specific performance, the court remarking: "Can a husband grant a right of way to a railroad company over the homestead property, unless the wife concurs and signs the conveyance? As applied to the circumstances of this case, we answer this question, also, in the affirmative. The right of way is but an easement, and does not pass the title, and in this case it does not and is not claimed to affect the substantial enjoyment of the homestead as such. If the homestead was a single lot, and the right of way occupied it all, so as to destroy the homestead or defeat its occupancy as such, the case would be very different." Chicago & S. W. R. Co. v. Swinney, 88 Iowa, 182. With these authorities shedding such a broad light on the subject under discussion, it would seem difficult to stray from the true path of adjudication; and they have been cited and quoted from thus at large, not as doubting the views they enunciate, but because of doubts attempted to be cast upon their applicability to some of the salient features of this case, and that applicability is now for discussion. There can be no doubt, from the text-books and adjudications, that where a railroad is empowered, as in the present instance, to condemn land for public use, it occupies in all respects the same footing as any other corporation or quasi corporation, municipal or otherwise, or governmental agency, when exercising similar authority to obtain land for a market place, for a street, highway, jail, or court-house. The state, in the first place, might directly assert its power, in any given instance, to take land for a public use, or it might delegate that attribute of sovereignty to any chosen agency, individual, or corporation or municipality or county, the right to exercise which but for such delegation could only be exercised by the state alone. In Olcott v. Fond du Lac County Suprs., 83 U. S. 16 Wall. loc. cit. 694, 695, 21 L. ed. 588, Judge Strong said: "That railroads, though constructed by private corporations and owned by them, are public highways, has been the doctrine of nearly all the courts ever since such conveniences for passage and transportation have had any existence. Very early the question arose whether a state's right of eminent domain could be exercised by a private corporation created for the purpose of constructing a railroad. Clearly it could not, unless taking land for such a purpose by such an agency is taking land for public use. The right of eminent domain nowhere justifies taking property for private use. Yet it is a doctrine universally accepted that a state Legislature may authorize a private corporation to take land for the construction of such a road, making compensation to the owner. What else does this doctrine mean if not that building a railroad, though it be built by a private corporation, is an act done for a public use? And the reason why the use has always been held a public one is that such a road is a highway, whether made by the government itself or by the agency of corporate bodies, or even by individuals, when they obtain their power to construct it from legislative grant. . . . Whether the use of a railroad is a public or a private one depends in no measure upon the question who constructed it or who owns it. It has never been considered a matter of any importance that the road was built by the agency of a private corporation. No matter who is the agent, the function performed is that of the state. Though the ownership is private, the use is public."

Judge Cooley says: "Accordingly, on the principle of public benefit, not only the state and its political divisions, but also individuals and corporate bodies, have been authorized to take private property for the construction of works of public utility, and, when duly empowered by the Legislature so to do, their private pecuniary interest does not preclude their being regarded as public agencies in respect to the public good which is sought to be accomplished." "The manner in which the right of eminent domain shall be exercised rests within the discretion of the Legislature. It may be, and in point of fact generally is, effected by a delegation of its power to an agent. That agent may be a corporate body, carrying on a work of public utility, though for the purposes of private gain. . . . The instances of the delegation of the power of eminent domain of most frequent occurrence are to be found in the case of railroad companies, coupled to the general powers conferred by their charters. There is usually an authority granted to appropriate lands so far as required for the construction of their tracks." 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 517, 518, title Eminent Domain. "The grant of a right to take land 'for the purposes of a railroad' authorizes the taking of only an easement, leaving the fee with the owner, to whom the right of possession reverts on the cessation of the public use; and this is the limited interest usually given by statutes authorizing the condemnation of land for railroads. The property is, however, to be deemed taken for a public use itself, rather than for the particular use and enjoyment by the party to whose possession it passes. It does not, therefore, revert to the owner upon a mere transfer of the railroad to another company, nor upon its appropriation to another similar public use." Pierce, Railroads, p. 168. "That the right [of eminent domain] should be placed in the hands and under the control of a private corporation detracts nothing from the public nature of the use; for, as was very correctly said by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Hays v. Risher, 82 Pa. 169, that an individual expects to gain by the use of the way, and has private motives for risking the whole of the necessary investment, and acquires peculiar rights in the work, detracts nothing from the public aspect of it. The same can be said of every railway corporation, and of almost every public enterprise." New Central Coal Co. v. George's Creek Coal & Iron Co. 87 Md. loc. cit. 562. In Oregon C. R. Co. v. Bailey, 8 Or. loc. cit. 175, it was sought to appropriate lands already used for public purposes, and the court said: "It is wholly immaterial upon this point whether such railway company obtains the property which forms the roadbed by purchase or by judgment of the court. The general corporation law, and the Act of incorporation under it, create the corporation and confer whatever franchises or grants are conferred. It is not the condemnation of property that gives character to the corporation. The judgment of the court is a means of placing the corporation in possession of what is necessary to a discharge of its franchises and its duties to the public. But when property is condemned, the corporation has no higher or better right to that property than it has to property acquired by purchase. It follows from what has been already said, that, whether the right of way is acquired by gift or purchase, or by the judgment of a court, the corporation is so far a public agent that what it holds in its corporate capacity is held for a public use."

When discussing the powers of railroad companies, as distinguished from mere private corporations, in the matter of the condemnation of lands, the Supreme Court of Michigan said: "They are the means employed to carry into execution a given power. That private property can be taken by the government from one and bestowed upon another for private use will not for a moment be contended, and these corporations can only be sustained upon the assumption that the powers delegated are to a public agent to work out a public use.

... It is obvious that the object which determines the character of a corporation is that designed by the Legislature, rather than that sought by the company. If that object be primarily the private interest of its members, although an incidental benefit may accrue to the government therefrom, then the corporation is private; but if that object be the public interest, to be secured by the exercise of powers delegated for that purpose, which would otherwise repose in the state, then, although private interest may be incidentally promoted, the corporation is in its nature public. It is essentially the trustee of the government for the promotion of the object desired, a mere agent to which authority is delegated to work out the public interest, through the means provided by a government for that purpose.

... It argues nothing that compensation is required to be made for property taken before it can be used, for this is made by the Constitution a condition to the exercise of this right by the government itself, and the delegation of the power necessarily carries the incident with it. Nor can it be said that the property when taken is not used by the public, but by the corporators for their own benefit and advantage. ... The grant to the corporation is in no essential particular different from the employment of commissioners or agents. The difference is in degree, rather than in principle; in compensation, rather than in power. ... It legitimately follows that the tenure of the corporation is in the nature of a trust for the public use, subject to the supervision of the government, while its franchises are but the consideration paid for the faithful execution of this trust." Swan v. Williams, 2 Mich. 427. So, also, in Texas, it has been held that "the right of the company to occupy with its roadbed Sutor's land depended upon his consent then given or a judicial condemnation. A railroad is a public highway, (Const. Tex. art. 10, § 2;) and especially is this true, so far as the acquisition of the right of way is concerned, for upon no other theory could the right of eminent domain be conferred upon a railroad corporation. In this respect the doctrine of dedication, or rather of estoppel in pais, would apply to the right of way for a railroad, the same as to any other public highway." Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Sutor, 56 Tex. 496.

These authorities, as well as those heretofore cited, show, in the most convincing manner, that the dedication of land to public use on behalf of a railroad company occupies, in legal contemplation, the same place as does condemnation for a similar purpose; both are but means to the same end; both have the same object in view,—for "dedication is an appropriation of land to some public use, made by the owner of the fee," (Ang. & D. Highways, 8d ed. § 132,) while condemnation is but the appropriation in invitum of the land in the absence of the owner's consent. The only difference between them is, the former is voluntary; the latter, compulsory. Both are mere conduits, through which flows the consent of eminent domain. In the present instance, the charter of the original company made either method effectual, and only on the failure of the first was the second method permissible. The prior was indeed a condition precedent to pursuing the latter method, as all of our own Reports on the subject show. It is conceded in this case that, where the purpose is to appropriate lands to a public use, ex. gr. for a street, highway, jail, court-house, or market place, the husband, as the owner of the fee, represents the wife, and that his deed or dedication is equally as effective in barring the wife's inchoate dower as would be condemnation proceedings; but a similar operative effect as to a deed to another public use, to wit, the right of way to a railroad company, is denied. We are satisfied, from an examination of the authorities and from the very nature and reason of the case that this distinction is unwarranted and unsound, and will not bear the test of judicial scrutiny. There is no warrant for the assertion, and there is no authority or reason for the assertion, that one public highway dedicated by deed to public use should escape the incubus of inchoate dower, while another highway, proclaimed by the Constitution of the state to be a public highway and equally dedicated by deed to public use, should be compelled to bear such a burden, unless resort were had to condemnation proceedings. What particular virtue inheres in such proceedings? Why should a judgment which condemns an easement—a right of way over a man's land—do more than that man's deed executed for the same purpose? These questions answer themselves.

Though, in case of a railroad, the land in one sense is appropriated or accepted for the private gain of the particular railroad company, yet the use is none the less a public one, as all the authorities show; and, but for the fact that the use is a public one, there would be no basis laid, in either law or fact, for the exercise of the right of eminent domain, in either of the methods mentioned. Wherever the right of eminent domain exists there exists also as its companion and legal equivalent, the right to accept a voluntary dedication. The two rights are the inseparable and inevitable concomitants of each other. To rule otherwise would be to deny the cogent reasoning of the authorities cited; to rule otherwise would produce these anomalous results. That a railroad company, though ever so desirous of doing so, could not accept a voluntary relinquishment of the husband to lands for a right of way without incurring long years afterwards, upon the death of the husband, the peril and the penalty of a demand for dower consummate and unsatisfied in a right of way for which compensation in full had long since been paid. Under such a ruling, a railroad company would of necessity be forced to reject the proffered deed, the amicable settlement, and be driven to condemnation proceedings in order to cut off inchoate rights, possibilities, and expectancies,—something the value and duration of which the law as yet has furnished no method and provided no machinery for estimating. Such a ruling would be to encourage litigious strife,—something assuredly not favored by the law. Besides, if in the hypothetical case the parties "could agree" there would be no basis for proceedings to condemn, because the essential jurisdictional fact of non-agreement would be wholly lacking; and therefore there could be no such proceeding had, except by practicing a fraud on the court by making an averment in the pleadings at war with the real fact, that the parties litigant had failed to agree.

But it is persistently urged that the case of Nye v. Taunton Branch R. Co., 118 Mass. 277, supports the contention of the plaintiff that her dower is not bound by the deed of her husband. But, after a careful reading of that case, it is not thought it yields that claim any support whatever. The facts of it are few, plain, and simple. Here they are: In 1826 Nye bought the land and secured payment of the purchase money by a mortgage, which his wife did not sign. In 1828 his equity of redemption was sold under execution to Washburn, who conveyed to Newcomb, who in 1872 conveyed the land to the railroad company, who purchased the same for a freight station outside of the location of their road. The deed was in warranty form, and contained no restriction as to the use of the land. In 1846 Newcomb satisfied the mortgage. Nye died in 1878, whereupon his widow sued for her dower; and thereupon it was ruled that the demandant had an inchoate right of dower in the premises at the time it was conveyed to the tenant by deed in common form. Then it is pointed out in the opinion that two methods are provided by the statute whereby a railroad company can take land for depot and station purposes: First, by purchase and conveyance from the owner; second, if the owner refuses to sell, by application, etc., and the assessment of damages: that by the first, if the deed is without restriction, the corporation obtains a fee in the soil, just as a natural person would do, and the corporation may convey the land, when no longer necessary for its purposes, to whosoever it will; but that by the second method the corporation simply acquires an easement in the land, and, the use being abandoned, the easement is extinguished, and the land reverts to the owner of the soil. And upon these premises it was properly ruled that the land in question was subject to the demand for dower. But how different that case is in its facts from the one at bar? First, there the land was simply sold under execution, and so the husband never represented his wife in receiving compensation for his land, and so her inchoate dower was not extinguished therein for that reason, and the land passed to the first and subsequent purchasers, with the burden of inchoate dower fettered to it; second, the land in that case was conveyed by the last purchaser to the railroad company in fee, unhampered by a single restriction and unburdened by a single use, and the railroad company took it just as a "natural person" might have done. Here, on the contrary, the husband represented the wife, received or waived compensation for the land, and only granted an easement, which is precisely just what that company would have gained at the end of condemnation proceedings. For these reasons Nye's Case is not authority in the case before us, and, if it were, we would not follow it, in opposition to such an array of well-considered cases as already cited.

2. Finally, this is the first suit in this state, that we are aware of, that, in circumstances like the present, a suit for dower has been brought against a railroad company. The common consent and opinion of the legal profession in this state has been that it was not necessary to make a wife a party in order to bar her inchoate right of dower, either as to a railroad right of way or other public highway. This, of itself, is a very pregnant circumstance and very good evidence of what the law is. State v. Meyers, 99 Mo. loc. cit. 114; Sedgwick, Stat. & Const. Law, 2d ed. 218 et seq. and cases cited. In a case of the house of lords, under Stat. 27 Hen. VIII., Lord Hardwicke said: "The opinion of conveyancers in all times, and their constant course, is of great weight. They are to advise; and, if their opinion is not to prevail, must every case come to law? No: the received opinion ought to govern." And Lord Mansfield said: "Consider also the usages and transactions of mankind upon the statute. The object of all law with regard to real property is quiet and repose." Earl of Buckinghamshire v. Drury, 2 Eden, 61. In Scanlan v. Childs, 83 Wis. 668, the court says: "The general understanding of law and constant practice under it, for a period of over twenty years, by all officers charged with the execution of it, unquestioned by any public or private action, is strong, if not conclusive, evidence of the true meaning." In Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 143, 9 Am. Dec. 123, the court says: "A contemporaneous is generally the best construction of a statute. It gives the sense of a community; of the terms made use of by a Legislature. If there is ambiguity in the language, the understanding and application of it, when the statute first comes into operation, sanctioned by long acquiescence on the part of the Legislature and judicial tribunals, is the strongest evidence that it has been rightly explained in practice." For reasons already given, it is unnecessary to pass upon the grounds alleged for recovery in the second count in the petition.

The judgment of the lower court should be affirmed.

George N. FLOWERS, Individually and as Exr. of John Y. Flowers, Deceased, Ptff.
vs.
Err.,

v.

Catherine FLOWERS.

(.....Ga.....)

1. There being in this state no statute inhibiting the sale of land by the husband to defeat his wife's right of dower, save as to lands to which the title came through her, an actual sale and conveyance, though made for the purpose of defeating dower, will be upheld in favor of the purchaser against the widow's claim after her husband's death. But a mere colorable sale and conveyance, not intended by the parties to be real and operative except as a means of dividing the lands among the children of the husband after his death, he in the mean time to be the real while the grantee in his conveyance is to be the nominal and formal, owner, will leave the husband seised, so far as the dower right is concerned; and his widow,
*Headnotes by SIMMONS, J.

after his death, may claim dower, and have it assigned, notwithstanding such colorable and pretended conveyance made by the husband.

2. In the present case the right to dower turns upon the question of a real, as distinguished from a mere colorable, sale and conveyance, and not upon the payment or nonpayment of the purchase money in the lifetime of the husband. If the sale was real, and the purchase money was really due and owing by the purchaser as a bona fide debt against him, the dower would be as effectually barred as if all the purchase money had been paid.

3. As the husband had a legal right to intend the defeat of dower and to effectuate the intention, provided he did it by an actual and real conveyance, his will, subsequently executed, in which he made no provisions whatever for his wife, would throw no light on the present controversy which is simply whether the conveyance was real or only colorable and pretended.

4. As tending to show a motive for endeavoring to defeat dower without parting with dominion and real ownership, evidence of family disturbances between the husband and NOTE.—Power of husband, or his creditors, to defeat wife's right of dower.

Dower is an incident of the marriage relation, established by positive institutions of the country, and not by contract. Moore v. New York, 8 N. Y. 110, 59 Am. Dec. 473.

It is a legal maxim that "dower is a favorite of the law." And the wife is not to be barred of her dower, without her consent, by the will of her husband, even though ample provision is made for her support. Thayer v. Thayer, 14 Vt. 107, 39 Am. Dec. 211.

Under the common-law rule, which is still in force in many states, it is not in the power of the husband alone, by any act in the nature of an alienation or charge, to defeat the wife's right of dower after it has once attached. Grady v. McCorkle, 57 Mo. 172, 17 Am. Dec. 676.

This rule is recognized in numerous cases and is not denied in any state where it has not been changed by statute. But in a considerable number of states the statutes have cut down the wife's dower right to land of which the husband died seised or made same nearly equivalent provision.

For the value of land which one has received as a gift to defeat the right of dower of the donor's wife, he must account. Jenny v. Jenny, 24 Vt. 324.

A conveyance by a husband in Minnesota after the Act of 1875 abolishing dower and limiting the wife's interest in the nature of dower to lands of which the husband died seised, and prior to the Act of 1878 changing back again to the lands of which he was seised during coverture, passed his title to the grantee discharged of all claims of his wife. Morrison v. Rice, 35 Minn. 436.

Where land was acquired, and a marriage took place since the North Carolina Act of 1784 which restricted dower to lands of which the husband died seised, and prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, the husband can make a good title without the joinder of the wife, but if the land was acquired or the marriage took place after that date the wife must join in the deed. Castlebury v. Maynard, 95 N. C. 281.

A man cannot defeat his wife's right of dower in land purchased with his own money during coverture by taking a conveyance thereof to himself for life, with remainder to one of his children. Crecelius v. Horst, 11 Mo. App. 304.

In Thayer v. Thayer, supra, it was held under the Vermont statute limiting dower to lands of which the husband died seised that a man's conveyance to his children, made a short time before his death, in consideration of love and affection, with the intent of defeating his wife's right of dower, was a fraud upon the law and upon the marital rights of the wife.

Where a husband, shortly after marriage, purchased a farm, but had the deed made out to a third party, such deed was in fraud of the wife's dower rights. Rabbitt v. Gaither, 67 Md. 95.

Where a husband, under an oral contract for the purchase of land, takes possession and subsequently pays the whole of the purchase price, he is equitable owner of the land; and if he directs the vendor to convey the same to his son by a former wife, his widow may recover her dower interest in the land, in an action against his son. Everitt v. Everitt, 71 Iowa, 221.

As to lands held in common by the husband.

Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 355, was the case of a petition for dower under the statute. The husband of the plaintiff, during the coverture, was seised as tenant in common of an undivided fourth part of certain lands. In proceedings for partition the lands were adjudged not to be susceptible of partition and were sold by the sheriff by order of the court and the proceeds divided during the lifetime of the husband. It was held that the inchoate contingent dower interest of the wife was defeated by the sale. Brinkerhoff, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The

ERROR to the Superior Court for De Kalb County to review a judgment denying plaintiff's motion for new trial after judgment in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to contest the decision of commissioners setting off dower to defendant in lands previously owned by John Y. Flowers, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Candler & Thomson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John A. Wimpey and W. J. Spiers for defendant in error.

Simmons, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Commissioners appointed to assign dower to Mrs. Catherine Flowers, widow of John Y. Flowers, assigned to her 165 acres of farming land and a town house and lot. George N. Flowers objected, as executor of John Y. Flowers and individually, upon the ground that John Y. was not seised and possessed at the time of his death of the lands in which the dower was admeasured. It appeared upon the trial that George N. claimed the land in question under a deed made to him by John

Y. on August 14, 1875, in consideration of $5,500. The will was dated February 16, 1884. The jury found the issue in favor of Mrs. Flowers, and George N. made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

1. There was evidence tending to show that the deed was made by John Y. Flowers for the purpose of defeating his wife's right to dower; and the court in its charge made the right depend upon whether this intention was established, without regard to whether there was an actual sale and conveyance or not. The jury were instructed that, if such was the husband's purpose, she would be entitled to dower, notwithstanding the conveyance. We think this was error. In this state there is no statute inhibiting the sale of land by a husband to defeat his wife's right of dower, save as to lands the title to which came through her. It is true that at common law no acts of the husband during coverture, without the concurrence of the wife, could defeat dower. Her inchoate right attached to all lands of which the husband was seised at any time during the coverture. But by our Statute of 1826 (Cobb's Dig. p. 171) it was provided that "all conveyances of lands and tenements made by the husband alone during the coverture shall be legal and valid, and effectually convey the entire premises therein described, except such lands as the husband may have become posright of dower in the wife subsists in virtue of the seisin of the husband; and this right is always subject to any incumbrance, infirmity, or incident which the law attaches to that seisin, either at the time of the marriage or at the time the husband became seised. A liability to be devested by a sale in partition is an incident which the law affixes to the seisin of all joint estates; and the inchoate right of the wife is subject to this incident, and when the law steps in and divests the husband of his seisin, and turns realty into personalty, she is, by the act and policy of the law remitted, in lieu of her inchoate right of dower in the realty, to her inchoate right to a distributive right of the personalty into which it has been transmitted."

Under Iowa Code, § 2440, providing that one third in value of all the legal or equitable estates in real property possessed by the husband at any time during the marriage which have not been sold on execution or any judicial sale, and to which the wife has made no relinquishment of her right, shall be set apart as her property in fee-simple, if she survive him, it has been held that her interest is contingent, and subject to divestment, even by a judicial sale to which she is not a party. Williams v. Westcott, 77 Iowa, 332.

In Bailey v. Com., 41 Pa. 473, the acceptor of lands in proceedings in partition gave one recognition for the whole value of the land, the widow's share not being provided for. The land was subsequently sold under a judgment against the acceptor. After the death of the widow the heirs brought a scire facias to recover the principal of the widow's third, and the question was whether they could recover it, it being unquestioned that as a mere obligation for the payment of the shares due the heirs it lien was devested by the sheriff's sale. It was held that there could be a recovery.

The inchoate right of dower of the wife of a tenant in common is defeated by a sale in partition of the common property, although she is not a party 18 L. R. A.

to the proceedings. Holley v. Glover (S. C.) 16 L. R. A. 776.

A prior sale by a tenant in common of his undivided interest does not prevent the bar of his wife's inchoate right of dower by a subsequent sale in partition. Ibid.

And see further, on this subject, the note to Holley v. Glover, supra.

As to lands sold under mortgage.

Inchoate right of dower in the wife of the mortgagor is devested by sale on foreclosure. Bryar's App. 111 Pa. 81.

When the real estate of a husband is sold at judicial sale there is nothing for the wife to inherit. Under the statute the wife, on the death of her husband, obtains no interest in any real estate ever owned by the husband, if the same had previously been sold to pay his debts on any execution or other final process. Andrews v. Alcorn, 18 Kan. 361.

The sale of a debtor's land, which is not a home-stead, upon a special execution or order of sale issued in pursuance of a judgment against him upon a note, and to foreclose a mortgage securing it, cuts off the rights of the debtor's wife therein, and prevents any claim by her after his death to a distributive share of the land, though she was not a party to the note or mortgage or to the foreclosure proceeding. Mosteller v. Gorrell, 41 Kan. 322; Sturdevant v. Norris, 30 Iowa, 65.

In Bank of Commerce v. Owens, 81 Md. 320, 1 Am. Rep. 60, the husband was seised of the legal title in the land upon which theretofore the wife's inchoate right of dower had attached at common law. She had joined her husband in the execution of mortgages, and the property was afterwards sold under a deed of trust executed by the husband alone for the purpose of paying all mortgages and incumbrances according to their legal priority; and the court held that she was dowable of the surplus after payment of the mortgages in which she had joined. From what was said in the seised of by his intermarriage, . . . any law, usage, custom, or rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding: provided, that nothing hereinafter contained shall prevent the widow from her right to dower in all lands of which her husband may have died seised and possessed." The Code, § 1763, declares that "dower is the right of a wife to an estate for life in one third of the lands, according to valuation, including the dwelling-house, . . . of which the husband was seised and possessed at the time of his death, or to which the husband obtained title in right of his wife." It is clear from these provisions that, prior to the husband's death, and as to property of which he was not seised and possessed at the time of his death, and which did not come through the wife, no dower right could exist. Hence, if there was actual sale and conveyance of the property, no right or title being reserved in the husband, and none existing in him, at the time of his death, there was no right of the wife, present or future, upon which the conveyance could operate as a fraud; and therefore she could not be heard to complain of his motive in thus disposing of his property. Having the right, without her consent, to make an absolute conveyance, the necessary effect of which would be to cut off the possibility of dower, it cannot be objected that his purpose was to accomplish that result. In this case the conveyance was, upon its face absolute, and there is no claim that the property came through the wife. If there was in fact an absolute sale, and this conveyance was intended to operate as a present and effectual transfer of the grantor's rights in the property, the transaction must be upheld in favor of the purchaser against the claim of the widow. If, however, it was merely a colorable sale and conveyance, not intended by the parties to be real and operative, except as a means of dividing the lands among the children of the husband at his death, he in the meantime to be the real, while the grantee in this conveyance was to be the nominal and formal owner, this would leave the husband seised, so far as the dower right is concerned; and his widow, after his death, could claim dower, and have it assigned, notwithstanding such colorable and pretended conveyance.

Though there is no direct adjudication of this court upon the question, our decisions, so far as they go, are in harmony with what is here said. The same view is upheld in other states, having statutes similar to our own. See 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, title, Dower, pp. 886, 912; Stewart, Husb. & Wife, § 268; 1 Scribner, Dower, chap. 29, § 18, ed. 1883, p. 616. In Connecticut the statute confers upon the widow dower in "one-third part of the real estate of which her husband died possessed," the word "possessed" as here used, being held to be synonymous with "seised." In the case of Stewart v. Stewart, 5 Conn. 317, the opinion in this case it may be inferred that the same result would follow in the case of a simple mortgage of an equitable interest. To the same effect is the decision in Mantz v. Buchanan, 1 Md. Ch. 205, and Lynn v. Lynn, 27 Md. 547. But in Purdy v. Purdy, 3 Md. Ch. 547, a mortgage was regarded as a transfer or parting with the equitable estate.

And it is held that an absolute sale of an equitable interest in land, by the husband alone, will bar all claims to dower. Bowie v. Berry, 1 Md. Ch. 452; Rabbitt v. Gaither, 67 Md. 95.

A wife is not entitled to a share of the surplus resulting from the sale of lands under a mortgage made by the husband's grantor. Newhall v. Lynn Five Cents Sav. Bank, 101 Mass. 423, 3 Am. Rep. 387; Matthews v. Duryee, 4 Keyes, 540; Frost v. Peacock, 4 Edw. Ch. 973, 6 L. ed. 1016.

In Indiana by foreclosure sale of husband's land under a mortgage in which the wife did not join her right is not lost. Verry v. Robinson, 25 Ind. 14, 37 Am. Dec. 344.

Under a Florida statute limiting dower to lands of which the husband died seised "or had before conveyed, whereof the wife had not relinquished her right of dower," a mortgage by him alone and a sale on foreclosure thereof will not bar her dower. McMahon v. Russell, 17 Fla. 693.

A widow's right of dower, consummated when assigned, is not barred by foreclosure suit to which she was made a party, when she did not join in the mortgage and the petition did not seek to bar her dower right. Moomey v. Maas, 22 Iowa, 380, 92 Am. Dec. 395; Standish v. Dow, 21 Iowa, 393; Oleson v. Bullard, 40 Iowa, 14.

Bankruptcy.

When a debtor makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors, a sale of the real estate by the assignees is a judicial sale, within the Indiana Act of 1875; and the wife's inchoate interest in the real estate becomes absolute and vested, under that Act. Elliott v. Cale, 113 Ind. 388; Ketchum v. Schickelans, 73 Ind. 137; Warford v. Noble, 9 Biss. 320.

In Pennsylvania it is held that neither an absolute conveyance by the husband nor an assignment by him for the benefit of creditors, whether executed voluntarily or under a requirement of the insolvent law of the state, impairs the wife's right of dower. Kennedy v. Medrow, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 415, 417, 1 L. ed. 232; Graff v. Smith, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 461, 464, 1 L. ed. 232, 233; Kirk v. Dean, 2 Binn. 341; Killinger v. Reidenbauer, 6 Serg. & R. 581; Riddlebarger v. Mentzer, 7 Watts, 141; Keller v. Michael, 2 Yeates, 300; Eberle v. Fisher, 18 Pa. 596; Worcester v. Clark, 2 Grant, Cas. 84.

A purchaser from an assignee in bankruptcy takes subject to the wife's right of dower. Re Angier, 4 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 619; Lazear v. Porter, 37 Pa. 513, 30 Am. Rep. 380; Kelso's App. 102 Pa. 7.

In Connecticut, by statute (Rev. 1875, p. 375, § 4), it is provided that "if, on the report of commissioners, the estate shall appear to be insolvent, the court shall set out to the widow her dower." Lawrence's App. 49 Conn. 411.

And there is nothing in the Bankrupt Act of the United States, nor in the proceedings under it, to bar the wife's right of dower in lands of which her husband was seised during coverture. Porter v. Lazear, 109 U. S. 84, 27 L. ed. 355.

Sale on execution to satisfy mechanics' lien.

A sale of a house and lot belonging to the husband, on execution, to satisfy a mechanics' lien will not defeat the wife's dower right. Bishop v. Boyle, 9 Ind. 168, 63 Am. Dec. 615; Gove v. Cuthier, 23 Ill. 640, 76 Am. Dec. 711; Mark v. Murphy, 70 Ind. 534; Schaeffer v. Weed, 8 Ill. 511; Van Vronker v. Eastman, 7 Met. 157, 161; Jaeger v. Bossieux, 15 Gratt. 83, 105, 76 Am. Dec. 189; Piper v. Ward, 8 Blackf. 252.

Says Cookins, J., in Bishop v. Boyle, supra: "Hers is the older lien. The mechanic bestows his husband executed a deed conveying all his real estate to his children, and placed it in the hands of a third person to be delivered at his death. On the happening of the event the deed was delivered in accordance with his directions, and it was held that the instrument was strictly a deed, taking effect from the time of its delivery to the depository, and that the widow was thereby barred of her dower. In respect to the objection urged in behalf of the widow, that it was fraudulent as against her, Hosmer, Ch. J., said: "Was the deed fraudulent as relative to Mrs. Stewart? This depends entirely on the right which she had to the estate conveyed anterior to the death of the husband. If she had no right which the law recognizes, then the delivery of the deed could be no fraud on her right, that is, no fraud on a nonentity.

By the English law the right to dower originates on the marriage, but by our law it takes its origin at the husband's death. Our ancestors did not think it expedient to restrain that free transfer of real estate which the interest of the community requires; and for this reason the law has given to the wife no lien or right, legal or equitable, to the husband's estate during his life. Her condition, in this respect, is like that of her husband's children, or other heirs; and the only right of either is to such estate as he has not disposed of." The cases cited by counsel as contrary to this view are clearly distinguishable from the case in hand. The first of these cases is from Vermont, where a similar statutory provision existed, (Thayer v. Thayer, 14 Vt. 107, 89 Am. Dec. 211, but in that case the decision was placed upon the ground that the conveyance, labor with a knowledge of her prior right in the real estate, and he knows the house he is building, as brick is added to brick, and nail after nail is driven, becomes real estate. He can protect himself by security or not venture. She is passive and can do nothing."

Sale under execution against husband.

A sale of lands under execution against the husband issued under a judgment rendered against him after the marriage will not cut off the wife's right of dower. Wright v. Tichenor, 104 Ind. 185; Dunham v. Osborn, 1 Paige, 684, 2 L. ed. 780; McClanahan v. Porter, 10 Mo. 748; Ayer v. Spring, 9 Mass. 8; Harrison v. Eldridge, 7 N. J. L. 468; Fleeson v. Nicholson, Walk. (Miss.) 247; Sharp v. Pettit, 1 Yeates, 389; Ingram v. Morris, 4 Harr. (Del.) 111; Dayton v. Corser (Minn.) post, 80.

The law is settled in accordance with the above cases in those states where the common-law rule prevails; and if the husband by his own conveyance cannot defeat the wife's dower this cannot be done by a sale on execution under a judgment against him.

In Harrison v. Eldridge, supra, the court says the law is conclusively settled to this effect and that in fact no claim to the contrary was made in that case. But the actual point decided was that the rule applied to an execution sale under a judgment on a bond although the bond was secured by a mortgage which the wife had signed.

So an execution sale against a husband of his equity of redemption from a mortgage in which the wife joined did not defeat her dower rights where a third person paid off the mortgage. Barker v. Parker, 17 Mass. 564.

In Ingram v. Morris, supra, dower was allowed by verdict of a jury against a judgment entered on the day of the marriage.

But in states where the statutes have changed the common-law rule so that the husband can by his conveyance defeat the wife's inchoate right of dower judicial opinion has not been so harmonious.

Thus, under a Mississippi statute under which a bona fide conveyance by the husband will defeat the wife's dower, it was held that a sale on execution under a judgment against him would not defeat it. Gould v. Luckett, 47 Miss. 96.

But in Pennsylvania since the Act of 1833, under which a sale by the husband would cut off the wife's dower right, it was held that a sale on execution against a tenant in tail would defeat his wife's dower right, and the court said it was admitted to be so in respect to a fee-simple estate. Elliott v. Pearsall, 4 Pa. L. J. 157.

And in Georgia a bond for title given by the husband was held to defeat the wife's dower right. 18 L. R. A.

But in this state the Act of 1836 allowed the husband to convey the property, and the Statute of 1842 had further expressly provided that a judicial sale should bar dower. Aaron v. Bayne, 28 Ga. 107.

In North Carolina while the Act of 1784 was in force, which limited the wife's dower right to lands of which the husband died seised, it was held that such right was defeated by a sale under execution against the husband in his lifetime although the deed was not made until after his death. Den v. Frew, 14 N. C. 3, 22 Am. Dec. 708.

On the other hand, it was finally decided, after much uncertainty, that in case of a sale after his death although under execution levied during his lifetime, dower was not barred. Frost v. Etheridge, 12 N. C. 80.

This decision overruled Hodges v. McCabe, 10 N. C. 78. Both these cases were decided by a majority of the court against dissent, and the same question had been presented in Winstead v. Winstead, 2 N. C. 248, in which a special case was made up by judges who were divided in opinion, but the case went off without any decision although the judge who was originally opposed to the claim of dower in that case was inclined to the other opinion before the case was disposed of.

As to judgments rendered before marriage the rule is clear and uniform that a dower right is subject thereto. Trustees of Poor of Queen Anne's County v. Pratt, 10 Md. 6; Lane v. Gover, 3 Harr. & Mohl, 394; Robbins v. Robbins, 8 Blackf. 174; Eiseman v. Finch, 79 Ind. 511; Sanford v. McLean, 3 Paige, 117, 8 L. ed. 80, 23 Am. Dec. 778.

The foreclosure of a lien for the purchase price of land cuts off the right of dower. Island v. Hewett, 11 Smedes & M. 184.

And an attachment of land before marriage followed by sale under execution issued on the judgment rendered after marriage defeats dower. Brown v. Williams, 31 Me. 403.

Under the Tennessee statutes, which gave a wife dower only in lands of which the husband died seised, the court very emphatically denied a claim of the husband's creditors to be preferred to the widow's dower right and gave her claim priority. Combs v. Young, 4 Yerg. 218, 26 Am. Dec. 225.

So in Illinois a sale by an administrator for the husband's debts will not defeat dower. Slak v. Smith, 6 Ill. 503.

Under the present Indiana statute the wife's interest in one third of the land which the statute gives in lieu of dower vests at once on a sale of the other two thirds under execution. Mansur v. Hinkson, 94 Ind. 595; Taylor v. Stockwell, 66 Ind. 505.

Adverse possession of the husband's lands.

Adverse occupation of land during the life of the

which was without any valuable consideration, was intended not only to defeat the wife of her dower, but to secure to the grantor the possession, use and control of the property during his life. Both in that case and the case in 24 Vt. 824, (Jenny v. Jenny), the possession was in the husband at the time of his death. The case of Brewer v. Connell, 11 Humph. 500, was placed upon a statute which declared that any sale with intent to defeat the widow of dower should be void. Other cases cited by counsel were decided in states where the common-law rule had not been changed, and the concurrence of the wife was necessary to defeat dower.

2. The court below held that, even if part of the purchase money of this property had been paid in good faith by the grantee, he acquired no title if the note for the remainder was not paid before the grantor's death. The charge on this point was as follows: "If George N. Flowers, during the lifetime of his father, John Y. Flowers, had in good faith paid this purchase money, $5,500,—$1,000 at the beginning, and $4,500 afterwards,—then the title would have been transferred to him, so that it would not have been in John Y. Flowers at his death, unless it might have been disregarded on account of some fraud against the widow by the parties involved in that title. That I do not charge you at this time, but I may do so before I get through. Then, if that had been the case, he would stand as the possessor, as I say, without more, and the title would be in him at the death of John Y. Flowers. But if you should believe husband cannot affect the rights of the widow. She cannot be prejudiced by his laches. Williams v. Williams, 6 L. R. A. 697, 80 Ky. 361; Winters v. DeTurk, 7 L. R. A. 668, 188 Pa. 369; Boling v. Clark (Iowa) Oct. 16, 1891.

In Durham v. Angier, 20 Me. 242, there had been an adverse holding for over twenty years before the husband's death, and the widow was allowed to recover.

In Hart v. McCollum, 28 Ga. 478, the husband had been disseised for twenty-three years at the time of his death. The court, in its opinion, said: "The mere failure of the husband to sue for lands of which he was once legally seized during coverture, until the Statute of Limitations attaches against him, does not exclude the wife's right to dower in said lands,—a right which she may assert when she becomes discoverer."

To the same effect is Moore v. Frost, 3 N. H. 126. It is not barred by seven years adverse possession with color of title and payment of taxes under the Illinois Act of 1889. Brian v. Melton, 125 Ill. 647; Miller v. Pence, 132 Ill. 149.

In case of the husband's absence for seven years without being heard from, under circumstances raising a presumption of death, her right accrues at the end of that period and the statute then begins to run against her. Whiting v. Nicholl, 45 Ill. 220.

As to lands sold for taxes.

The Missouri Statute of 1889, § 4525, provides that "no act, deed, or conveyance executed or performed by the husband without the assent of the wife . . . and no judgment or decree confessed by, or recovered against him, and no laches, default, covin, or crime of the husband, shall prejudice the right and interest of the wife." Under this statute an inchoate right of dower is not cut off by a sale of the husband's land for taxes, the tax proceeding not being strictly in rem. Blevins v. Smith, 13 L. R. A. 441, 104 Mo. 693.

An inchoate right of dower is not defeated by a tax sale when the liens for taxes attached to the dower rights had become fixed by the concurring facts of marriage and the husband's seisin. Shell v. Duncan, 5 L. R. A. 921, 81 S. C. 547. See, further, the note to Blevins v. Smith (Mo.) 13 L. R. A. 441.

As to lands dedicated or condemned to the public use.

Says Lord Coke: "Of a castle that is maintained for the necessary defense of the realm a woman shall not be endowed, because it ought not to be divided, and the public shall be preferred before the private." "Here," says Scribner, "we see shadowed forth the principle upon which the courts at a later day have proceeded in holding the inchoate right of dower extinguished in lands appropriated, ac-ording to the forms of law, to the uses of the public." 1 Scribner, Dower, 578.

In Gwynne v. Cincinnati, 8 Ohio, 24, the husband of the plaintiff, and other property owners, agreed to open up a street with a space therein for a market, and accordingly the city opened the street and created a market house, and thereafter the widow petitioned for dower. It was held she was not entitled to dower in the land occupied by the market house; that the case then in hand could not be distinguished from those where property had been condemned for public use.

A widow is not dowerable in lands which have been appropriated to public use by the exercise of the right of eminent domain during the life of the husband, or in land which he dedicated to uses purely public, as for markets, streets, parks, and the like. French v. Lord, 60 Me. 537.

A wife's inchoate right of dower is defeated by condemnation of lands to public use; and no compensation need be made her. Moore v. New York, 8 N. Y. 110, 50 Am. Dec. 473; Duncan v. Terre Haute, 85 Ind. 108; Wheeler v. Kirtland, 27 N. J. Eq. 534; Re Central Park Extension, 16 Abb. Pr. 56.

In Bonner v. Peterson, 44 Ill. 253, it is held that her dower right in the land is cut off but transferred to the proceeds.

In Re Central Park Extension, supra, the court, referring to Moore v. New York, supra, said: "It might have been added to that case that the right was transferred from the land to the money received from the land."

In Nye v. Taunton Branch R. Co., 118 Mass. 277, after the husband had purchased and improved property, it was sold under execution, and after passing through several hands it was conveyed to a railroad company by a common warranty deed with no restrictions as to the use of the property which was in fact used by the railroad company for depot and station purposes. The demand for dower was resisted on the ground that it was barred, because the property had been taken for public use. The defense was overruled and the court made a distinction between property acquired by the power of eminent domain and by purchase.

But in the recent case of Venable v. Wabash W. R. Co. (Mo.), ante, 68, a voluntary conveyance expressly limited for railroad purposes was held as effectual as a condemnation by eminent domain to defeat the dower right of the grantor's wife although she did not join the conveyance.

As to provision of will in lieu of dower, see Calahan v. Robinson, 3 L. R. A. 497, and note, 30 S. C. 249.

As to antenuptial conveyance, see Dudley v. Dudley, 3 L. R. A. 814, and note, 76 Wis. 567.

from the evidence that that note was not paid during the lifetime of John Y. Flowers, then, so far as that goes, it would not convey to him such title as might be consummated by the payment of the purchase money." From what we have said in the preceding division of this opinion, it will be seen that the right to dower in this case turns upon the question of a real, as distinguishable from a merely colorable, sale and conveyance; and, this being so, it does not matter whether the whole of the purchase money was paid in the lifetime of the husband or not. If the sale was real, and the purchase money was in fact due and owing by the purchaser as a bona fide debt against him, dower would be as effectually barred as if all the purchase money had been paid. In Day v. Solomon, 40 Ga. 83, where the land was not paid for, and it was held that dower was not barred, there was not merely a failure to pay, but there was no conveyance of the title, the purchaser holding under a bond to convey. It was held, therefore, that the husband, at the time of his death, had a perfect legal title.

3. It was further alleged as error that the court allowed the applicant for dower to read in evidence the will of John Y. Flowers, over objection that the same was irrelevant. This will provided for the payment of the testator's debts; that his executors should sell at public outcry, after advertisement, all his property, real and personal, and collect all his notes and accounts; and that proceeds arising from the sale of the property and money collected on the notes and accounts, after the payment of the debts, should be divided equally, share and share alike, between the six children of testator, of whom George N. Flowers was one. George N. was appointed executor. It was contended that the will was relevant testimony to show that the widow was ignored, and that John Y. Flowers, at the time of its execution, was endeavoring to defeat his wife of all interest in his estate, and using George N. Flowers to carry out his plans. In reply to this it is enough to say that if the husband, as we have shown, had a legal right to intend the defeat of dower, and to effectuate the intention by an actual and real conveyance, a will subsequently executed, in which he made no provision for the wife, would throw no light on the present controversy, which is simply whether the conveyance was real or only colorable and pretended.

4. Error is also assigned upon the admission of testimony relating to family disturbances between the husband and the wife and between her and one of his children by a former marriage. As tending to show a motive for endeavoring to defeat dower without parting with dominion and real ownership, we think this testimony was relevant. As the case is to go back for a new trial, it is unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the evidence. What has been said disposes of the material questions presented by the record. For the reasons stated, we think the court erred in not granting a new trial.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Lyman C. DAYTON et al.

v.

Elwood S. CORSER et al.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. The inchoate contingent interest of a husband or wife in real estate owned by the other, fixed by the terms of Gen. Laws 1890, chap. 48, subchap. 3, § 64, and commonly called the "dower right," is not divested by a transfer of title from the owner of the property to a purchaser at an execution sale founded upon a judgment against such owner.

2. Certain assignments of error considered and disposed of.

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County entered in an action brought to set aside a judgment obtained against May I. Dayton, deceased, and to vacate the sale of certain real estate which was sold under the execution issued thereon, which judgment refused to set aside the sale but charged the property with the husband's right of curtesy. Affirmed.

*Headnotes by COLLINS, J.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lyman C. Dayton, E. F. Lane and George S. Engle for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Hahn & Hawley for defendants.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These were cross-appeals from the same judgment. The facts were that, under and by virtue of an execution duly issued upon a judgment obtained by these defendants against one May I. Dayton, certain real property was levied upon and sold in January, 1891. These defendants became the purchasers at such execution sale, and there was no redemption. At the time of the rendition of the judgment the debtor was the wife of this plaintiff, and so remained until her death in June, 1891. In the case at bar, which was brought to have set aside and vacated both the judgment and the sale for reasons which need not be stated, and also to have determined the rights of the parties in the real property so sold, the trial court refused to interfere with either the judgment or the sale, but did adjudge that the property passed to the defendants at the sale, subject to the inchoate and contingent right of the debtor's husband, the plaintiff, under the provisions of the Probate Code, and that upon her death

NOTE.—The subject of dower is presented in several important phases by this case and the two immediately preceding.

he became seised in fee of an undivided one third of the same. It is this feature of the judgment which has been assailed by defendants' assignments of error, while the contention of plaintiff in his appeal is that the court erred in various rulings made upon the trial, and in its determination that the defendants became the owners of an undivided two thirds of the property on the expiration of the period of redemption, or acquired any interest whatever. Naturally the defendants' appeal should be first disposed of, and the inquiry is whether the inchoate and contingent interest of a husband or wife in the real property of the other, as fixed by Gen. Laws 1889, chap. 46, subchap. 3, § 64, is swept away and destroyed by a sale on execution, issued upon a judgment rendered during coverture against the husband or wife alone. The statute, which was but a re-enactment of Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 46, § 3, provides: "Sec. 64. Such surviving husband or wife shall also be entitled to and shall hold in fee simple, or by such inferior tenure as the deceased was at any time during coverture seised or possessed thereof, one equal undivided one third ($\frac{1}{3}$) of all other lands of which the deceased was at any time during coverture seised or possessed, free from any testamentary or other disposition thereof to which such survivor shall not have assented in writing, but subject, in its just proportion with the other real estate, to the payment of such debts of the deceased as are not paid from the personal estate." The remainder of the section need not be quoted, as it has no bearing on the case. When speaking of this language in Re Rausch, 35 Minn. 291, it was said that the provisions of the statute for the widow in the real estate of her deceased husband were rather in the nature of an enlargement than an abolishment of dower, and that this inchoate right "is of the same general nature as inchoate right of dower at common law." Although having reference to the rights of a surviving wife, these views are equally as pertinent and applicable to a case like this, where the statutory rights of a surviving husband are being considered; hence his rights are analogous to, and of the same general nature as, inchoate right of dower at common law. It hardly seems necessary to cite authorities to the proposition that at common law a wife could not be deprived of her dower rights in the real estate of her husband through a sale upon execution under a judgment obtained against him subsequently to the marriage, but they may be found collected in 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 920. And from an examination of the statute it would be impossible to conclude that a radical change in this matter had been wrought by it. There is nothing to indicate an intent to reduce or diminish the inchoate rights of a survivor; but, upon the other hand, the rule of the common law as to dower rights has been emphasized by this legislation; for, in addition to providing that such survivor shall hold in fee simple, or by such inferior tenure as the deceased had or held, an equal undivided one third of all lands of which the deceased was at any time during coverture seised or possessed, it was expressly declared that such holdings should be free from any testamentary or other disposition to which the survivor had not assented in writing, subject, however, in its just proportion with other real estate, to the payment of such debts of the deceased, as cannot be paid out of the personal estate. The plain meaning of this statute is that neither husband nor wife can be divested of the statutory right or interest in the real property of the other without having consented in writing. Every disposition of such real estate is covered by the language, and it is evident that, even if the words "or other disposition" were required to render the prohibition sufficiently certain, all doubt has been removed by their use. This language is broad and explicit enough to cover and include any transfer of title or disposition of the estate by execution sale. Husband and wife are given absolute protection as to the acts of either in respect to this statutory right or interest, and the statute must not be so construed as to place it in the power of a simple judgment creditor to defeat its purpose. If this were permitted, the husband or wife could, through connivance with a spurious creditor, easily circumvent the statute, and by means of an execution sale wipe out a right or interest which has been granted with great care and certainty. Again, such a construction would authorize the sale of an interest in real property which the debtor was unable to turn out in satisfaction of the debt or to dispose of in any manner. No statute should be interpreted so as to permit that to be done by indirection which cannot be accomplished by direct means. Nor do the statutory provisions in regard to judgments and execution sales have any bearing upon those found in the Probate Code in reference to the title to real property by descent. By section 277, chap. 66, Gen. Stat. 1878, a duly docketed judgment is declared to be a lien on the real property of the debtor for a certain period of time; and by section 323 the sheriff's certificate on execution sale, if properly proved or acknowledged and recorded, operates, upon the expiration of the period of redemption, as a conveyance of the judgment debtor's right, title, and interest in the estate, and nothing more. There is nothing in either of these sections indicating that the sale is not made subject to the inchoate contingent interest of the husband or wife. Under statutes similar to our own it has been held repeatedly that the inchoate right to dower attaches at the moment the husband's interest in the realty becomes fixed, during coverture, so that his creditors cannot by any proceeding against him impair or destroy the right. Tate v. Jay, 81 Ark. 576; Nance v. Hooper, 11 Ala. 552; McMahon v. Russell, 17 Fla. 698; Wright v. Tichenor, 104 Ind. 185; Sisk v. Smith, 6 Ill. 503; Sutherland v. Sutherland, 69 Ill. 481; Grady v. McCorkle, 57 Mo. 172; Gould v. Luckett, 47 Miss. 96. A later decision—Stewart v. Ross, 50 Miss. 776—that a sale under legal process of a wife's land defeats the husband's right of curtesy is based upon the statute in regard to this right. As section 64, supra, provides that the statutory interest in question shall be "subject, to its just proportion with the other real estate, to the payment of such debts of the deceased as are not paid from the personal estate," it has been urged as a strong reason for adopting the views of defendants' counsel that the creditor who neglects to prosecute his claim, and upon the decease of the debtor files the same in the probate court, has a lien upon the entire estate, and may have it sold to satisfy his claim, free from the statutory right or interest, thus having an advantage over the diligent creditor who procures a judgment and makes sale upon execution during the lifetime of the debtor; but this line of argument has no real merit. If title to real property has been divested during lifetime by sale on execution, it is evident that a general creditor has no enforceable claim upon that part of the same appropriated by statute to the surviving husband or wife, for it was held in Goodwin v. Kumm, 48 Minn. 403, that only the interest of the wife in the lands owned by her husband at his decease—and consequently a part of his estate—could be rendered subject to his debts. The statute may be inconsistent in some respects, and present practical difficulties, but the lien or claim of the general creditor upon the statutory right or interest of the survivor is not without limit or qualification; and whatever this lien or claim may be, and to what extent it may be satisfied out of the statutory right or interest, is to be first determined in the probate court, in case the personal estate be insufficient to satisfy the debts of the deceased. This disposes of defendants' appeal, and we proceed to a brief consideration of such assignments of error made by plaintiff's counsel as need be mentioned.

The issue of law which would have been raised if counsel had been allowed to interpose a demurrer to the amended answer was precisely the issue determined upon the trial in plaintiff's favor, and which we have just held to have been correctly decided. There are several reasons why the court was justified in its ruling, but it is enough for us to say that the plaintiff was not prejudiced by it.

The ruling on plaintiff's application for a continuance, based solely on the ground that the issue was not made until after the first day of the term, was correct. The pleadings were filed and served in strict accordance with a stipulation in which it was agreed that the case should be tried at the March term of the court, but not earlier than the 20th day of the month.

The contention that testimony should have been received as to an oral agreement between plaintiff and his wife that she should receive and hold the title to the property herein involved in trust for him has no merit. Conceding, even, that such testimony would have been admissible under any circumstances, it appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff himself, in immediate connection with the rulings by which this oral testimony was excluded, that the trust agreement had been reduced to writing, and counsel reserved the right to offer the instrument in evidence later on. It was not produced, nor was attempt made to put it in evidence, until after the case was closed. A motion to reopen for the purpose of putting the document in evidence was then denied upon the ground that the case was closed, and no exception was taken to the ruling.

As to both parties the judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.—Civil death in United States.

Civil death is the state of a person who, though possessing natural life, has lost all his civil rights and as to them is considered as dead. Bouvier, Law Dict. title Death.

Lord Coke, in Co. Litt. 180 a, says: "Besides men attainted in a premunire, every person that is attainted of high treason, petit treason, or felony, is disabled to bring any action, for he is extra legem positus, and is accounted in law civilitur mortuus." Of this passage Chancellor Kent said that, as was seen by comparison with other passages, it was not to be taken in the full latitude of expression, and he declared that civil death was confined to the cases of persons professed, or who have abjured the realm or been banished by statute or process of law. Platner v. Sherwood, 6 Johns. Ch. 113, 2 L. ed. 73.

Civil death involved a total extinction of the civil rights and relations of the party, so that he could neither take nor hold property, but his estate passed to his heirs, as though he were really dead, or was forfeited to the crown. Of this kind were the cases of monks professed, and abjuration of the realm. Profession was a creation of the ecclesiastical law, and the relinquishment of the 18 L. R. A.

estate was voluntary; this species of civil death terminated when popery was abolished in England.

Abjuration of the realm was abolished by Statute of 21 Jac. I. chap. 28. See opinion of Veazey, J., in Baltimore v. Chester, 58 Vt. 315, 38 Am. Rep. 677.

Civil death involved also an incapacity to hold property, or to sue in the king's courts, attended with forfeiture of the estate and corruption of blood; and the king took the property to the exclusion of the heirs. Jackson v. Catlin, 3 Johns. 282, 3 Am. Dec. 415.

Crimes in Vermont do not work a forfeiture of the estate, or corruption of blood, and therefore in the case of one convicted for crime there is lacking that taint which constituted at the common law one of the essential elements of civil death. Baltimore v. Chester, supra.

The Statute of 54 Geo. III., chap. 45, abolished forfeiture of lands on corruption of blood in every case except treason, petit treason, and murder.

And by the Statute of 33 & 34 Vict. chap. 23, the whole doctrine of attainder, corruption of blood and forfeiture, except forfeiture consequent on outlawry, was swept away.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. W. S. Maxwell for plaintiffs in error.

Marr, J., filed the following opinion:

This action was brought by the plaintiffs in error against the defendant in error to try title to and to recover a certain tract of land in Llano county, Tex. They claim the land as heirs-at-law of their son, one C. C. Davis, who was duly convicted in the district court of the above-named county, and sentenced to the state penitentiary for the term of his natural life. They contend that this conviction rendered C. C. Davis civilter mortuus, and cast descent upon his heirs. He is, however, still alive in fact, and undergoing the life sentence in the penitentiary. The land belonged to him at the time of his conviction, and he was and is an unmarried man, and has no children. The defendant claims title to the land under a purchase at an execution sale upon a judgment of a justice court which was rendered against C. C. Davis in a suit instituted against him after his conviction and incarceration in the penitentiary. It is alleged, however, in the petition that this judgment and the execution sale are null and void for the want of service of process upon the defendant in said suit. Upon the foregoing state of the case, the court below sustained a general demurrer to the petition of the plaintiffs, and dismissed their suit. The plaintiffs seek to recover the land in their own right, and not for or on behalf of C. C. Davis. They have sued out a writ of error, and have assigned as error the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer.

The question presented for our determination is one of first impression in this state, if it can be deemed a question at all, in view of the Bill of Rights and our statutory provisions which relate to descent and distribution, administrators and wills, and the probate thereof, etc. Attainders, outlawry, deprivation of property except by due process of law, and the corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate, as a result of conviction of crime, are expressly prohibited by the organic law. Const. art. 1, §§ 10, 19-21. Section 21 declares that "no conviction shall work a corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate, and the estates of those who destroy their own lives shall descend or vest as in case of natural death." This provision is invoked by the plaintiffs in error, but it aids their case no further than a declaration that a convict may either inherit himself or transmit inheritance. It does not attempt to determine at what time the descent of his estate shall be cast, but excludes this idea by the express regulation concerning the estates of suicides. In any event, it most certainly does not declare that the estates of convicted felons shall, upon conviction, "descend or vest as in case of natural death." In short, we find nothing in the Constitution to support the position of the plaintiffs, but much that might warrant an opposite conclusion. It is not necessary, however, for us to determine whether, under the provisions of the Constitution before cited, it would be within the power of the Legislature to establish a rule of descent as contended for by the plaintiffs, in cases like the present, for the plain reason that, so far as we are aware, the Legislature has not yet enacted any such law. The statutes before mentioned are too numerous to be quoted, but an examination of their provisions will, as we think, inevitably lead to the conviction that, whenever these statutory enactments upon the subjects aforesaid speak of death, they mean the natural death of the person whose estate or testament is involved. Analogous statutes are so construed in similar cases by the Court of Appeals of New York and the Supreme Court of Ohio. As our statutes regulate the time when the descent is cast, viz., when the ancestor is in fact dead, we

In Frazer v. Fulcher, 17 Ohio, 280, it was held that one sentenced to imprisonment for life in the penitentiary was not civilly dead, and that the appointment of an administrator was improper. Hitchcock, J., said: "If, then, we rely upon the authority of Chancellor Kent, there is no principle of the common law by which a man in the situation of Frazer would be held to be civilly dead. . . . It has been suggested, however, that for the Legislature to enact that the estate of a person in such situation should be disposed of as if he were dead would be a violation of that clause of the Constitution which declares that 'no conviction shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate.' Whether it would be so or not, depends upon the meaning which we attach to the word 'forfeiture' as used in this connection. To me it seems clear that the intention of the convention in the introduction of this clause was to guard against evils existing in the country from which many of our laws are derived."

A person attainted under the Act of Attainder of 1779 was to be considered as civilly dead. Jackson v. Catlin, 2 Johns. 248, 3 Am. Dec. 415.

In Troup v. Wood, 4 Johns. Ch. 223, 1 L. ed. 823, it was held where the point arose incidentally that every person convicted of felony and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life is civilter mortuus.

But in Platner v. Sherwood, 6 Johns. Ch. 113, 2 L. ed. 73, this point was the material one in issue. 18 L. R. A.

and the chancellor, condemning his former position, held that a person convicted of felony and sentenced, prior to March 29, 1790, to imprisonment for life, was not civilly dead, and his estate, therefore, not devastated.

The "maxim of civilter mortuus, on a conviction for felony, does not apply" in Delaware, and an action for the support and maintenance of minor children may be maintained against one who has been convicted of the crime of murder. Cannon v. Windsor, 1 Houst. (Del.) 143.

A person found to be an habitual drunkard is not civilly dead so as to transfer his rights and responsibilities to his trustees as administrators. Steel v. Young, 4 Watts, 459.

One convicted for embezzlement is not civilter mortuus and may be served with notice of appeal in an action in which he was sued as administrator. Brown v. Mann, 68 Cal. 517.

A person imprisoned in the penitentiary for life is not civilly dead and may sue in his own name, and it is improper to permit another to sue as his prochein ami. Willingham v. King, 23 Fla. 478.

One convicted of felony is not civilly dead, and can sue for injuries received while in the penitentiary. Dade Coal Co. v. Haslett, 83 Ga. 549.

The provision of New York Rev. Stat. (2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. p. 701, § 20), that a "person sentenced to imprisonment in a state prison for life shall thereafter be deemed civilly dead," is declaratory of the common law and does not devert the criminal of

are not, therefore, relegated to the common law for a rule of decision, although, under that law, even an attainted convict was not divested of the title to his lands until after office found, but could dispose of them by will, subject to a forfeiture at the instance of the crown, etc. Avery v. Everett, 110 N. Y. 817, 1 L. R. A. 264, 6 Am. St. Rep. 868. In the case just cited it was held that, although a statute of that state declared that "life convicts should thereafter be deemed civilly dead," still, in case of a devise of land to such a convict with directions that if he should die without issue the property shall vest in another, the land "does not so vest upon his civil death." The decision was not rested upon the intention of the testator, but upon the broader ground that the conviction had not divested the convict of his title to the land. We have no such statute as the one above quoted, and for stronger reasons, therefore, would the principle just announced apply to the case in hand. The Supreme Court of Ohio held that "a man sentenced to imprisonment for life in the penitentiary, in punishment for crime, is not civilly dead, and letters of administration cannot be granted upon his estate." Frazer v. Fulcher, 17 Ohio, 260. The learned judge who delivered the opinion observed that "we know that in England there are cases in which a man, although in full life, is said to be civilly dead, but I have not learned until this case was brought before us that there was but one kind of death known to our laws." This, perhaps, about expresses the state of our own laws upon the subject. It has been decided that convicted felons may be sued and may dispose of their property by will or deed, etc., and it would seem that, under the terms of our own statutes, there exists no valid objection to a convict devising his lands, if otherwise possessed of the statutory qualifications essential to testamentary capacity. Avery v. Everett, supra; Rankin v. Rankin, 6 T. B. Mon. 531, 17 Am. Dec. 161; Rev. Stat. art. 4857. See also art. 8222. If he can be sued, and his property seized by his creditors after conviction, as has been held; if he can dispose of it by will to vest as he shall direct after his death,—then, clearly, he is neither dead in fact nor in law, and a priori there can be no descent of his estate to "his heirs-at-law," under such circumstances. We do not deem it important to pursue the inquiry to any greater extent. We think that we have said sufficient to indicate our views of the point at issue. The subject, however, in many of its phases, is exhaustively discussed in the case of Avery v. Everett, supra, and in a learned note to that decision, as reported in volume 6 of the American State Reports, (page 379.) See also 2 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 899. We have no statute like that in England, providing for the appointment of a trustee or guardian of the estate of a life convict. That is a matter for the determination of the legislative department. We conclude that the conviction and sentence of C. O. Davis did not effect a devolution of the title to his land upon the plaintiffs in this case as his heirs-at-law, and that the maxim, nemo est heres viventis, applies.

The judgment should be affirmed.

his property. Avery v. Everett, 1 L. R. A. 264, 110 N. Y. 817, 6 Am. St. Rep. 868.

The English cases hold that attainder or civil death does not prevent a person from being sued in a civil action. Banyster v. Trussel, Cro. Elis. 516; Ramsay v. McDonald, 1 Wils. 217; Coppin v. Gunner 3 Ld. Raym. 1572.

An early New York case which is little more than a memorandum holds that sentence to state prison for life which constitutes civil death abates a civil action against the convict. Graham v. Adams, 2 Johns. Cas. 408.

The same doctrine is asserted again in Freeman v. Frank, 10 Abb. Fr. 870, although in this case it is held that an answer setting up the fact of such imprisonment and civil death is demurrable since the very fact of answering shows that he is able to defend.

So in O'Brien v. Hagan, 1 Duer, 664, it is held that under § N. Y. Rev. Stat. 701, § 19, which suspends all civil rights of a convict during imprisonment in state prison, a suit against him is abated.

But these cases are overthrown by other cases in the same state, in which, although the question was in fact as to imprisonment for years, the doctrine is plainly declared in harmony with the English cases to the effect that a person sentenced to state prison whether for life or for years is subject either to the commencement or the continuation 18 L. R. A.

of a civil action against him. Morris v. Walsh, 14 Abb. Pr. 387; Phelps v. Phelps, 7 Paige, 150, 4 L. ed. 102; Davis v. Duffie, 3 Keyes, 606, affirming 3 Bosw. 619; Bonnell v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 12 Hun, 218.

And in New Jersey it was decided that a conviction of treason with the consequent confiscation of property did not prevent maintaining a civil action against the person convicted. Dunham v. Drake, 1 N. J. L. 815.

In Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 1697, it is provided that "a sentence of imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term less than life suspends all civil rights of the person so sentenced during the term thereof. . . . And the person sentenced to such imprisonment for life shall thereafter be deemed civilly dead." State v. Reeves, 97 Mo. 668.

To the same effect are the provisions of the Penal Code of California' (Desty, Pen. Code Cal. § 673, 674); and also of Oregon. Hill, Laws of Oregon, § 2022.

A bankrupt is for many purposes civilliter mortuus. International Bank v. Sherman, 101 U. S. 406, 25 L. ed. 866.

When a corporation becomes insolvent it is so far civilly dead that its property may be administered as a trust fund for the benefit of its stockholders and creditors. Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 102 U. S. 148, 25 L. ed. 106. A. P. W.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

James A. STEELE

v.

GERMAN INSURANCE CO., of Freeport,

1. Failure to make proofs of loss within sixty days after the fire, as required by Michigan standard policy, which provides that the loss shall not become payable until sixty days after such proofs and that no suit or action shall be maintainable "until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements nor unless commenced within twelve months next after the fire," will not make the policy void where the specified requirements in fourteen cases expressly provide for a forfeiture in case of failure to comply therewith but no such provision is made in respect to the proof of loss.

2. A false statement in an application for insurance that there is no other insurance on the property will not make the policy void where the other insurance was placed upon it by the same insurance agents and the statement of the insured to the agents who wrote the application was that there was no other insurance except what they had placed on the property.

3. The acts of clerks of insurance agents who solicit insurance, make out applications and policies, and generally attend to the business of such agents, are as binding as though done by the agents themselves.

4. Whether lumbermen's tools, second-hand furniture, and camp equipment included within a policy of insurance on a stock of dry-goods, groceries, hardware, queensware, hats, caps, boots, shoes and such other articles not more hazardous as are usually kept for sale in country stores, is a question for the jury where the evidence is conflicting as to the character of the property.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ionia County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due under a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. George S. Steele for appellant.

Messrs. Davis & Nichols for appellee.

Grant, J., delivered the following opinion:

This is an action to recover upon a policy of insurance for loss by fire. Four objections are

NOTE.—Forfeiture of insurance by failure to furnish proofs of loss within a stipulated time.

The very slight difference in the language which distinguishes the above case from the Gould Case, which is discussed in the opinion and in which a contrary decision was made by the same court, illustrates the difficulty of the question where a failure to furnish proofs of loss within the exact time stipulated will constitute a forfeiture of the insurance.

The question has not been squarely presented and decided in a very large number of cases, but in several it has been held that no forfeiture occurs by failure to furnish proofs of loss within the exact period stipulated therefor unless there is an express provision in the policy making such default a cause of forfeiture. Coventry Mut. Live Stock Ins. Assn. v. Evans, 102 Pa. 281; Vanzindertaelen v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (Wis.) April 12, 1892; Hall v. Concordia F. Ins. Co. 90 Mich. 408; Tubbs v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 84 Mich. 646; Kenton Ins. Co. v. Downs, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 115.

The case of Kenton Ins. Co. v. Downs, supra, was very similar to the main case as there were a large number of stipulations expressly making the policy void and following these, without such an express stipulation, a requirement that the proofs of loss must be furnished within thirty days, and then a provision that there should be no suit until after all the conditions, provisions, and requirements of the policy have been complied with. The failure to make proofs within the thirty days was held not a cause of forfeiture.

Likewise in the case of Hall v. Concordia F. Ins. Co., 90 Mich. 408, the policy made numerous express provisions as to causes of forfeiture, and declared that it should not be due until sixty days after all requirements of the policy had been complied with, and it was held that a failure to make proofs within thirty days as stipulated was not a ground of forfeiture.

Several New York cases have touched upon the question, but in each of them the decision may be said to rest more on the unreasonableness of the delay in furnishing the proofs than on the doctrine of forfeiture for failure to comply strictly with the requirement as a condition precedent. In Quinlan v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., 138 N. Y. 856, the court in speaking collectively of provisions as to an indorsement in case of foreclosure proceedings, immediate notice of loss and a sworn statement within sixty days, says these are conditions precedent, and adds that the authorities are conclusive that the non-performance of these conditions or any one of them constitutes a complete defense. But in that case there was more than six months' delay after the sixty days' limitation in furnishing the proofs of loss, and the other conditions mentioned were also violated; so the court might not feel itself bound by this decision to hold that a mere technical failure such as a single day's delay after the time specified to furnish proofs of loss would forfeit the policy.

The case of Blossom v. Locomotive F. Ins. Co., 64 N. Y. 162, which is one of the authorities relied on in the case preceding, states that a substantial compliance with a provision as to the time for furnishing proofs of loss is necessary unless waived. In this case proofs required by the policy to be furnished within thirty days were not furnished until about four months after the loss and were held insufficient.

So in Underwood v. Farmers Joint Stock Ins. Co., 57 N. Y. 500, it is said that effect should be fairly given to such a provision as to every other part of the contract; and proofs furnished one month after a loss were held insufficient under a provision requiring them within ten days. The New York cases seem fairly reconcilable with the other cases above cited in agreement to the general doctrine that a forfeiture must be expressly stipulated by the policy in order to make a policy void for failure to furnish the proofs within a specified number of days.

For notes on the waiver of proofs of loss, see German Ins. Co. v. Gray (Kan.) 8 L. R. A. 76; Kenton Ins. Co. v. Wigginton (Ky.) 7 L. R. A. 81; Smith v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. (Vt.) 1 L. R. A. 216.

raised against the judgment, viz.: (1) Plaintiff, in his application, represented that there was no other insurance upon the property; (2) there was other insurance without the consent of the defendant; (3) proofs of loss were not made and rendered within sixty days after the fire; (4) recovery was allowed for goods not covered by the policy.

1. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff showed that defendant's local agents who placed this insurance had also placed the other insurance complained of; that they knew it at the time; that plaintiff, at the time of the making of the application, so informed them; that the defendant's agents, through their clerk, wrote out the application. It is the settled rule in these cases that the agents for insurance companies, in making out these applications do not represent the insured, but the insurer, and that the consequences of the failure to incorporate the necessary statement in the application must fall upon the insurer, and not upon the insured, who has made an honest statement of the facts. Russell v. Detroit Mut. F. Ins. Co. 80 Mich. 407; Gristock v. Royal Ins. Co. 84 Mich. 161; Gristock v. Royal Ins. Co. 87 Mich. 428; O'Brien v. Ohio Ins. Co. 52 Mich. 181.

No question of waiver upon the first two points is involved. The clerk of the local agents wrote out the application, and to him plaintiff said that there was no other insurance except what they themselves had placed upon the property. This testimony was objected to as incompetent, upon the ground that the acts of and statements made to and by said clerk were not binding upon the defendant. The precise claim is that the local agents cannot redelegate their authority to clerks, unless such authority to delegate is conveyed in express terms. In general, this is true, but courts will recognize the ordinary course of business. It must be well known that these local agents do their business to a very large extent through clerks, who solicit insurance, make out applications and policies, and generally attend to the business of their employers. In such cases their acts are as binding as though done by the agents themselves. Story, Ag. § 14; Continental Ins. Co. v. Ruckman, 127 Ill. 864; Iodine v. Exchange F. Ins. Co. 51 N. Y. 117, 10 Am. Rep. 566; Bennett v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. 70 Iowa, 600.

2. This was a Michigan standard policy, and contained the following provision: "If fire occur, the insured shall give immediate notice of any loss thereof in writing to this company; . . . make a complete inventory of the property, stating the quantity and cost of each article, and the amount claimed thereon; and within sixty days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing by this company, shall render a statement to this company, signed and sworn to by said insured, stating the knowledge and belief of the insured as to the time and origin of the fire; the interest of the insured and all others in the property; the cash value of each item thereof, and the amount of loss thereon; all incumbrances thereon; all other insurance, whether valid or not, covering any of said property; and a copy of all the descriptions and schedules in all policies; any changes in the title, use, occupation, location, possession or exposure of said property since the issuing of this policy; by whom and for what purpose any building herein described, and the several parts thereof, were occupied at the time of the fire. . . . This company shall not be held to have waived any provision or condition of this policy, or any forfeiture thereof, by any requirement, act or proceeding on its part relating to the appraisal or to any examination herein provided for; and the loss shall not become payable until sixty days after the notice . . . and satisfactory proof of the loss herein required have been received by this company. . . . No suit or action on this policy for the recovery of any claim shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months next after the fire. . . . This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions . . . and no officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy, except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon, or added hereto, and as to such provisions and conditions no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power, or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written or attached hereto; nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached." The fire occurred March 12, and proofs of loss were not furnished until October, three days before suit was commenced. It is insisted that proofs of loss within the time required by the policy were waived. The facts upon which the alleged waiver was based are as follows: Immediately after the fire, plaintiff notified the local agents by telegram, and received a dispatch in reply. Two days after the fire the local agents sent one of their employes to the plaintiff. They went to the place of the fire, and the employe asked plaintiff how it occurred, to which plaintiff replied he would like to know himself. Plaintiff then testified: "We looked it over, and he asked me if I had a statement of what was burned. I told him I had. 'Well,' he said, 'you may take a copy of it, and send it to our office, and I will notify the companies, and they will send an adjuster to adjust the loss; and it might be such a thing that Mr. Weatherwax will adjust it.' He didn't say that he would, but that it might be such a thing that Mr. Weatherwax would adjust the loss. After this conversation I made out a statement, and sent it to Stanton, to Weatherwax & Co., the local agents." March 22, the local agents acknowledged the receipt of this statement by letter, and wrote, "We have notified the companies, and expect prompt attention." April 11, the local agents again wrote plaintiff, saying: "The insurance companies have authorized Mr. C. C. Kemp, of Greenville, to settle your loss. I just heard of it today. Now, if you will write him at Greenville, you can, I presume, arrange with him a time to come to Stanton, and meet at our office, and settle up your loss." Mr. Kemp was not the agent or adjuster for the defendant, and had no authority to act for it. He represented the Hibernia Insurance Company, which had the other and prior policy upon the same property. About three weeks after sending the invoice to Weatherwax & Co., plaintiff met Mr. Kemp, and had a talk with him about the loss. He says that Kemp did not say anything to him particularly as to what company he was working for; that Kemp told him to send to Weatherwax & Co. for the invoice; that he would be back again in a couple of days; that meantime he would communicate with the other company; that after he returned from Detroit, where he was going to adjust a loss, he would meet plaintiff, and settle the matter with him. Not hearing from Kemp for a week or ten days, he wrote him again, stating that he had got the invoice, and would like to meet him; that, receiving no reply, he wrote him again, but received no reply to this letter. He did nothing further until the last of August, when in the office of the local agents, one of their employes asked him if he had settled with the company, and, upon being informed that he had not, the employe said that they had notified the company, and thought it very queer that they had not settled the loss. On cross-examination plaintiff testified that before he saw Kemp he supposed that he represented both companies, but that before Kemp left he understood that he appeared for one company,—the Hibernia. When asked what caused him to delay sending proofs to the defendant, he replied, "Well, I kept waiting,—waiting to see their adjuster." It is not claimed that plaintiff did not know the requirements of his policy as to furnishing proofs of loss. It was a part of his contract which he was bound to perform, if not waived. It conclusively appears from his own testimony that he had no conversation or communication with any officer of the company authorized to adjust his loss or waive the proofs. It is also evident that he knew this. This case is therefore clearly distinguishable from Gristock v. Royal Ins. Co., 84 Mich. 161, where the adjuster had agreed with the insured upon the value of most of the property, and had agreed upon arbitration as to the rest; and from Young v. Ohio Farmers Ins. Co. (Mich.) 52 N. W. Rep. 454, where the insured offered what he termed "proofs of loss" to the adjuster, who assured him that he did not care for them, and that they were not necessary. The language of this court in Cleaver v. Traders Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 532, 533, is applicable here. Under this record, there is, in my judgment, no room for serious contention that this requirement of the policy was waived.

3. Did the failure to furnish proofs of loss avoid the policy? I think the question must be answered in the affirmative, according to the rule recognized by this court in Gould v. Dwelling-House Ins. Co., 90 Mich. 302. The clause in that policy was, "No action shall be sustained in any court unless the insured shall have fully complied with all the foregoing requirements," among which was one requiring proofs to be furnished within a specified time. The clause in this policy differs only in that it uses the word "until" instead of the word

"unless." It is suggested that by the use of the word "until" the contract should be construed to mean that the insured cannot bring a suit within the sixty days without furnishing the proofs, but that he may bring his suit at any time after that within the year upon furnishing proofs. I am unable to concur in this view. Under such construction, this important condition, to be performed by the insured, would be useless to the insurer. Of what use or benefit to the defendant in this case were the proofs of loss furnished to it only three days before suit was brought? The condition is a reasonable one, and the reasons for it are too obvious to require mention. This policy was issued in accordance with the requirements of the statutes of this state. How. Stat. 4344-4353. The contract, besides being the deliberate meeting of the minds of the parties, is expressly directed and authorized by this law. Certainly the insured should be required to comply with it as well as the insurer. No one can misunderstand his obligation under such a contract. Every man of sense would at once recognize his duty under it. To hold as suggested would be to say that the insured may furnish his proofs at any time within twelve months,—that being the time limited for the bringing of suit,—provided only that he furnish them before he brings suit. This would be making a contract for the parties, instead of interpreting one that they themselves have made under the express provision of the law; and especially is this true in the light of the provision that any extension of time must be in writing. Blossom v. Lycoming F. Ins. Co. 64 N. Y. 162.

4. In view of the possibility of a new trial, one other point will be determined. The property covered was described as a stock of dry goods, groceries, hardware, queensware, hats, caps, boots, shoes, and such other articles, not more hazardous, as are usually kept for sale in country stores. It is insisted that a portion of the goods destroyed consisted of lumberman's tools, second-hand furniture, and camp equipment, which cannot come under the head of merchandise, and that they were stored in the building merely for safe-keeping. There was a conflict of evidence as to the character of this property, and the question was properly left to the jury, the court instructing them that, if they found any of the articles did not come within the class of goods mentioned, the plaintiff could not recover for them. Judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

McGrath, J., delivered the following opinion:

This action is upon a Michigan standard policy, which contains the following provisions: "The sum for which this company is liable pursuant to this policy shall be payable sixty days after due notice, ascertainment, estimate and satisfactory proof of loss have been received by this company in accordance with the terms of this policy. . . . If fire occur, the insured shall give immediate notice of any loss thereby in writing to this company, . . . and within sixty days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing by this company, shall render a statement ordinarily denominated 'proofs of loss.' . . . The

The policy contains a number of other distinct paragraphs limiting the liability of the company. One provides that the entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented any material fact, or if he has misrepresented his interest, or in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to the insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after the loss; another declares that the entire policy shall be void upon the happening of any one of fourteen contingencies; another provides that "this company shall not be liable for loss" in a number of enumerated cases; another that in a certain contingency the insurance shall cease; another that the company shall not be liable for losses to certain classes of property, enumerating them, unless, etc. Then follows the provision that "no suit or action on this policy shall be maintainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months next after the fire." This latter provision clearly refers to such requirements in the policy as relate to the notice of loss, proofs, and adjustment of the loss; and its evident intent is to provide that no suit can be maintained unless commenced within one year, and in no event until after compliance with such requirements. The use of the words "until after" distinguishes this case from the Gould Case, 90 Mich. 303, and brings it within the rule laid down in the Tubbs Case, 84 Mich. 646. The effect of misstatement, of changed condition and contingency, of omission and commission, of fraud and false swearing, is explicitly declared in each other paragraph in which the act, omission, or contingency is referred to; even the effect of false swearing in the proofs of loss is specifically declared, but the paragraph relating to proofs of loss suggests no penalty. This omission in an instrument replete with clear and explicit declarations of forfeiture is worthy of note. The presence of the declaration of forfeiture in every other instance, and its absence in this, is clearly not an oversight. Time is not made the essence of the provision relating to proofs, and in the paragraph relied upon by defendant the words "until after" import order or sequence, rather than an intent to make performance within the time specified the essence of the requirement. The selection of this phraseology seems to me inconsistent with such a purpose. The language has reference to the thing to be done before suit brought, rather than the time within which it is to be done. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the question of waiver.

Upon the other points I concur with Mr. Justice Grant, and the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

* 1. It is a well-settled rule that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to all judicial sales, subject to the qualifications that the purchaser is entitled to relief on the ground of after-discovered mistake in material facts or fraud, where he is free from negligence. He is bound to examine the title, and not rely upon statements made by the officer conducting the sale as to its condition. If he buys

NOTE.—Effect of misrepresentation to purchasers by sheriff on a judicial sale.

A careful examination of the question shows very few authorities directly touching the effect of a sheriff's misrepresentations to a purchaser on an execution or judicial sale. In the above case the question is not directly decided since it is held that the purchaser had constructive notice of the facts as to the title by the pleadings and record and also that the misrepresentations made were misstatements of law merely and not of fact.

The case most nearly in point is that of Van-sooyoc v. Klimler, 77 Ill. 151, in which it is held that a sheriff's misrepresentations as to the freedom of the property from incumbrances were not grounds for setting aside a sale to the plaintiff in execution as the sheriff was his agent rather than that of the defendant.

In Reed v. Diven, 7 Ind. 189, it was held that untrue representations stating an excessive amount of incumbrances was a fraud upon the execution defendant and this with other grounds was held sufficient to set aside a sale and thus protect the defendant. The case was thus brought within the common rule that a fraud on the execution defendant whereby the property was sacrificed would be 18 L. R. A. ground of relief from the sale. This is evidently quite a different question from that of the effect of misrepresentations whereby the purchaser is misled.

In Auwerter v. Mathiot, 9 Serg. & R. 397, it was said by way of argument that if the sheriff gave cause to suppose a purchaser was to have a complete legal title when he would not in fact obtain it that probably he would be discharged from the purchase upon an application therefor, but this question was not in fact in the case.

In Lewark v. Carter, 3 L. R. A. 440, 117 Ind. 206, it was decided that a deputy sheriff's misrepresentations as to the title of property sold by him on execution were outside the scope of his authority and would not make the sheriff liable, at least if they were made in good faith. Also that the owner of the property would not be made liable unless he was connected with the misrepresentations.

So in Weidler v. Farmers Bank of Lancaster, 11 Serg. & R. 134, an under sheriff's assurances as to the title of property on a sale conducted by him were held not sufficient to charge a creditor in the execution so as to make him liable for money had and received unless he authorized such assurances as the under sheriff was an agent of the law and not of the parties.

2. A purchaser at a mortgage foreclosure sale will not be relieved from completing his purchase on account of defective title, or on the ground of there being prior incumbrances on the property, when the true condition of the title is fully set out in the pleadings and the record of the proceedings under which the sale was made, as he is chargeable with notice of such material facts as the record discloses.

ERROR to the District Court for Butler County to review an order overruling a motion by plaintiff to vacate and set aside a sale of land to him under a foreclosure decree against defendant Taylor on the ground of misrepresentation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. S. McAllister for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Steele Brothers for defendants in error.

Norval, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Nebraska Loan & Trust Company brought suit in the district court of Butler county against Byron E. Taylor and Lela A. Taylor, his wife, to foreclose a mortgage upon the S. 4 of section 12, in township 15 N., of range 1 E., executed by the Taylors, which mortgage was junior and subject to a prior mortgage of $3,000 on said real estate, owned and held by one Washington Quinlin. The court found that there was due the loan and trust company on its mortgage the sum of $1,056.60; that said Quinlin had the first lien on said premises for $3,000, with interest thereon at 6 per cent from July 1, 1888; and a decree of foreclosure was rendered, which directed the sale to be made subject to the lien of Quinlin. Subsequently an order of sale was issued, and the land, after being duly appraised and advertised, was sold by the sheriff to one W. C. Norton, the plaintiff in error herein, for the sum of $2,585. The sale was reported by the sheriff to the court, and the same was approved and confirmed. Shortly thereafter, at the same term of court, the purchaser filed a motion to vacate and set aside the sale on the ground that he was induced to purchase the property by reason of certain representations made by the sheriff and the clerk of the district court as to the character of the title the purchaser would acquire. The motion was overruled, and Norton was ordered to pay into court the amount of his bid. To reverse said order Norton prosecutes a petition in error to this court.

It appears from the affidavits filed in support of the motion to set the sale aside that Mr. Norton came to the place where the sheriff was offering the property for sale, and inquired what he was selling, to which the officer replied that it was the B. E. Taylor land, and requested Norton to make a bid thereon; that Norton thereupon asked what amount must be bid to get the land, to which the sheriff replied that under the appraisement it could not be sold for less than $2,533.60, as that was two thirds of the appraised value, and that by paying said sum he would acquire a good and perfect title to the land, free from all liens; that the sheriff and Norton then went to the office of the clerk of the district court to ascertain what amount was against the land, and the clerk, after examining the papers, told Norton he would have to bid $2,533.60 to get the land, but he had better make the bid $2,535 even, and thereby get a little above two thirds of the appraised value; that the payment of said sum would clear the land of all prior liens and incumbrances; that, relying upon said statements, Norton made a bid of $2,535, and the land was struck off to him at said sum. On the next day, the sheriff, on meeting Norton, said to him that the amount of his bid was not two thirds of the appraisement; that the land had been appraised at $4,800, and could not be sold for less than $3,200, and that, unless Norton would raise his bid to said sum, he could not have the land, whereupon Norton replied he would not bid the sum of $3,200, and the sheriff then stated that such sale must be declared off. It also appears that the statements of the sheriff and clerk were innocently made, and without any intention to mislead or deceive the purchaser. It is also shown by uncontradicted testimony that the land was well worth $6,400.

The object and purpose of the plaintiff in error is to set aside a sheriff's sale on the ground that he did not thereby acquire the title which he at the time supposed he was purchasing. No claim is made that either the plaintiff in foreclosure or Taylor or his wife was guilty of any fraud, or that any representations were made by either of them to Norton as to the character of the title to the land, or that they had any knowledge at the time of the purchase of the statements and representations made by the clerk and sheriff. The only proposition presented is whether the fact of the sheriff and clerk having represented to Norton that, if he would buy the land, he would get a clear and perfect title thereto, free from liens, although such representations were untrue, was sufficient to require the court to set aside the sale. In our view, under the facts disclosed by this record, and the law applicable thereto, plaintiff in error is not entitled to any relief. Ordinarily a purchaser at sheriff's sale takes all risks. He buys at his peril, and, if the title is bad, he must bear the loss. The rule of caveat emptor applies in all its force to all judicial sales. The court undertakes to sell the title of the defendant, such as it is, and it is the duty of the purchaser to ascertain for himself the character of the title he is about to acquire. Miller v. Finn, 1 Neb. 254; Smith v. Painter, 5 Serg. & R. 225, 9 Am. Dec. 344; Vattier v. Lytle, 6 Ohio, 478; Lewark v. Carter, 117 Ind. 206, 8 L. R. A. 440; Corwin v. Benham, 2 Ohio St. 36; Mason v. Wait, 5 Ill. 127; Bishop v. O'Conner, 69 Ill. 431; Sackett v. Twining, 18 Pa. 199, 57 Am. Dec. 590; Lynch v. Baxter, 4 Tex. 431, 51 Am. Dec. 735. An exception to the rule above stated, recognized by the weight of authorities, is where the purchaser has been induced to bid by fraud, or under a mistake of fact. A purchaser will be released from the sale on the ground of a mistake of fact, where the mistake is not the result of his own negligence, if application therefor is made at the proper time; but he will not be released from his purchase on his mere ignorance or mistake of law. Haden v. Ware, 15 Ala. 149; Burns v. Hamilton, 33 Ala. 210, 70 Am. Dec. 570; Hayes v. Stiger, 29 N. J. Eq. 196; Upham v. Hamill, 11 R. I. 565, 23 Am. Rep. 525. The facts do not bring the case at bar within the exception to the rule, so as to entitle him to have the sale set aside. Neither the clerk nor sheriff misrepresented any material fact concerning the condition of the title. They did not inform the purchaser that there were no incumbrances upon the property, nor does Norton claim that he was not aware of there being a prior mortgage of $3,000 on the premises at the time he made his bid. The clerk and sheriff supposed that the sale would extinguish all incumbrances, and that the purchaser would acquire a perfect title to the property. In so informing Norton they mistated the law, or the legal effect of the foreclosure proceedings and sale, and for which the law affords no relief. We think plaintiff in error is concluded by his own neglect. He had no right to rely upon the statements of the clerk and sheriff, but should have had the title and the proceedings under which the sale was made examined for himself, before he made his bid. Had he done so, he would have been fully apprised of the condition of the title. The records of the county and of the court are open to inspection to every one, and these records disclose the objection now urged to the title of the lands. Had an examination been made of either the petition to foreclose the mortgage, the decree, the appraisement, certificates of liens, or notice of sale, he would have ascertained that Washington Quinlin had a first lien upon the premises for $3,000 and interest, and that the sale was to be made subject thereto. If Norton was deceived, it was the result of his own negligence in not taking the precaution to examine the records. He is chargeable with knowledge of their contents. Equity will not relieve a purchaser of his own negligence. Roberts v. Hughes, 81 Ill. 180, 25 Am. Rep. 270; Vanacoyoc v. Kimler, 77 Ill. 151; Riggs v. Pursell, 60 N. Y. 193; Preston v. Breckenridge, 86 Ky. 619; White v. Seaver, 25 Barb. 235; Eccles v. Timmons, 95 N. C. 540; Webber v. Clark, 136 Ill. 256; Dennerlein v. Dennerlein, 111 N. Y. 518.

In Eccles v. Timmons, supra, it is held that a purchaser at a judicial sale will not be released from his bid on the ground that the title is imperfect when the true state of the title is set out in the pleadings under which the sale was made. Dennerlein v. Dennerlein, supra, was a partners' sale. The property was described in the proceedings and in the notice of sale by metes and bounds, and as "containing thirty-one acres, be the same more or less." Prior to the sale, hand-bills were issued in the name of the referee who made the sale, in which the boundary lines of the premises were omitted and the property described as the farm of "the late John Dennerlein, containing thirty-one acres." The purchaser, in bidding upon the property, relied upon the statement in the handbills as to the quantity of land. Subsequently he discovered that the premises only contained 24½ acres, and applied to the court for an order releasing him from completing the purchase on the ground that he had been misled as to the number of acres, which motion was denied. He appealed to the general term, where the order was affirmed (46 Hun, 561), and on appeal to the court of appeals of New York it was held that he was not entitled to relief. Vanacoyoc v. Kimler, supra, was an appeal from an order of the circuit court sustaining a motion made therein by the purchaser to set aside a sale of a tract of land made upon execution, on the ground that he was led to believe, by misrepresentations made by the officer conducting the sale, that the land was not incumbered, when in fact it was mortgaged in excess of its value. The supreme court held that the maxim of caveat emptor applied, and that the misrepresentation of the sheriff afforded no ground for setting aside the sale. In the case at bar the price paid was so greatly inadequate to the real value of the land as to put the purchaser on inquiry. He should have known that a half-section of land, which the evidence shows was well worth $6,400, would sell for more than $2,535,—the amount of his bid,—if there was no prior incumbrance. The land was actually worth several hundred dollars more than the amount bid by Norton and the Quinlin lien combined, so that, instead of losing anything by the transaction, the investment is still a profitable one. He does not complain that he has lost anything by the transaction, but rather that he failed to double on the investment.

Concerning what took place between the sheriff and Norton the day following the sale, to which reference has been made, we will say that it is unexplainable how the former made the statement he did, if correctly quoted in Mr. Norton's affidavit, in regard to what the land was appraised at. It is not true that it had been appraised at $4,800, and could not be sold for less than $3,200. The sum bid by Norton was more than two thirds the appraised value of the land as shown by the appraisement. However, what the sheriff may have said in that regard, as well as the statement that "the sale must be declared off," is of no importance for the reason that the status of Norton as purchaser was fixed when his bid was accepted. The officer had no power or authority to afterwards release him from his purchase.

It is contended that this case falls within, and is controlled by, that of Paulett v. Peabody, 3 Neb. 196, and Fraser v. Ingham, 4 Neb. 531. We do not think so. These cases were decided upon facts materially different from these. In the first case there was a decree of foreclosure of a junior mortgage in a suit wherein the senior mortgagee was not a party. The property was sold under a decree by the sheriff, the purchaser being induced to buy the property through the false representations of the attorneys of both the plaintiff and the senior mortgagee that the prior mortgage would be paid off out of the proceeds of the sale, and that he would take the property discharged of such lien. It was held that said false representations of the parties were sufficient grounds for vacating the sale. In the case we are considering it is not pretended that any misrepresrepresentations or fraud can be imputed to any of the parties to the suit or to Quinlin, the senior mortgagee, whereby Norton was induced to buy the land. Of course, when a fraud is practiced upon the purchaser at a judicial sale by the party in interest, which induced the purchaser to make his bid, the sale will be set aside therefor. But the rule has no application here. In the case reported in 4 Neb. 581, the sheriff levied an execution upon, appraised and sold a tract of land covered with timber. The sale was duly confirmed and a deed executed to the purchaser. Afterwards it was discovered that the record of the proceedings under the writ described another tract, near by, which was of no value whatever. It was held, on a petition of the purchaser to set aside the sale, that he was entitled to relief. Clearly the case is not analogous to the one before us, for in this case there was no error in describing the lands, as in the case cited. The doctrine announced in these decisions should not be extended to cases not clearly of their class. We are of the opinion that the district court did not err in overruling the motion of the plaintiff in error to set the sale aside, and its decision is affirmed.

Post, J., concurs.

Maxwell, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am unable to give my assent to the opinion of the majority of the court, and will as briefly as possible state my reasons for failing to concur with the majority. This is an application to compel the purchaser of land under a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage to complete the purchase by paying the amount of his bid. He answers, in effect, that he was induced to bid by the misrepresentations of the officer conducting the sale, and that a large mortgage, viz., $3,000, exists as an incumbrance against the land, which he was induced to believe would be satisfied out of the proceeds of sale. The cause was submitted to the court on affidavits as follows:

"W. C. Norton, being first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that on the 14th day of September, 1889, while the sale was being made of the lands sold under the order of sale in this case, this affiant had a conversation with the sheriff of said county, who was then and there conducting the said sale, wherein said sheriff stated to this affiant that said land, under the appraisement, could not be sold for less than $2,538.60, and that, under the appraisement, said last-named amount would be sufficient to buy the same. That said sheriff then and there examined the report of the appraisers, the certificates of the county clerk, clerk of the district court, and county treasurer, and, after making said examination, and after figuring up the amount of the decree and the amount of liens on said land, stated to this affiant that the said sum of $2,538.60 would be sufficient to purchase said land, and that by paying the said sum of $2,538.60 this affiant would acquire a good and perfect title to said land, free and clear of all previous liens or incumbrances. This affiant then and there trusted and believed the said statement and representation of said sheriff, and then and there believed that by bidding the sum of

$2,535 for said land, and paying the said sum of $2,535 therefor, he would receive and have a good title to said land free and clear of all other liens and incumbrances thereon. Said affiant then and there stated to said sheriff that he would give the sum of $2,535 for said land if he thereby would acquire a clear deed and title to said land, free of all prior liens and incumbrances. That said sheriff then and there stated that this affiant would acquire such a deed and title. Affiant says that the clerk of this court, Ed. G. Hall, was also present when said sheriff stated to this affiant that a bid of $2,535 would entitle the purchaser to a deed for said land, and that the payment of said $2,535 would clear said land of all prior liens and incumbrances, and that said Ed. G. Hall then and there assisted said sheriff to look over and examine said appraisement and certificates, and assisted to figure up the amount of said decree and said liens; and the said Ed. G. Hall also then and there, before the time he, this affiant, bid the said sum of $2,535, said that it was more than two thirds of the appraised value of said land, and that by bidding the said sum of $2,535 he would be entitled to a deed therefor, and that a deed under said bid would entitle the purchaser to a deed free and clear of all prior liens and incumbrances. That this affiant then and there believed and trusted in the said statements and representations of said sheriff and said clerk, and acted upon their said statements and representations in making said bid. Affiant says that said sheriff and said clerk stated to said affiant that no bid less than $2,538.60 could be received for said land, stating that said last-named amount was two thirds of the value of said land; and that, after the payment of said amount, there would be no prior liens on said land. That on the next day after bidding said sum of $2,535 for said land, to wit, on the 15th day of September, 1889, he met said sheriff, whereupon said sheriff stated to this affiant that the said amount bid by this affiant, to wit, $2,535, was not two thirds of the appraised value of said land; that said land had been appraised at the sum of $4,800, and could not be sold for less than $3,200, and that unless he, this affiant, would raise his said bid to said sum of $3,200, he, said sheriff, could not sell said land to this affiant, whereupon said affiant stated to said sheriff that he, this affiant, would not bid the said sum of $3,200. That said sheriff then stated to this affiant that said sale must be declared off, and no sale, as he, said sheriff, could not sell said land for less than $3,200. That this affiant then and there believed that his said bid of $2,535 was wholly rejected by said sheriff, and he would not be held to act upon said bid or pay for said land, and paid no more attention to said pretended purchase, and did not suppose or anticipate that any effort would be made to confirm said sale, offer or bid, and was not present in court when said sale was confirmed, and had no notice that an application would be made to this court to confirm said sale, and was not in the court room, and not in Butler county, when the sale was confirmed. That, if he had known or supposed that an application was going to be made to this court to ratify or confirm his said bid, he would have appeared by counsel and have opposed said confirmation, on the ground and for the reason that in fact he was misled and deceived by the said statements and representations of said sheriff and said clerk, in this, to wit: First. That the decree under which said land was sold was not a first lien on said land; that in fact there was a prior lien on said land, amounting to the sum of $8,000, and that said land was sold subject to said prior lien of $8,000, which said prior lien of $8,000 consists of a mortgage given thereon by Byron E. Taylor and wife to the Nebraska Loan & Trust Co., which said mortgage is in full force and effect, and not yet due. Second. That said land, or the interest therein, of said Byron E. Taylor and wife, was not appraised at the sum of $8,000, as stated by said sheriff and said clerk at and before the time of said bid, but that said interest of Byron E. Taylor and wife in said premises was appraised at the sum of $1,478.64, and that in fact said land could have been bought at said sale for two thirds of said last-named amount, as fully appears by the records and files in this proceeding. That, if this affiant had known the true condition of liens and incumbrances on said land, and had been correctly informed of the true condition of affairs regarding liens and incumbrances on said land by said sheriff and said clerk, he would not have purchased or bid on said land, and, had he known or supposed that an application was about to be or going to be made to this court to confirm said sale, and had he not been misled by the said sheriff telling this affiant that he, said sheriff, could not accept said bid, he, this affiant, would have at once, and before the confirmation of this sale, taken steps to examine and determine the regularity of said sale and the reasonable or unreasonable extent of his said bid. That he had no knowledge or information that an application had been made to confirm said sale until after the same was confirmed by this court, whereupon he at once took steps to institute this motion, and says that a great wrong, hardship and injustice will be done this affiant if he is compelled to pay the amount of his said bid or offer, and that said bid or offer was made under a misapprehension of the true facts surrounding said bid or offer, as stated and recited in this affidavit. W. C. Norton."

"I, Ed. G. Hall, being first duly sworn, depose and say I am the clerk of the district court of Butler county, Nebraska, duly qualified and acting as such, and was on the 14th day of September, 1889; and on the said 14th day of September the sheriff of Butler county was making sale of one Byron E. Taylor's farm by virtue of an order of sale in the above-entitled cause. That during the time of said sale the said sheriff came to my office, and I asked of him, 'Have you a bidder for the land?' He answered: 'No, I have not; but I think Norton is going to buy it.' He then went out, and shortly after W. C. Norton came to my office, and asked me how much there was against the Byron E. Taylor farm. Before having time to answer, the sheriff returned, and, together with said Norton, seated themselves at a desk in my office. While at the desk I heard said Norton say to the sheriff, 'If you'll make me a clear title to the land, I will buy it.' The sheriff then said, 'I will make you a sheriff's deed.' I then said, 'A sheriff's deed is as good a deed as can be made;' that his, said Norton's, title would be perfectly good upon receipt of a deed of that kind. I then picked up from the desk the order of sale and certificates attached, and said to the said Norton, 'I will tell you in a minute what you'll have to pay to get the land;' but, upon looking over the papers, did not find the said appraisement, and, being in a hurry, asked the sheriff what the appraisement was. He replied that it was $——. I then said to said Norton: 'You'll have to pay two thirds of this amount, which will be $2,533.60;' and I further said to the said Norton: 'You had better make the bid $2,535 even. You'll be sure then to cover everything.' I also told said Norton that all other liens would be canceled as against this land when the sale was confirmed, not knowing at that time that said sale was being made subject to the lien of Washington Quinlin for $3,000, but did know that said lien and mortgage did exist, but believed and told said Norton that said lien would be no good if the sale was confirmed under his bid. And further this affiant sayeth not. Ed. G. Hall."

It will be observed that Norton applied to the clerk who should have had the appraisement if the sheriff had done his duty. The appraisement would have shown what liens existed against the land. The sheriff did not seem to have it in his possession. In view of the course he pursued afterwards, it is probable that he had a design in suppressing the appraisement.

"I, Sumner Darnell, being first duly sworn, depose and say that I am the sheriff of said county, duly qualified, and acting as such. That on the 14th day of September, 1889, while I was offering the land described in the order of sale in the above named cause for sale under an order of sale issued in the above-entitled cause on the 12th day of July, 1889, one W. C. Norton came to me, and said, 'What is this you are selling?' I says, 'A farm.' He says, 'What farm?' and I says, 'E. B. Taylor's.' He says, 'What have you been offered?' I told him, 'I have no bid yet,' and asked him to make a bid. He, Norton, said, 'What is there against it?' Then I told him to go up stairs to the clerk of the district court, Ed. G. Hall, who is there in his office, and see for himself. Then he, Norton, says, 'If you will make me a clear title, I'll give you $——.' Then he went upstairs to the office of the clerk of said district court. In a few minutes I followed. I asked him what he had found out. Ed. G. Hall, the said clerk, said, 'It will take $2,533 to make two thirds of the appraised value.' Then Ed. G. Hall says: 'You had better make it $2,535, and make sure that the amount is sufficient for the two thirds of the appraised value.' And I, believing that the two thirds of said appraisement was $2,533.60, and believing in good faith that that was the least amount that would buy said land at said sale, said, 'Yes, you had better make it $2,535;' and he, Norton, said, 'Well, I'll raise it that much if you'll make me a good deed.' I said, 'I'll make you as good a deed as a sheriff can make,' or words to that effect. Then I went down—stairs, and, receiving no other bid, declared it sold to W. C. Norton. The next day, the 15th of September, or within a day or so after, I met said W. C. Norton, and told him there was a mistake, and that his bid was not two thirds of the appraised value of said land, and the sale would not be confirmed, as I believed. And then he said, 'I will not raise my bid,' and 'I will not take the land.' That said W. C. Norton made no other bid than the offer I have above described. Sumner Darnell."

As an offset to these affidavits, a number of persons were permitted to swear that the land in question was of greater value than the amount fixed by the appraisers and it was worth from $15 to $20 per acre. It is very clear to my mind that if the testimony of the witnesses swearing to the increased value is true, it is an additional reason why the sale should be set aside because the landowner is being defrauded. As an evidence that the testimony is not true, however, the landowner, as well as the trust company, is here insisting on the performance of the contract, evidently believing that the property would not bring as much if again offered for sale; but, even if the affidavits are true as to the value, they cannot be considered in this case. Suppose the plaintiff in error to be a man of very limited means, who desired the land for a farm, and was able to procure a loan thereon, if free and unincumbered, for $3,000, but utterly unable to obtain a loan for any greater sum. In a case of that kind it would be possible to rob him of every cent he possessed by compelling him to accept property subject to a heavy incumbrance when he had no means of satisfying the same. It will not do to say that the plaintiff in error possesses sufficient means, and is able to satisfy the incumbrance, because the same rule must apply to rich and poor alike, and both will suffer by the proposed rule. It will be observed that the majority opinion is predicated almost wholly upon sheriffs' sales under executions in actions at law or in partition cases. The case of Eccles v. Timmons, 95 N. C. 540, cited in that opinion, was a partition case, and the title of the various parties was set out in the petition. In that case the petition evidently contained a condensed statement of the title of the several parties, and the objection was not made for many months after the purchaser had taken possession, and not until a payment was due. It is said: "It will be observed that the title of the defendant tenants is set out in the petition, and a copy of the deed under which they derive it annexed thereto. With the information thus furnished or of easy access, the purchaser bids for the lots, pays part of the purchase money, and secures the residue by a note with the allowed credit. This credit expired on December 1, 1885, and seven months thereafter, when served with a notice of a demand for judgment, for the first time the defense is set up of an imperfect title to the lot. It is not a case when, upon the face of the pleadings, a perfect title purports to be sold that is afterwards discovered to be defective, when the court will relieve, and not compel, the purchaser to pay for what he does not get. But the true state of the title appears in the averments in the petition itself, so that every bidder may know by examination what estate he will acquire in the land; and his bid must therefore be regarded as his own estimate of the value of what he may buy, and the court may direct thereafter to be conveyed." "A sale by the master in a case of this kind" (for partition), says Ruffin, Ch. J., in Smith v. Brittain, 88 N. C. 847, 851, "is but a mode of sale by the parties themselves. It is not merely a sale by the law, in invitum, of such interest as the party has or may have in which the rule is caveat emptor, but professes to be a sale of a particular estate, stated in the pleadings to be vested in the parties, and to be disposed of for the purpose of partition only. Thereupon, if there be no such title, the purchaser has the same equity against being compelled to go on with his purchase as if the contract had been made without the intervention of the court, for in truth the title has never been judicially passed on between persons contesting it." It seems to me the case is directly against the majority opinion in this case. A sheriff is the officer provided by law in each county to execute the ordinary process of the court. His duties are clearly pointed out by statute. While, to a considerable extent, he is under the control of the court, yet he does not derive his power from it. Where, however, a court renders a decree of foreclosure, it directs the sale to be made by some particular person; not necessarily the sheriff. This person may be the sheriff, but, if so, it is because he is designated by the court to make the sale, and not because the duty devolves upon him as sheriff. A sale under a decree of foreclosure under the former chancery practice was made by a master in chancery or some one designated by the court; and the same rule prevails under the Code, except that the office of master has been abolished, and the court is authorized to appoint a commissioner to conduct the sale. In either case the sale is made by the court, and the person conducting the sale is the agent of the court.

In Veeder v. Fonda, 3 Paige, 97, 3 L. ed. 73, it is said: "As property to a vast extent is sold under the decrees and orders of this court, much of which property belongs to infants and others who are not able to protect their own rights, it has always been an important object with the court to encourage a fair competition at master's sale. For this purpose it is necessary that purchasers at such sales should understand that no deception whatever will be permitted to be practiced upon them. That in a contract between them and the court they will not be compelled to carry that contract into effect under circumstances where it would not be perfectly just and conscientious in an individual to insist upon the performance of the contract against the purchaser, if the sale had been made by such individual or his agent. It is therefore a principle of the court that the master who sells the property shall not, in the description of the same, add any particular which may unduly enhance the value of the property, or mislead the purchaser." To the same effect are Post v. Leet, 8 Paige, 837, 4 L. ed. 451; Seaman v. Hicks, 8 Paige, 656, 4 L. ed. 580. In the last case cited it is said: "The terms of sale show that the land was sold as and for a good title, except as to the incumbrance mentioned. The court therefore ought not to compel the purchaser to complete his purchase, unless he would have obtained, under the master's deed, such an interest, both in the land and in the buildings thereon, as he was authorized to suppose he was buying when the property was struck down to him upon his bid." The court in that case, however, reached the conclusion that the title was as represented, and required the purchaser to perform. See also Kauffman v. Walker, 9 Md. 229; Merwin v. Smith, 2 N. J. Eq. 182; Den v. Zellers, 7 N. J. L. 185; Hodgson v. Farrell, 15 N. J. Eq. 88. Many other cases to the same effect might be cited.

Where a sale is conducted by a commissioner under a decree of foreclosure, the commissioner represents the court. He is the hand of the court, so to speak, by which the decree is carried into effect. Any misrepresentation made by him, even if innocently made, but by reason of which the purchaser has been induced to bid, and will not acquire the interest which he is lead to believe he would acquire, are sufficient to justify setting the sale aside. This, so far as I am aware, is a uniform rule in the courts of equity: that, if the person who conducted the sale made misstatements, either honestly, ignorantly, or intentionally, whereby the purchaser was deceived and would be defrauded, the sale will not be sustained against his objection. It is no answer to say in effect that the property is cheap enough anyway, and therefore the purchaser receives the worth of his money. That is begging the question. In effect, it is admitting all that is claimed, but seeking to excuse the denial of relief. The purchaser may justly say: "I was deceived by the false representations of your agent. He misstated the facts. The appraisement was not at hand so that even the clerk could not obtain it. There was no bid but mine, and that was procured by falsehood and misrepresentation." The misrepresentation is admitted, and the court answers the purchaser in effect: "You had no right to rely upon the representations of the commissioner appointed by the court to conduct the sale; and, although you were the sole bidder, and there was the incumbrance of $3,000 on the land, of which you had no notice, and was in excess of the amount of your bid, yet the land is cheap enough and the court will not relieve you."

In regard to the objection that the purchaser could have examined the title for himself, the answer is that there was no time to make an investigation of the title. The sheriff had offered, and was then offering, the property for sale. There were no bidders. Norton came up and inquired in regard to the sale, and the title that would be acquired. The officer professed to know and informed the party that he would obtain a clear title. The bidder certainly could rely upon this statement. Had the officer said: "I have no knowledge in regard to the matter. You must examine the records for yourself,"—then the purchaser would have bid at his peril, and the doctrine of caveat emptor would have applied. Considerable stress is laid upon the doctrine of caveat emptor, and it is said the purchaser must beware. The doctrine does not apply where a party has been induced to bid by a misstatement of facts made by the officer who conducted the sale; and I think not a single case can be found where a sale was made under a device of a court of equity by an officer appointed by the court where such misrepresentations have not been held good cause for setting the sale aside. The decision in this case practically overruled Paulett v. Peabody, 3 Neb. 196, and Fraser v. Ingham, 4 Neb. 531, and I believe does great injustice to the purchaser, and places the court in the attitude of approving deception in its officers in conducting sales under its direction.

2. It is admitted, by not being denied, that "on the 15th day of September, 1889, he (Norton) met the sheriff, whereupon said sheriff stated to the affiant that the said amount bid by this affiant, to wit, $2,585, was not two thirds of the appraised value. . . . That the land had been appraised at $4,800, and could not be sold for less than $3,200, and, unless Norton would raise his bid to $3,200, the sale would be declared off," etc.: that is, that Norton's bid was not sufficient to authorize the sheriff to entertain it, and therefore, unless Norton would raise the bid to $3,200, he would make a report of no sale. Norton informed him that he would not raise his bid, and the sheriff in effect declared it off. It is probable that this was part of the scheme to defraud Norton by putting him off his guard, and preventing an investigation of the title before the sale was confirmed, because the sheriff, without further notice to Norton, made a report of the sale, and it was thereupon confirmed without notice to Norton, and in his absence. So far as the sheriff is concerned, his conduct is wholly indefensible, and can only be accounted for upon the theory of a scheme to defraud Norton, in which probably he was not alone. I do not care to comment on this feature of the case, as it presents the officer in a very unenviable light. As I understand the law, a court of equity, in making a sale of real estate under a decree of foreclosure, takes the place of the vendor, and the person making the sale is the agent of the court, and it is the duty of the court to see that the sale was fairly conducted in all respects, and that it will not sanction misrepresentations by its agent as to the title of the property or incumbrance to induce persons to bid. In other words, misrepresentations which, if made by the landowner himself to a purchaser, would be good ground to set a sale aside, are equally so when made by the person appointed by the court to conduct a sale under a decree; and experience has shown that the establishment of this rule has induced competition in bidding at such sales. McGowan v. Wilkins, 1 Paige, 120, 2 L. ed. 584; Morris v. Mowatt, 2 Paige, 586, 2 L. ed. 1041, 22 Am. Dec. 661; Veeder v. Fonda, 8 Paige, 64, 3 L. ed. 71; Seaman v. Hicks, 8 Paige, 656, 4 L. ed. 580; Kauffman v. Walker, 9 Md. 229; Tooley v. Gridley, 3 Smedes & M. 493, 41 Am. Dec. 628.

I do not understand that the rule of caveat emptor applies where another element intervenes, viz., false representations. It seems to me that great injustice is done to the plaintiff in error, and a rule is established that is liable to be fraught with gross injustice, not only to purchasers at judicial sales, but to the owners of the equity of redemption as well. In my view the sale should be set aside.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

W. W. JONES, Appt.,

v.

Josephine E. JONES.

(.....Ala.....)

1. A special Act of the Legislature granting a divorce is in violation of Ala. Const., art. 4, § 21, which prohibits the suspension of any general law for the benefit of any individual, since the subject of divorce is covered by general laws.
2. Voluntary abandonment of a wife by her husband is shown where he requires her to leave his house and fails to provide for her support and does not consent to her return.
3. A wife's offensive behavior, coarse and indelicate language and her anonymous letters foully slandering one of her husband's daughters by a former marriage, do not furnish him a legal justification for his abandonment of her which will prevent her from obtaining a divorce for abandonment.
4. A wife's ill temper and mean disposition which makes her principally responsible for an unhappy state of feeling in the household, although not a legal justification to her husband for abandoning her, may in a measure palliate his offense and abridge her claim to an allowance from his estate for her separate maintenance on obtaining a divorce from him for abandonment.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Fayette County granting plaintiff a divorce and alimony against defendant. Modified and affirmed.

A separation between plaintiff and defendant took place in 1886. At a session of the General Assembly of the State, in 1888-89 there was passed "An Act for the Relief of William W. Jones." This Act was in the following language: "Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Alabama, that William W. Jones, of Fayette county, NOTE.—Validity of legislative divorce.

Without considering the effect upon the power of the state legislatures to grant divorces of the provisions of the Federal Constitution, this note will deal with the question, How far under the state governments as established is the granting of divorces within the power of the Legislature? Many of the state constitutions contain provisions directly prohibiting the Legislature from passing divorce bills. In such states the validity of a legislative divorce can be determined by an examination of the Constitution, and it is needless to set the provisions out here.

In England the practice has always been for Parliament to pass divorce bills and that practice continues to the present time, except, possibly, where the case is covered by the Divorce Act of 1857. See Westropp's Divorce Bill, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 294; Hewat's Divorce Bill, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 812; Gifford's Divorce Bill, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 861; A's Divorce Bill, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 364; Joynt's Divorce Bill, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 741.

Such being the established rule when the state legislatures began their independent existence they as matter of course assumed the right to exercise the same power, and their action met with such universal acquiescence that the aid of the courts was seldom invoked to test the validity of divorce bills. The result is that while many legislative divorces appear upon the statute books during the early history of the country most of the cases in which mention is found of the subject treat it almost as a matter of history. See Young v. Naylor, 1 Hill, Eq. 383; Jones v. Jones, 2 Overt, 2, 5 Am. Dec. 645; Noet v. Ewing, 9 Ind. 37.

It has been held that in the absence of constitutional provisions the Legislature may grant divorces. Head v. Head, 2 Kelley (Ga.) 191.

In the absence of direct prohibition the power over divorces remains in the Legislature. Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 190, 31 L. ed. 654.

In Richardson v. Wilson, 8 Yerg. 77, the court said both parties recognize the binding force of the statute granting the divorce upon them and the court will so construe it.

Granting divorces a rightful subject of legislation.

It was said in a Maryland case that granting divorces can be viewed in no other light than as regular.

ular exertions of legislative power. Crane v. McGinnis, 1 Gill & J. 474, 19 Am. Dec. 237.

The question has arisen under the territorial organic Acts conferring power on the territorial legislatures, and the Supreme Court of the United States has said that the granting of divorces is a rightful subject of legislation within the meaning of the Act of Congress conferring power upon territorial legislatures to legislate upon such subjects. Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 190, 31 L. ed. 654.

Although in a prior case in a territorial court, where a territorial Legislature had passed a general law regulating the subject of divorce and then proceeded to pass a special Act granting a divorce, the court in passing upon the validity of the special Act said the Act cannot be sustained without holding that the granting of a divorce is a rightful subject of legislation, without violating that great principle of equality upon which all justice and all equity repose and without denying to the petitioner the benefit of the law of the statute and refusing her a day in court and a right to a fair trial, and held the law to be invalid. Higbee v. Higbee, 4 Utah, 19.

How far conflicting with judicial power.

In some instances where the state Constitution has not expressly prohibited the granting of legislative divorces such prohibition has been sought to be sustained by implication from other provisions. The provision which seems to have been chiefly relied on is the one dividing the government into departments and prohibiting one department from encroaching on the powers of the others. There is considerable conflict of opinion on the question whether or not the granting of a legislative divorce is an encroachment upon the power of the courts. It has been held, on the one side, that under a territorial organic Act separating the legislative from the judicial departments the Legislature had no power to grant divorces. Ponder v. Graham, 4 Fla. 23; Chouteau v. Magen, 28 Mo. 192.

Power to grant divorces is judicial. Bingham v. Miller, 17 Ohio, 445, 49 Am. Dec. 472.

The division of the government into departments deprives the Legislature of the power to grant divorces. State v. Fry, 4 Mo. 147.

Marriage cannot be dissolved by the Legislature. Bryson v. Campbell, 12 Mo. 496.

be, and he is hereby, released from the bonds of matrimony now existing between him and his wife, Josephine E. Jones, which divorce shall have the same effect as divorce granted by a court of chancery; and the said Jones is hereby permitted to contract matrimony again: provided, that the provisions of this Act shall not affect in any manner the rights of the said Mrs. Josephine E. Jones in the courts of this state in the recovery of alimony in any proceedings in any court of this state for a divorce from the said William W. Jones. Approved February 18, 1889."

Upon the final hearing the chancellor granted the prayer of the bill dissolving the bonds of matrimony between the complainant and the defendant, and decreed that the complainant was entitled to receive temporary alimony "pendente lite" at the rate of $15 per month, amounting to $220, and was also entitled to recover $300 as attorneys' fees; and fixed her permanent alimony at $25 per month.

It is an interference with judicial power. Bryson v. Bryson, 17 Mo. 590.

In Jones v. Jones, 12 Pa. 351, 51 Am. Dec. 612, the court says: "The Legislature seems to have acted on the ground that the power to grant divorces was a legislative power and therefore not requiring a judicial examination. We think, however, that the doctrine may well be questioned."

It seems to be assumed that it would be a violation of the division of the government into departments for the Legislature to grant a divorce, in Berthelemy v. Johnson, 3 B. Mon. 90, 38 Am. Dec. 180.

It was intimated in Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 184, that so far as a divorce was for the benefit of one of the parties for breach of contract by the other it was judicial and beyond the authority of the Legislature. But in Cabell v. Cabell, 1 Met. (Ky.) 319, where the divorce was for the benefit of both parties and was acquiesced in by both, the court held that it might be granted by the Legislature.

The separation of the departments of government will prevent an appeal to the Legislature after the commencement of a divorce suit in the courts. Gaines v. Gaines, 9 B. Mon. 205, 48 Am. Dec. 425.

Another class of cases has upheld legislative divorces where the courts had no jurisdiction.

The power of the Legislature to grant a divorce in a case where the court had jurisdiction was questioned in Townsend v. Griffin, 4 Harr. (Del.) 442.

The Legislature has power to grant divorces in cases where the court has no jurisdiction; but where the court has jurisdiction the Legislature cannot exercise the power under a Constitution dividing the government into departments and prohibiting one department from encroaching on the power of the others. Opinion of Justices, 18 Me. 479.

A legislative divorce is valid in a case of which the court under existing laws has no jurisdiction. Adams v. Palmer, 51 Me. 490.

The territorial legislatures had power to grant divorces in cases over which power had not been granted to the courts by general law. Levins v. Sletor, 2 G. Greene, 604.

But on the other side, and in conflict with the above decisions, the United States Supreme Court has decided that the division of government into departments and the consequent implied inhibitions upon the legislative department to exercise judicial functions was never intended nor understood to exclude legislative control over the mar-

Messrs. McGuire & Collier, for appellant:

The special Act in question is not violative of the Constitution, but will be upheld by the courts.

The legislative action in question is not only not prohibited by the section of the organic law cited, but it is there expressly provided for. Its terms are, no special law shall be enacted for the benefit of individuals in cases which are or can be provided for by a general law, or where the relief sought can be given by any court of this state. In pronouncing on the constitutionality of an Act which has received the sanction of a co-ordinate department of the government—the legislative department—the courts will indulge the presumption that such Act is constitutional, until clearly convinced to the contrary.

Zeigler v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 58 Ala. 594; South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Morris, 65 Ala. 198; Edwards v. Williamson, 70 Ala. 145; 8 Brick. 127, 23.

So it has been decided that granting divorces is not an invasion of the power of the judiciary. Starr v. Pease, 8 Conn. 547; Maynard v. Valentine, 3 Wash. Terr. 3.

The mere fact that the Legislature has conferred power on courts over divorce proceedings will not prevent it from passing special Acts granting divorces. Wright v. Wright, 2 Md. 429, 56 Am. Dec. 726.

Construction of particular constitutions.

A constitutional provision that all cases of divorce shall be heard and tried by the superior court until the Legislature shall by law make other provisions, makes the granting of a divorce a judicial proceeding which removes it from the jurisdiction of the Legislature. Clark v. Clark, 10 N. H. 385, 34 Am. Dec. 165.

Under the Massachusetts Constitution, which provides that all cases of divorce shall be heard by the governor and council until the Legislature shall by law make other provisions, when the Legislature conferred the power on the courts it lost all power to grant divorces. Sparhawk v. Sparhawk, 116 Mass. 317; Shannon v. Shannon, 2 Gray, 225.

In Ohio the powers of the Legislature are held to be delegated and therefore the Legislature has no power to grant divorces unless it is expressly conferred by the Constitution. Bingham v. Miller, 17 Ohio, 445, 49 Am. Dec. 472.

Where the Constitution expressly prohibits the Legislature from exercising the power to grant divorces whenever the courts are vested with the power the Legislature has by implication the power to grant them in all cases not within the power of the court. Jones v. Jones, 12 Pa. 351, 51 Am. Dec. 612; Cronise v. Cronise, 54 Pa. 264; Roberts v. Roberts, 54 Pa. 265.

A special statute authorizing a divorce in a case in which it could not have been granted under general law is unconstitutional as granting a special indulgence by way of exemption from a general law. Simonds v. Simonds, 103 Mass. 575, 4 Am. Rep. 576.

Authorizing the court to grant a divorce in a particular case for a cause not provided for by the general law is a violation of a constitutional prohibition against legislative divorces. Teft v. Teft, 3 Mich. 68.

H. P. F.

The question will be approached with great caution, patiently and deliberately examined in every aspect, indulging the presumption of its validity; and the court will not pronounce sentence of invalidity until it is clear that the Constitution and the statute cannot co-exist.

Jones v. Black, 49 Ala. 540; Mobile v. Dargan, 45 Ala. 810; Mobile v. Stonewall Ins. Co. 53 Ala. 570; 8 Brick. 127, 20.

A state Legislature may grant divorce, unless expressly or impliedly prohibited by its Constitution.

The General Assembly has the same right to construe the Constitution of the state that the courts have, and where the question is one in which a liberal construction may be made, the legislative construction will not be condemned, unless it very clearly appears that it is wrong.

Ex parte Selma & G. R. Co. 45 Ala. 696, 6 Am. Rep. 722.

When the legislative decree was passed, dissolving the bonds of matrimony between complainant and defendant, all her rights, if any at all, passed from her. The relation of husband and wife did not exist between the parties at the time the bill was filed, and hence she had, and has, no rights as wife.

Messrs. Tompkins & Troy also for appellant.

Messrs. Arnold & Evans for appellee.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by the wife against her husband for a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, and for alimony. It is contended for the appellant that all claim to such relief was barred by the Act of the General Assembly of Alabama, releasing him from the bonds of matrimony theretofore existing between him and the appellee. Acts Ala. 1888-89, p. 361. If that Act was valid, no divorce could be decreed in this case, as the bonds of matrimony had already been dissolved when the bill was filed. The proviso in the Act only covered a contingency which the enactment itself rendered impossible; for, if the Act operated to divorce the parties, the wife could not thereafter maintain any proceedings for a divorce from her former husband, and the proviso does not purport to save her rights to alimony except in proceedings by her for a divorce. If the Act had "the same effect as a divorce granted by a court of chancery," an end was thereby put to the relation of marriage, and, as a consequence, so far as the husband was concerned, the divorce having been granted in his favor, all duties and obligations necessarily dependent upon the continuance of that relation immediately ceased. Harrison v. Harrison, 20 Ala. 649, 54 Am. Dec. 227; Boykin v. Rain, 28 Ala. 843, 65 Am. Dec. 349. Before the power of granting divorces from the bonds of matrimony was confided to the courts in England, parliament assumed and exercised the right of passing special Acts dissolving the bonds of marriage. Many of the state legislatures in this country have passed special Acts of divorce, the validity of which has been sustained, when not rendered invalid by the operation of constitutional prohibitions. The courts have generally recognized the right of the state legislatures, when not restrained by the constitutional limitations, to exercise the same power over the subject as was possessed by the English parliament. And the enactment of general laws conferring upon the courts also authority to grant divorces in certain enumerated cases has not usually been regarded as having the effect of abridging the plenary power of the Legislature to dissolve the bonds of marriage by special Acts, either in the same or in other classes of cases. 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. 6th

ed. §§ 660-695; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 128-132; 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 747; Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 190, 81 L. ed. 654; Starr v. Pease, 8 Conn. 541; Wright v. Wright, 2 Md. 429, 56 Am. Dec. 723. The power to grant divorces by special Acts is somewhat anomalous as a legislative function. It has been conceded rather because it had been too long assumed and acted on to be denied than because, on principle, it could be regarded as properly within the legitimate sphere of legislative action. Kent says: "The question of divorce involves investigations which are properly of a judicial nature, and the jurisdiction over divorces ought to be confined exclusively to the judicial tribunals, under limitations to be prescribed by law." 2 Kent, Com. 106. Cooley says: "But it is safe to say that the general sentiment in the legal profession is against the rightfulness of special legislative divorces; and it is believed that, if the question could originally have been considered by the courts, unembarrassed by any considerations of long acquiescence, and of the serious consequences which must result from affirming their unlawfulness, after so many had been granted, and new relations formed, it is highly probable that these enactments would have been held to be usurpations of judicial authority, and we should have been spared the necessity for the special constitutional provisions which have since been introduced." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 132.

In each of the former Constitutions of this state there was a provision prohibiting the granting of divorces except in cases provided for by law by suit in chancery. The Constitution of 1819 further provided that "no decree for such divorce shall have effect until the same shall be sanctioned by two thirds of both Houses of the General Assembly." Const. 1819, art. 6, § 13. The corresponding section of the Constitution of 1861 was in these words: "Divorces from the bonds of matrimony shall not be granted but in cases provided for by law, by suit in chancery. But decrees for divorce shall be final, unless appealed from within three months from the date of the enrollment thereof." Const. 1861, art. 6, § 13. The substance of this provision was carried forward into the Constitutions of 1865 and 1868, respectively. Const. 1865, art. 4, § 80; Const. 1868, art. 4, § 80. The existence of these express constitutional restraints may be regarded as implying a recognition of the power of the Legislature to grant divorces in special cases, unless the exercise of such power is prohibited by the Constitution. The present Constitution of the state contains no express provision on the subject of divorce. It, however, prescribes general restraints upon the power of the Legislature which were not found in the former Constitutions. The question to be considered is whether the omission of a special provision against granting divorces except in judicial proceedings left the Legislature free to exercise an original plenary power over the subject, and to grant divorces by enactments for special cases. It is clear that such special legislation for individual cases is not in harmony with the policy of preserving an equality of all persons before the law, without favors to some and discrimination against others under similar circumstances. The subjects of marriage and divorce are regulated by the general laws of the state, statutory and common. Those general laws fix the rights, duties, and obligations of the parties to the marriage relation. They also provide for the dissolution of that relation in certain contingencies, and prescribe the causes which authorize such dissolution, the kind and measure of relief to be granted, and the mode of proceedings to secure it. If a husband or a wife, who is not entitled under the general law to be relieved of the duties and obligations of the marriage relation, may be freed therefrom by a special Act of the Legislature for his or her relief, the result is to dispense with the general law for the benefit of an individual. Even if the circumstances are such that the same relief could be secured by proceedings under the general law, the granting of the relief by a special Act of the Legislature is equally an exemption from the operation of a general law, as the necessity of having recourse to the remedies which others in similar circumstances must pursue is dispensed with. Such legislation singles out an individual for special indulgence, and excepts him from obedience to the general rules which others must conform to. Several provisions of the present Constitution of the state indicate a purpose to confine the Legislature, as far as practicable, to the enactment of general laws, applicable alike to all persons under similar circumstances. It is made the duty of the General Assembly to "pass general laws, under which local and private interests shall be provided for and protected." Ala. Const. art. 4, § 25. It is also provided that "no special or local law shall be enacted for the benefit of individuals or corporations in cases which are or can be provided for by a general law, or where the relief sought can be given by any court of this state; nor shall the operation of any general law be suspended by the General Assembly for the benefit of any individual, corporation, or association." Id. art. 4, § 23. The Legislature owes equal obedience to each of the clauses of this section of the Constitution, but such obedience cannot be as effectually enforced by the courts in the one case as in the other. There is a marked difference between the two clauses. This court has held that under the first clause a discretion is necessarily left to the Legislature to determine whether the particular object or want "can be provided for by a general law;" and that the exercise of such discretion cannot be revised by the courts. Clarke v. Jack, 60 Ala. 271. No such construction can be put upon the language of the second clause of the section. That is a positive, unconditional limitation of the power of the General Assembly. It cannot suspend the operation of any general law for the benefit of any individual, corporation, or association. Within the range of this prohibition there is no room for the exercise of any discretion by the Legislature or by the courts. It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to define the scope of this provision. Clearly, it has the effect of leaving the Legislature without the power to pass a special Act relieving an individual of any liability or obligation which a general law imposes upon him in favor of another, or exempting him from the operation of the remedies afforded by the general law for the enforcement of such liability or obligation, or giving him a right or remedy against another to which he is not entitled under the general law. We need not decide whether this provision would render invalid an Act merely conferring upon an individual, corporation, or association a privilege involving no interference with the rights of others under the general law, or removing disabilities, or granting such relief as could not operate as an infringement of any rights or remedies to which others are entitled under the general law. McKemie v. Gorman, 68 Ala. 442. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to hold that the provision is effectual to render invalid a special Act of the Legislature for the relief of an individual, which would necessarily operate to absolve him from the duties and obligations which the general law imposes upon him as a husband, to suspend in his favor the general law which others, similarly situated, must conform to in order to obtain relief from the bonds of matrimony. The special Act relied on by the appellant was unconstitutional, and presents no obstacle to the relief sought by the appellee, if she is entitled to relief under the general law. Darling v. Rodgers, 7 Kan. 592; Simonds v. Simonds, 108 Mass. 572, 4 Am. Rep. 576.

More than two years before the bill was filed the appellant required the appellee to leave his house. They have not lived together since. The husband has not provided for the wife's support, and has not consented to her return to his house. These facts are not disputed. They show a "voluntary abandonment" of the wife by the husband, within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 2322 of the Code. A husband may as effectually abandon his wife by putting her away from him and denying her the privilege of dwelling with him, as by going off himself from their former residence, leaving her there, and not permitting her to live with him. Morris v. Morris, 20 Ala. 168; Hanberry v. Hanberry, 29 Ala. 719; Kinsey v. Kinsey, 87 Ala. 393; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 803.

It is not contended that the husband is entitled to a divorce from the wife on any of the grounds prescribed by the statute. Nothing short of the existence of a ground of divorce in favor of the husband against the wife can defeat the right of the wife to a divorce from her husband because of his abandonment of her without her consent for the period and in the manner fixed by the statute. The proof against the wife in this case, if believed, shows no more than that she was guilty of grossly offensive behavior in her husband's presence on one occasion; that at times she used coarse and indelicate language; that once, when her husband's young daughter by a former marriage was standing near the fire place, she stirred up the fire, so that the flame caught the clothing of the child, and she gave no assistance in the rescue; and that she wrote and circulated a number of anonymous letters, cruelly and foully elandering another of her husband's daughters. If she was guilty of such exhibitions of ill temper and a mean disposition, it may be readily understood how the marriage relation became irksome to the husband. However hard it may have been for him to endure such conduct, yet it did not, under the statute, afford him ground for relief from an uncongenial association, or furnish him with a legal justification for his abandonment of his wife. Bryan v. Bryan, 34 Ala. 516; Hanberry v. Hanberry, supra; 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 805.

When a divorce is granted in favor of the wife, if she has no separate estate, or if it is insufficient for her maintenance, she is entitled to an allowance out of the estate of her husband; and in such case "the allowance must be as liberal as the estate of the husband will permit, regard being had to the condition of his family, and to all the circumstances of the case." Code, §§ 2332, 2333. The conduct of the wife before her husband's abandonment of her is a circumstance to be considered in determining the amount of the provision to be decreed in her favor. Her mere failure to contribute to the peace and happiness of the home cannot be allowed to justify the husband in casting her off. But she cannot be regarded as entirely blameless, if, while she was living with her husband, without provocation from him, she was inconsiderate or disrespectful in her bearing towards him, or was unkind in her treatment of his children by a former marriage, or if she habitually pursued a course of conduct calculated to vex and harass a reasonably indulgent husband. The inducement of gaining an advantage by a liberal provision for her separate maintenance is to be withheld from a perverse wife, who, though guilty of nothing amounting to a ground of divorce against her, yet, without previous fault on the part of her husband, so bears herself in her relations with him and his household as to provoke him into wishing to be rid of her society. Over-indulgence is not to be shown to a wife who has been abandoned by her husband, when her own failure to act the part of a dutiful wife has helped to put her in the position of "having the law on her side" in a proceeding against the husband for divorce. Such misconduct on the part of the wife may be considered as, in a measure, palliating the offense of the husband, and as abridging her claim to an allowance from his estate for her separate maintenance. Jeter v. Jeter, 38 Ala. 391; Lovett v. Lovett, 11 Ala. 763. The complainant herself testifies: "Dr. Jones was a kind husband to me; one of the kindest in the world." The evidence shows without contradiction, that he was a man of excellent character, enjoying the respect of the community in which he has lived for many years. There is nothing to indicate that he was at fault in his relations with his wife, until he required her to leave his house. It is unnecessary to detail the evidence as to the misconduct of the wife. Some of the more serious charges against her are not satisfactorily established. Enough, however, is proved to show that she was principally responsible for the unhappy state of feeling in her husband's household. Her conduct was well calculated to foment discord. To say the least of it, she was far from discreet or forbearing in her treatment of her husband's children by a former marriage. Her course towards her husband, and towards those who were naturally the objects of his affection and solicitude, was well calculated to destroy his regard for her and to overtax his forbearance. True, it was the duty of the husband to persevere in his effort to prevent an estrangement between himself and his wife, and to avoid, even at the expense of his own comfort and peace of mind, an open breach of the marriage relation. He should not have yielded to the impulse to abandon his wife, as she had committed no offense to justify him in that course. But the wife's own folly in acting so as to forfeit the regard of a kind husband is not to be overlooked in determining the provision to be made in her favor. The evidence indicates that the husband owns property, including his interest in a stock of goods, worth about $8,000 in excess of his liabilities. He is engaged in business as a country merchant, and is also a practicing physician, though he has been trying to give up his practice, and gets but little income from that source. Three of his children by a former marriage—two daughters and one son—are living with him, and are dependent upon him for their support. They are all minors. His home is in a small hamlet in Fayette county. The habits of life there are simple and inexpensive. The price of board in respectable families in that neighborhood is 'from $5 to $7½ per month, with everything furnished. Boarders have been received in the defendant's family at such prices. The complainant has no property which yields her any income. She is entitled to have provision made for her maintenance in the condition in life of her husband. The amount is not to be swelled because she chooses to reside in one of the suburbs of the city of Birmingham, where the cost of living is greater. In view of the course pursued by the wife before the separation, and of all the circumstances of the case, our conclusion is that she should receive $15 per month as a provision for her maintenance after the divorce. If she had been wholly without fault, a more liberal allowance would have been proper. This is less than was allowed by the chancellor. In this respect his decree will be here modified. The appellant has nothing to complain of in the amounts he was required to pay for compensation to the solicitors for the appellee and for temporary alimony. With the modification above ordered, the decree will be affirmed.

Modified and affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Edwin M. SCHAEFFER, by Next Friend,

A defect in a highway does not give a cause of action to a traveler who after safely passing it is taken back by his horse which became frightened at an independent cause, and uncontrollable, and turned suddenly round in the road, breaking the vehicle and dragging it back to the defective portion of the highway where the traveler is thrown out and injured.

(July 12, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lebanon

NOTE.—Effect upon right of recovery, of fact that horse was frightened when accident occurred on defective highway.

In Maine and Massachusetts, where the statutory liability of municipalities for accidents resulting from defective highways has always been strictly construed, there can seldom be a recovery for an injury received while the horse was frightened and uncontrollable. To permit a recovery in those states the defect in the highway must have been the sole cause of the injury, and the driver must at the very instant of the injury have been exercising due care.

In Snow v. Adams, 1 Cush. 444, a recovery was permitted although the fright of the horse brought the carriage in contact with the obstruction, but there is no discussion of the effect of the fright.

But as soon as the question was directly raised the recovery seems to have been denied. Thus where a bolt connecting the shaft with the cutter broke causing it to drop on the horse's heels and him to escape from the driver and run away, and after running a short distance he ran upon a pile of wood within the limits of the highway and broke his leg, the owner was held not entitled to recover because at the time of the breaking of the leg he was failing to exercise due care over the horse, and because the running of the horse was the proximate cause of the injury. Davis v. Dudley, 4 Allen, 559.

So where a horse on a bridge was frightened by some animal jumping into the water below, and shied so that the carriage was thrown off from the side of the bridge, which had no railing, the court held there could be no recovery, saying that if there were two independent proximate causes of an injury sustained by a driver upon a highway, the primary cause being one for which the town is not responsible, and the other being a defect in the highway, the injury cannot be said to be received through such defect, and the town is not liable. Moulton v. Sanford, 51 Me. 127.

So it has been held that where the frightened and uncontrollable condition of the horse contributed to the injury there can be no recovery. Coombs v. Topsham, 88 Me. 207.

Where by reason of fright the horse backed several rods before coming on the defect the court held there could be no recovery. Horton v. Taunton, 97 Mass. 236.

The Wisconsin court is to some extent inclined to follow the above decisions, for it has been held that where the town is without fault and the horse escapes from the control of its driver and in his flight is injured by a defect in the highway which he would have escaped if under proper control, there can be no recovery. Jackson v. Bellevieu, 30 Wis. 258.

In these jurisdictions uncontrollableness from any cause is fatal to recovery, although the horse may not at the time have been frightened.

Thus where by reason of disease a horse became

County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a defect in one of defendant's highways. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.;

Mr. W. M. Derr for appellant.

Messrs. Grant Weidman and P. S. Keiser for appellee.

Heydrick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, an infant of less than four years of age, brought suit in the court below to recover damages for injuries received in the same accident out of which Jackson Twp. v. Wagner, 127 Pa. 184, grew. According to the plaintiff's witnesses, he started in company with his mother, two younger children, and Miss Wagner, the plaintiff below in Jackson Twp. v. Wagner, to drive over one of the highways of the defendant township. At this time, there was upon the side of the road in question a stone pile about 25 feet in length by from 1 to 3 feet in height, and at the side of the stone pile a hole, in respect to the dimensions of which these witnesses differed widely, varying as to the depth from 8 to 18 inches; as to the width, from 8 inches to 8 feet; and as to the length, from 1 foot to 5 feet. The same witnesses differed as to the width of the road between this hole and the gutter almost as much; one of them asserting that it was but 7 or 8 feet, while four others testified that it was from 12 to 14 feet wide. Upon this evidence, to which greater credit seems to have been given than to that on the part of the defendant, the jury found, under proper instructions as to the duty of the supervisors, that the road was not, on the day and at the place of the accident, suitable and sufficient for public travel, conducted in the ordinary manner and by the ordinary means of conveyance. It must therefore be assumed that the township was guilty of negligence; and as there could be no question of contributory negligence on the part of an infant of such tender years as the plaintiff, the only question to be determined is whether, upon the further facts testified to by the plaintiff's witnesses, the township is liable for the injury sustained by the plaintiff upon this road.

Whatever the condition of the road may have been, the party passed over it safely, and without noticing any defect therein, but when they had reached a point about 120 feet beyond the stone pile, where the road was in good condition, they met a donkey drawing a cart loaded with tin cans, and another donkey, which, in the language of the witnesses, was "loose, and came towards the horse." Thereat the horse became frightened, the driver lost control of uncontrollable and bore to one side of the road until he went off from the unguarded embankment, the court held there could be no recovery unless it was shown that the accident would have occurred if the horse had remained under control. Titus v. Northbridge, 97 Mass. 258, 38 Am. Dec. 91. So no recovery can be had where the accident would not have happened had not one of the horses thrown his tail over the line in such a manner that for the time being the team was entirely free from any effective control or guidance by their driver. Fogg v. Nahant, 98 Mass. 580, 106 Mass. 273.

So where one rein is broken, which prevents the guiding of the horse, there can be no recovery. Anderson v. Bath, 42 Me. 348.

If the vicious habits of the horse contributed to the accident there can be no recovery. Murdock v. Warwick, 4 Gray, 178.

If the horse was vicious and unruly, and because of such character escaped from the control of his driver and caused the injury, there can be no recovery. Bliss v. Wilbraham, 8 Allen, 584.

The courts of other states have refused to follow the extreme doctrine of these decisions, as appears from the authorities cited below, and these courts have themselves modified the doctrine to some extent thus:

Mere starting or shying will not be regarded as unmanageableness. Spaulding v. Winalow, 74 Me. 528.

If the horse simply shies at an object which would naturally frighten an ordinarily gentle horse whereby the carriage is thrown down an unguarded embankment, there may be a recovery. Stone v. Hubbardston, 100 Mass. 49. See also Bigelow v. Weston, 3 Pick. 267; Cushing v. Bedford, 125 Mass. 526.

So mere shying at something outside of the roadway for which the town is not responsible is not sufficient to relieve the town from liability if the horse has not broken away from the control of his driver, and the obstacle is encountered at the instant of the shying. Aldrich v. Gorham, 77 Me. 291.

That the shying of the horse contributed to the 18 L. R. A.

accident is not sufficient to cause the setting aside of an award against the town by arbitrators to whom the question of the amount of liability had been submitted. Wood v. Groton, 11: Mass. 387.

And this is the law in other states. Lower Muncie Twp. v. Merkhoffer, 71 Pa. 279; Baltimore & Y. Turnp. Co. v. Crowther, 68 Md. 558.

Although to warrant a recovery the loss of control must have been only momentary. Wright v. Templeton, 122 Mass. 49.

And in Maine it was held that although at the time of the injury the traveler's horse may without fault of the town have been running violently, it cannot be ruled as matter of law that the town is not responsible for the injury if caused by a defect in the highway, which would not have occurred excepting for such defect. Verrill v. Minot, 81 Me. 206.

The following cases illustrate the fine distinctions into which the court has been led by this doctrine:

Where a horse backs a wagon over an embankment and it gets so far over before the driver loses control of the horse as to be beyond the horse's control, a recovery may be had. Babson v. Rockport, 101 Mass. 96; Britton v. Cummington, 107 Mass. 348.

Where a horse shied and sprang upon and partly over a wall two feet high which had been erected as a barrier at the side of the road the court held that if the injury was received because the wall was not high enough, and the want of height made it insufficient as a railing or barrier, the plaintiff could recover if the horse was a reasonably safe horse to drive and if the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care and did not lose control of the horse, or lost control for a moment only, and either regained the control or would have regained it before the horse would have run against the wall, if it had been of sufficient height. Hinckley v. Somerset, 145 Mass. 826.

Where fright is caused by defect in highway.

The general doctrine is that if the fright was caused by a defect in the highway it will be no de-him, and he turned suddenly around, wrenching the spokes of one of the front wheels out of the hub, and fled in the opposite direction; the hub of the broken wheel falling to and dragging upon the ground. When the buggy reached the hole already described, the end of the axle dropped into it, and the plaintiff was thrown out upon the stone pile. The testimony upon the part of the defense showed very clearly that the occurrence was as is stated by the reporter and in the opinion in Jackson Twp. v. Wagner, supra, differing somewhat from the foregoing statement; but in considering the assignments of error in this case, the plaintiff's testimony will be accepted as verity. So accepting it, was the defendant township answerable for the injury received by the plaintiff? It is a general rule, as well settled as anything in the law of negligence, that a man is responsible for such consequences of his fault as are natural and probable, and might therefore be foreseen by ordinary forecast, but if his fault happen to concur with something extraordinary, and therefore not likely to be foreseen, he will not be answerable for the extraordinary result. This rule applies in actions against municipal and quasi municipal corporations as well as to natural persons and private corporations. The concurrence of that which is ordinary with a party's negligence does not relieve him from responsibility for the resultant injury. Examples of such concurrence may be found in cases where, by reason of causes known to the public authorities, horses are likely to become frightened, and in their sudden fright plunge over an unguarded precipice, or rush upon some danger within the highway, for the existence of which the authorities are responsible. In such cases the consequences of the neglect of duty are natural and probable, and ought therefore to be foreseen. But when, from extraordinary causes, for the existence of which the supervisors are not responsible, and of which they cannot be presumed to have had notice, a driver loses control of his horses, and they come in contact with a defect in the highway, there is no more reason for holding the township answerable for a resultant injury than there is for holding any other party responsible for the result of the concurrence of something which he could not foresee with his negligence. In Massachusetts, it was held, in a well considered case, that when a horse, by reason of fright, disease, or viciousness, becomes actually uncontrollable, so that the driver cannot stop him or direct his course, or exercise or regain control over his movements, and in this condition comes upon a defect in the highway, or upon a place which is defective for want of a railing, by which an fence. See note to Bowes v. Boston (Mass.) 15 L. R. A. 385.

A recovery may be had for an injury resulting from fright of the horses at a defect in the highway. Brookville & C. Twp. Co. v. Pumphrey, 59 Ind. 78, 26 Am. Rep. 76.

If a defect in a highway causes a well-broken and kind horse to run away, and while running he falls down and injures his driver, the town may be held liable. Willey v. Belfast, 61 Me. 570.

If an accident results from the fact that the team is in a state of fright or not under the driver's control the town will be liable if the condition of the team is caused by some defect in the highway, but not otherwise. Kelley v. Fond du Lac, 81 Wis. 180.

If the defect caused the runaway there may be a recovery. Hodge v. Bennington, 43 Vt. 450.

In Hey v. Philadelphia, 81 Pa. 44, 22 Am. Rep. 757, the court drew a distinction between loss of control occasioned by accidents unconnected with the condition of the road and those where the condition of the road caused the loss of control, and held the city liable for the death of a horse which fell off from an embankment because of the narrowness of the road, the unguarded condition of the embankment, and the proximity of a railroad track.

Where the runaway is caused by a defect in the highway the town may be liable for injuries caused thereby to a third person. Merrill v. Claremont, 58 N. H. 468.

Duty of town to provide for safety of runaway horse.

Towns are not obliged to fence their roads to prevent frightened horses from escaping out of the limits of the highway, even though the near location of a railroad may render such occurrences probable. Whether a railing must be erected is to be determined by the character of the place between which and the traveled road it is claimed the barrier should be erected. Adams v. Natick, 13 Allen, 432.

During the process of repairing a bridge barriers need not be erected which are strong enough to 18 L. R. A.

stop a runaway team. Lane v. Wheeler, 35 Hun, 608.

Where the injury to a runaway team occurred at a place where the road was sufficiently wide for all the travel usual thereon, so that the exercise of only an ordinary amount of care would prevent an injury thereby, a recovery was denied although at the side of the road and outside of the traveled part there was a ditch or gully. Brown v. Glasgow, 57 Mo. 158.

Where the horses became frightened at an obstacle at a place where the roadway was sufficient for all ordinary purposes and dragged the wagon over the curb and sidewalk and down an embankment, a recovery was denied. Hubbell v. Yonkers, 104 N. Y. 434.

Where the horse broke loose from a post to which he was hitched and ran to a part of a street which was impassable to travelers but across which no barrier was erected, a recovery was denied. Moss v. Burlington, 60 Iowa, 449, 46 Am. Rep. 82.

Where the runaway was caused by the overturning of the cutter because of a snowdrift, and the horse ran to a portion of the road not used by the public, and which was not safe, and plunged down an embankment and was killed, the town was held not liable. Bishop v. Schuylkill Twp. (Pa.) Mar. 7, 1887.

Stones between which and the traveled part of the way a gutter is constructed are not a defect which will render the town liable in case a horse runs upon them and is injured. Howard v. North Bridgewater, 16 Pick. 189.

Where a horse became frightened by cows having boards on their horns and turned out of the traveled part of the way towards the fence where the carriage came in contact with an obstruction causing the injury complained of, no recovery was permitted. Perkins v. Fayette, 68 Me. 152.

When liability exists.

Municipalities are not bound to furnish roads upon which it will be safe for horses to run away, but they are bound to furnish reasonably safe roads, and if they do not and a traveler is injured injury is occasioned, the town is not liable for the injury, unless it appears that it would have occurred if the horse had not been so uncontrollable. Titus v. Northbridge, 97 Mass. 258, 93 Am. Dec. 91. The doctrine of this case was reiterated in Horton v. Taunton, 97 Mass. 266; Fogg v. Nahant, 98 Mass. 578; and Stone v. Hubbardston, 100 Mass. 49. Similarly, it has been held in Wisconsin that a town is not liable for an injury received upon a defective highway by a horse that has escaped from the control of its driver, unless it be made to appear affirmatively that the disability of the driver to control him was caused by the same or some other defect in the highway. Jackson v. Believieu, 80 Wis. 250. In Maine, also, the same subject has been much considered, and with the like result. Moor v. Abbot, 82 Me. 46; Coombs v. Topsham, 88 Me. 204; Anderson v. Bath, 42 Me. 346; Moulton v. Sanford, 51 Me. 127. In the latest of these cases, it was determined that if there be two efficient, independent, proximate causes of an injury sustained by a traveler upon a highway, the primary cause being one for which the town is not responsible, and the other being a defect in such highway, the injury cannot be said to have been received through such defect, and the town is not liable therefor, though the traveler himself is in no default. It is true that in these states there are statutes defining the right of action for such injuries, but they are merely declaratory of the common law. This precise question has not been as frequently considered in this state as in the states referred to; but in Chartiers Twp. v. Philips, 122 Pa. 601, it was distinctly raised by a point in which the court was asked to charge that, to "render a township liable for an injury by a defect in a highway, it must have been the sole, efficient cause of the injury, and if the jury find from the evidence that this accident to the plaintiff was caused by the uncontrollable struggle of a choking horse, or from this cause concurring with a defect in the highway, then their verdict must be for the defendant. For refusal to affirm this point without qualification, the judgment of the common pleas was reversed. To the same effect is Herr v. Lebanon (Pa.) 16 L. R. A. 106 (decided at this term). These judgments require no vindication. They are logical deductions from the rule of law which must be invoked by every plaintiff who seeks redress for an injury received through the negligence of another. The injury must have been the natural and probable result of the defendant's negligence. But the cases must be rare in which an injury can be said to be the result of the negligence of a party when there is another and primary, efficient, proximate by culpable defects in the road it is no defense that at the time his horse was running away or was beyond his control. Ring v. Cohoes, 77 N. Y. 58, 38 Am. Rep. 574.

In an action against a turnpike company the rule of liability was stated as follows: If the road was wide enough for the customary travel with safety and the injury was caused by want of care or skill in driving the horse or by the vicious disposition of the horse not excited by any defect in, or unlawful object upon, the road, there can be no recovery; but if the road was so narrow as to render it in any degree dangerous or unsafe to persons driving horses of ordinary gentleness but which might be liable to shy or take fright and plunge into the ditch, then if the accident was caused by such defect in the road liability would ensue. If a horse running away comes in contact with a defect within the reasonable limits of the highway and damage ensues the managers of the road are liable. Baltimore & H. Turnp. Co. v. Bateman, 68 Md. 399.

Hunt v. Pownal, 9 Vt. 411, although not a case of a runaway or frightened horse, is a valuable authority in that it establishes the rule that the town is liable although the injury is the result of accident and a defect in the highway.

Where plaintiff is in no fault but the injury is the combined result of accident and neglect to repair the road, the town must be held liable. Winship v. Enfield, 43 N. H. 215.

Although the fact that the horses were beyond the control of the driver may have been a proximate cause of the injury, it will not, providing the driver was free from fault, relieve the town from liability if the danger and his injury are a consequence resulting from the negligence of the town officers. Irony v. Deerpark, 116 N. Y. 439.

Where from the proximity of a railroad the probability is that horses will be frightened the town must provide suitable barriers to prevent accident. Campbell v. Stillwater, 32 Minn. 308, 50 Am. Rep. 567.

Where there was no barrier between the highway and the railroad track which ran parallel with it, and a horse became frightened and ran in front of a passing train, the court said the question is whether or not the dangerous place is in such close proximity to the highway as traveled and used as to render the use of the highway unsafe. Plymouth Twp. v. Graver, 126 Pa. 84.

That the horse was frightened at the time the accident occurred will not prevent a recovery if ordinary care on the part of the town in providing a proper railing would have prevented the accident. Rockford v. Russell, 9 Ill. App. 229.

If notwithstanding the fright of the horse the injury would not have happened but for the defect, a recovery may be had providing the driver was exercising due care. Stark v. Lancaster, 57 N. H. 92.

Though plaintiff's horse took fright, turned over the wagon, and threw it down an embankment of the street on which he was driving and thus he was injured, it will not prevent his recovery if the city was negligent in not providing suitable barriers. Atlanta v. Wilson, 59 Ga. 544, 27 Am. Rep. 896.

The fact that horses are running away when the wagon comes in contact with a defect in the highway and injures the driver will not prevent a recovery against the town. Lacon v. Page, 43 Ill. 500.

The fact that the horses were running away will not prevent recovery if the defect is found to be the direct cause of the injury. Martin v. Algona, 40 Iowa, 398.

That the horse was frightened at the time he backed off from a dock which had no string piece, will not prevent a recovery. Kennedy v. New York, 73 N. Y. 385. See also Macaulay v. New York, 67 N. Y. 602.

The mere fact that at the time the accident occurred the horses had become unmanageable and were running away will not prevent a recovery unless the driver was guilty of want of reasonable care and skill. Sherwood v. Hamilton, 37 U. C. Q. B. 410; Toms v. Whithy, 35 U. C. Q. B. 195.

The fact that the horse was uncontrolled for some distance before the injury will not affect in any way the liability of the town. Baldwin v. Greenwoods Turnp. Co. 40 Conn. 238, 16 Am. Rep. 83.

cause, wholly independent of such negligence, and for which the party charged with negligence is in no way responsible. In such cases, it would be incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the accident would have happened without the concurrence of the primary, efficient, proximate cause. In this case the driver lost control of the horse the moment he took fright at the donkeys and tin cans, and she had not regained efficient control at the moment of the accident. Her own testimony is that she was trying to stop him, but had not succeeded. He was still pursuing his flight, dragging the wrecked buggy after him, when the occupants were thrown out. It may be conceded that the township would have been answerable for the injuries if it had appeared that the plaintiff would have been thrown out in the same manner if the horse had not received this extraordinary fright, and wrecked the buggy, but this did not appear. On the contrary, it appeared in the plaintiff's evidence that the party had passed the place of the accident in safety a few minutes before, without noticing any defect. But for the fright of the horse, and the driver's loss of control, they would have continued their journey, and of course the accident would not have happened. How much the wreck of the buggy may have had to do with the final catastrophe may be inferred from the account given by plaintiff's witnesses, and the belief expressed by the driver that if the wheel, instead of the hub, had gone into the hole, the buggy would not have been upset. But the loss of the wheel was not in any manner attributable to any defect in the highway. It was admitted that the road was in good condition at the point where this beginning of the accident occurred. It is therefore clear that the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was the fright of the horse, and that that fright was not caused by any defect in the highway, or by any neglect of duty on the part of the supervisors.

For this reason the judgment must be reversed.

Where a horse was taken apparently sick and staggered over the edge of an unguarded bridge, a recovery was permitted. Houfe v. Fulton, 29 Wis. 804, 9 Am. Rep. 568.

Illustrations.

In Newlin v. Davis, 77 Pa. 818, recovery was permitted where a horse became frightened and backed off from an unguarded bridge, but there is no discussion of the effect of the fright of the horse.

Where a team became frightened at something in a mill by the road-side and backed off from an unguarded embankment within the limits of the road, a recovery was permitted. Olson v. Chipewa Falls, 71 Wis. 568.

Where a horse became frightened at a railroad locomotive and escaped from the control of the driver so that it went over an unguarded embankment by the side of the road, the city was held liable. Byerly v. Anamosa, 79 Iowa, 208.

Where the horse became frightened in some way not stated, and threw their driver from the sleigh and then ran upon a bridge with a hole in the flooring through which one of them stepped and broke his leg, a recovery was permitted. Mandershid v. Dubuque, 26 Iowa, 109.

Where the horse got his tail over the line and backed into a hole a recovery was permitted. Hull v. Kansas City, 54 Mo. 600, 14 Am. Rep. 487.

Where the horse became frightened by the breaking of the harness through no defect which was known to plaintiff and ran away, and, while running furiously came upon a bridge over the side of which he fell because of a defective railing, a recovery was permitted. Baldwin v. Greenwood Turnp. Co. 40 Conn. 238, 16 Am. Rep. 83.

Where a horse takes fright and runs away and is injured because of the neglect of the municipality in leaving a dangerous excavation in the street unprotected, an action may be maintained against the corporation if the driver of the horse exercised due care and skill in managing it. Crawfordville v. Smith, 79 Ind. 809, 41 Am. Rep. 612.

Where the condition of the road was such as to cause a collision between a runaway horse and plaintiff's team, a recovery was permitted. Kelsey v. Glover, 15 Vt. 712.

Where a horse frightened at passing cars jumped from an unguarded bridge, a recovery was permitted. Fowler v. Strawberry Hill, 74 Iowa, 648.

Where the horse because of sudden fright at a traction engine plunged sideways over an unguarded embankment, a recovery was permitted. Burrell Twp. v. Uncapher, 117 Pa. 863.

Where the breaking of the harness alarmed the horse a recovery was permitted. Clark v. Barrington, 41 N. H. 48.

Where a horse which was hitched in front of a shop broke loose and eventually fell into a chasm which constituted a defect in the highway, a recovery was permitted. Tallahassee v. Fortune, 3 Fla. 26, 52 Am. Dec. 368.

Fright occurring outside of highway.

The Massachusetts doctrine is that where a horse tied outside the limits of the highway escapes and runs upon the highway and suffers an injury from a defect therein, no action can be maintained against the town. Richards v. Enfield, 13 Gray, 844.

Where a horse approaching a highway along a private way became frightened and uncontrollable and when the highway was reached instead of turning into it went directly across and down an unguarded embankment on the opposite side, a recovery was denied. Higgins v. Boston, 148 Mass. 484.

But in Connecticut it has been held that the mere fact that at the time of the fright the horses were not upon the highway will not prevent recovery if they subsequently reached and ran along it until the accident occurred. Ward v. North Haven, 43 Conn. 148.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

(.....Ind.....)

1. Payment of an overcharge of freight to a railroad company engaged as a common carrier of goods is not voluntary so as to prevent recovering it.

NOTE.—Right of a carrier at common law to discriminate between passengers or shippers.

The right of a common carrier at common law to discriminate between customers in the matter of charges, which is denied in the above case, is affirmed in the California case, Cowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., post, —.

This right is also alleged to exist in Johnson v. Pensacola & P. R. Co. 16 Fla. 632, 26 Am. Rep. 781; Ragan v. Aiken, 9 Lea, 609, 42 Am. Rep. 634; Mena-cho v. Ward, 27 Fed. Rep. 529; Ex parte Benson, 18 S. C. 38, 44 Am. Rep. 564.

The same rule is declared in Avinger v. South Carolina R. Co., 29 S. C. 265, although this was not necessary to the decision, which was that a carrier cannot discriminate between shippers in taking freight for transportation.

In Fitchburg R. Co. v. Gage, 13 Gray, 306, it is said that the common law requires equal justice to all but the equality is in a right to a reasonable compensation, and that "for specified reasons in isolated cases" the carrier may give lower rates to one than to another.

So in Spofoord v. Boston & M. R. Co., 126 Mass. 326, substantially the same doctrine is held under the Massachusetts statute requiring "reasonable and equal terms," and it is held that one purchasing a season ticket at an established and reasonable price cannot complain because for special reasons not disclosed such tickets are sold to certain persons at a less price.

In Ragan v. Aiken, supra, the discrimination upheld was in favor of a person at a distance and was made to secure shipments which would otherwise have been sent by another carrier.

But a majority of the recent cases at least sustain the decision in the main case and hold that at common law a carrier cannot unjustly discriminate in rates between persons in the same circumstances. Root v. Long Island R. Co. 4 L. R. A. 331, 23 N. Y. S. R. 226; Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Closser, 9 L. R. A. 754, 126 Ind. 348; Cook v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 9 L. R. A. 764, 81 Iowa, 551; Fitzgerald v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 13 L. R. A. 70, 63 Vt. 166; Messergers v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 37 N. J. L. 531, aff. 36 N. J. L. 457, 13 Am. Rep. 542; Atwater v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 55; Hays v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 309.

Statutes prohibiting discrimination between shippers or passengers have been held to be merely declaratory of the common law. Shipper v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 47 Pa. 388; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Smith, 63 Tex. 362; Concord & P. R. Co. v. Forsaith, 59 N. H. 122, 47 Am. Rep. 181.

Some of the cases without positively limiting the extent to which discrimination in rates is unlawful hold that it is so where, as in the main case, it is unjust and tends to build up the business of one shipper at the expense of another. Vincent v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 49 Ill. 32; State v. Cincinnati, W. & B. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 819, 47 Ohio St. 130; Scofield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 43 Ohio St. 571.

2. An allegation in a suit to recover an overcharge of freight that an excess was paid authorizes an inference that it was paid by the shipper, at least as against a demurrer.

3. A railroad company cannot discriminate in favor of a shipper who is able to furnish a large amount of freight over one engaged in the same business who is unable to furnish the same quantity, at least where both ship in car-load lots.

4. Whether the agreement of a shipper

Am. Dec. 552, it is said, though not necessarily decided, that rates charged by a carrier must be uniform although special favor may be shown to individuals or classes by carrying them free or for half price.

So in Christie v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 94 Mo. 453, it is held that the illegality of rebates to shippers depends on the exclusiveness of such privilege.

A contract for the monopoly of transportation of certain kinds of freight is illegal. Union Locomotive & Exp. Co. v. Erie R. Co. 37 N. J. L. 23.

A carrier cannot arbitrarily refuse to carry a passenger over a line in which it is transporting other passengers as a common carrier. Wheeler v. San Francisco & A. R. Co. 81 Cal. 45, 89 Am. Dec. 147.

And a carrier has no right to discriminate by selling tickets to some persons and not to others. Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Rindard, 46 Ind. 293.

Neither can a railroad company refuse to sell to a particular person a commutation ticket such as it sells to people generally. Atwater v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 55.

Neither is discrimination allowed between shippers to the prejudice of one as to forwarding their property. Keeney v. Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada, 47 N. Y. 525, 59 Barb. 104; Avinger v. South Carolina R. Co. 29 S. C. 265.

It is unlawful for a railroad company to discriminate unjustly between two rival lines of steamboats. Samuels v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 51 Fed. Rep. 67.

For discrimination by a railroad company between express companies wishing to do business over its line and in general for the right to compel service by a carrier or other party whose business it is to serve the public, see note to Rushville v. Rushville Nat. Gas Co. (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 321.

In England the question of discrimination by a railroad company between its patrons has long been regulated by statute, which secures substantial equality in the service. Ransome v. Western Counties R. Co. 1 C. B. N. S. 437; Oxlade v. Northeastern R. Co. 1 C. B. N. S. 454, 26 L. J. N. S. C. P. 129; Baxendale v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 4 C. B. N. S. 61; Nicholson v. Great Western R. Co. 5 C. B. N. S. 306; Garton v. Bristol & E. R. Co. 6 C. B. N. S. 639; Branley v. Southeastern R. Co. 12 C. B. N. S. 68; London & N. W. R. Co. v. Evershed, 3 App. Cas. 1029.

The recent decisions strongly tend to deny the right of a carrier to ruin or injure one man's business and build up that of his rival by discrimination in rates, and to this extent it seems safe to say the weight of authority restricts discrimination, but, on the other hand, it seems to be a fair implication from a majority of the decisions that a carrier may in the absence of statutory restrictions show special favor to particular individuals by carrying them or their goods free or for less than the usual reasonable rates so long as it is merely a matter of favor to those individuals and works no injury to others.

to furnish a railroad company certain goods at a given price relieves a discrimination of rates in his favor of its objectionable features is a question of fact for the jury.

5. A carrier cannot rightfully establish rates in order to keep on its own line material for which it has use, or to keep the price low for its own advantage.

6. A contract with a shipper of such character as to destroy the business of his rivals by giving him a monopoly is unjust without regard to the consideration upon which it is based.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Vanderburgh County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover back certain alleged overcharges for freight transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gilchrist & DeBruler for appellant.

Messrs. Buchanan & Buchanan and William Hamill, for appellees:

As between a railroad company and a shipper, the parties do not stand on an equal footing, and the payment of an unlawful and unreasonable freight can be recovered by the shipper without protest at the time of its payment.

The duty of a common carrier is one of law, growing out of their office, and not of contract.

Western Transp. Co. v. Newhall, supra; Redfield, Com. Carriers, 30, 40.

The very definition of a common carrier excludes the right to grant monopolies or to give special or unequal preferences.

Where a railroad company has made known a usual rate, it is so far bound by it that on tender of the rate it must receive the goods, and can recover no more if freight is not prepaid and it carries the goods; and whether the compensation be fixed by law or its own established usage, it must be applied equally and indifferently, all persons being charged the same price for carriage of the same quantity of similar goods for the same distance.

No distinction must be made between one class of persons and another.

2 Addison, Cont. § 1007; 2 Kent, Com. p. 599.

Coffey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is here for the second time. See 119 Ind. 358.

Upon a return of the case to the court below the appellee filed an amended complaint consisting of seven paragraphs. There was a verdict against the appellees on the first, second, and third paragraphs of the complaint, so they need no further notice. The appellant contends that the superior court erred, first, in overruling its demurrer to the fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs of the complaint; second, in overruling its motion for a new trial.

The fifth paragraph of the complaint alleges substantially that the appellees, as partners, were engaged in the business of purchasing and shipping railroad ties; that the appellant owned and operated a railroad running by and through the stations and towns of Tennyson, Chandler, Gentryville, and Ferdinand, in Indiana; that there was no other railroad through or near these places for the transportation of freight; that after the construction of the appellant's road the appellees engaged in the business of purchasing railroad cross-ties and shipping the same from the above-named stations to the city of Evansville; that the regular and reasonable charge and tariff rate of freight for cross-ties from these stations to the city of Evansville was $14 per car; and that such price had been charged from the date of the construction of the road until the 1st day of January, 1887, and that such price and rate of freight is still the amount charged for the shipment of cross-ties from these stations to Evansville; that such sum was the full and reasonable charge for such freights and was and has been so recognized by the appellant; that prior to the 1st day of January, 1887, there were several parties engaged in the purchase and shipment of cross-ties from said stations; that after the 1st day of January, 1887, the appellant wrongfully and unjustly charged as freight for cars loaded with cross-ties the sum of $24 for each car from said stations to the city of Evansville; that such charge was unreasonable and excessive and destructive of the business of the appellees; that at the time such increased rate of freight was charged by the appellant, appellees had at said stations and along the line of said railroad 100,000 cross-ties, which had cost them $25,000, that said ties could not be shipped by any other railroad, as appellant knew, that the appellees had contracted for the sale of the ties and were compelled to fill and complete such contract; that they were unable to purchase ties at any other place to fill the same and were compelled to ship the same over the appellant's road; that the appellant collected from the consignees of said ties the sum of $24 freight on each car so shipped by the appellees from said stations to the city of Evansville; that they shipped 84 cars of said ties between the 1st day of January, 1887, and the 1st day of August, of that year, from the above-named stations to the city of Evansville to fill their contract and dispose of such cross-ties; that the excess of freight so charged and received by the appellant was $2,800 that at the same time the appellant was so charging the appellees the sum of $24 per car it was charging other parties for similar shipments the sum of $14 only, that before the commencement of this suit the appellees demanded of the appellant said sum of $2,800 which it refused to pay, and thereupon they demanded of the appellant $2,800 damages, which it refused to pay.

The sixth paragraph of the complaint is similar to the fifth except that it contains the further allegations that the appellant entered into a contract with one Dickerson, whereby Dickerson was permitted to ship cross-ties over the appellant's road at $14 per carload, each load containing 200 ties, while it charged the appellees and all others the sum of $24 per car for like shipments; that the contract with Dickerson was made for the purpose of giving him a monopoly of the business of purchasing and shipping cross-ties over the line of the appellant's road; that by reason of such unjust discrimination the business of the appellees was destroyed, to their damage in the sum of $2,800.

The seventh paragraph is substantially the same as the fifth, except that it contains the further allegation that it received receipts from the appellants for the cross-ties shipped, which the appellants called bills of lading, but which the appellees refused to accept as such, but did receive them as receipts for ties shipped.

It is claimed by the appellant that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the fifth and seventh paragraphs of the complaint because it appears from each of these paragraphs that the payments therein set forth were voluntary payments. It is said by counsel in their brief that no kind of extortion is shown, no pretense that the appellant refused to carry the cross-ties or refused to deliver them unless the rates charged were paid, nor is there any claim that the appellees were ignorant of the facts stated in these paragraphs at the time the freight was paid.

On the other hand it is contended by the appellees that payments made to a railroad company or other common carrier for overcharges for carrying freight are not voluntary payments for the reason that the shipper and the carrier do not stand upon an equality.

The only authorities cited by the appellant holding that a payment without protest to a common carrier for an overcharge is a voluntary payment, are the cases of Evershed v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 184, and DuBose v. Georgia R. & B. Co. 50 Ga. 804:

We are of the opinion, however, that the decided weight of authority is that the payment of an overcharge of freight to a railroad company engaged as the common carrier of goods is not a voluntary payment within the ordinary meaning of that term.

In the case of Heiserman v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co., 68 Iowa, 732, 16 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 46, which was an action to recover for overpayment of freights, the court said: "Nor need the plaintiff, in a case brought to enforce such an obligation, show objection or protest prior to the payment made in excess of reasonable compensation. These rules are founded upon the consideration that railroad companies are public carriers, and those who employ them are in their power and must bow to the rod of authority which they hold over the consignors and consignees of property transported by them. . . . The law does not require objection or protest to the payment of unjust charges for the reason that they would be vain, being addressed to those who occupy the commanding position of power to enforce obedience to their requirements. For another reason they are not required. Those who do business with the railroads never come in contact with the officers who possess authority to fix or abate rates of charges; indeed, they usually hardly know their names or where to find them. . . . These considerations take the case from the operation of the familiar rule which forbids recovery on account of payments voluntarily made without objection or protest."

In the case of Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Chicago, V. & W. Coal Co., 79 Ill. 121, it was said by the Supreme Court of Illinois: "In such a case, where the coal company has no other outlet for its coal, and the railroad company exacts more freight than by the terms of the contract they are entitled to, the coal company should be considered as under a kind of moral duress and the payment by them of the freight demanded, under such circumstances, could not be considered voluntary, and they would have the right to sue upon the contract and recover back the excess of freight paid over the contract price."

In the case of Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Steiner, 61 Ala. 559, which was an action to recover for over-payment of freights on the transportation of cotton, the court said: "The nature of the business considered, the shipper does not stand on equal terms with the carrier in contracting for charges for transportation, and if the shipper pays the rates established in violation of law by the carrier, rather than forego his services such payment is not voluntary in the legal sense, and the shipper may maintain his action for money had and received to recover back the illegal charge."

Indeed, there seems to be but little conflict in the authorities in this country holding that the payment to a railroad company engaged in the business of common carrier of an overcharge of freight for goods transported over the road of such company is not a voluntary payment, as the law interprets that term. Peters v. Marietta & O. R. Co. 42 Ohio St. 275, 18 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 492; Parker v. Great Western R. Co. 7 Man. & G. 253; Addison, Cont. § 1048; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 375, 21 L. ed. 638; Beckwith v. Frisbie, 32 Vt. 559; West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Sweetser, 25 W. Va. 435; LaFayette & I. R. Co. v. Pattison, 41 Ind. 812.

In the case of LaFayette & I. R. Co. v. Pattison, supra, which was an action to recover back an excessive payment of freight made under an agreement that such payment should not be regarded as voluntary, this court said: "In the second place, we are of the opinion that money so paid could be recovered back, if there had been no valid agreement that it might be; while the appellants were not in the actual possession of the cattle of appellee, they possessed such power and control over the shipment and delivery thereof as gave them an undue advantage over the appellees and the necessity of the appellee was so great as to deprive him of the freedom of his will."

Under these authorities we are constrained to hold that the payments which appellees in this case are seeking to recover from the appellant are not to be regarded as voluntary payments, and for that reason the complaint 18 L. R. A.

is not subject to the objection here urged against it.

The appellant is in error in its contention that it does not appear by the allegations found in the sixth paragraph of the complaint that any excessive freight was paid. It is alleged that the excess of freight so charged and received by the appellant was $2,800. It is true that it does not appear by affirmative allegation that it was paid by the appellees, but as they were the shippers we think such an inference should be made. This paragraph was, perhaps, subject to a motion to make it more specific, but such a defect is not reached by demurrer.

In our opinion the court did not err in overruling the demurrer of the appellant to either the fifth, sixth, or seventh paragraphs of the complaint.

Under the second assignment of error it is contended by the appellant that the court erred in giving to the jury certain instructions asked by the appellees, in giving a certain instruction to the jury on its own motion and in refusing to give certain instructions which at the proper time it asked the court to give to the jury.

As instructions must be pertinent to the case made by the evidence in the cause it is proper to state the case now before us, as it is made by the evidence introduced by the parties on the trial of the cause, before we examine the instructions given and refused. It appears from the proofs in this case that the appellant's road runs for some considerable distance through a heavily timbered country. For some years prior to the first day of January, 1887, the appellees and several other parties had been engaged in the business of purchasing and shipping railroad ties over the appellant's road from the stations named in the complaint to the city of Evansville. Prior to that date the uniform rate of freight from these stations to the city of Evansville was fourteen dollars per carload of two hundred ties. In the fall and early winter of 1886, the appellees had purchased and had piled up on the appellant's road at the stations named, a large number of railroad ties, which they could ship in no way except over the road operated by the appellant. On the 1st day of January, 1887, the appellant raised the price of freight on railroad ties from said stations to the city of Evansville from $14 to $24 per car on all shippers except one Dickerson. The appellant entered into a contract with Dickerson by the terms of which he was permitted to ship ties from these stations at the price of $14 per car in consideration that he would ship over the road 500 cars per month and would sell it such ties as it would need at twenty-five cents each. The evidence tends to prove that the price of ties on this road was twenty-six cents at the time the contract was made. After the freight was so raised the appellees shipped the ties they then had on hand over the appellant's road, amounting to about 353 cars, upon which the appellant collected from the consignees $24 per car, which was deducted by the consignees from the agreed price to be paid for the ties on settlement with the appellees. The result.

of the discrimination in favor of Dickerson was to drive the appellees and other dealers in ties off the appellant's road and thus give Dickerson a monopoly of the business of purchasing and shipping ties.

Upon these facts the court of its own motion, as well as at the request of the appellees, instructed the jury substantially that if during seven months of the year 1887 the appellees shipped 853 carloads of cross-ties, in the usual manner, over the appellant's railroad, and during the same time Dickerson shipped a greater number of carloads under a special contract, which in addition to the contract of affreightment contained other stipulations of advantage to the appellant that the natural and necessary effect of these transactions considered in detail and altogether was a substantial discrimination in favor of Dickerson and against the appellees who were made to pay to the appellant many hundred dollars in excess of that paid by Dickerson for similar services and in excess of the value of all that was done or furnished or to be done or furnished by him under the special contract, then the appellees upon making a demand would be entitled to recover for the excess of freight so paid by them.

If any objection at all can be urged against these instructions it is, we think, that they are, under the facts in this case, too favorable to the appellant. It is not true that a railroad company, engaged in the business of a common carrier, possesses the same liberty to make contracts for its profit in carrying freight or passengers that a private person engaged in a private business possesses in making contracts in relation to private affairs.

Railroad companies are granted charters and are given the right of eminent domain because when the roads are constructed, though owned by the corporation, they are nevertheless for public use, and are, in a qualified sense, public highways. Every one constituting a part of the public for whose use they are constructed is entitled to an equal and impartial participation in the use of the facilities for transportation which they afford. While power to fix rates is conferred upon them by law such rates are always open to investigation by the courts, for it is an elementary rule that common carriers can charge no more than a reasonable compensation for the services performed. While it is true that there is apparently some conflict in the authorities, the principles here announced we think are supported by the weight of authority. Root v. Long Island R. Co. 114 N. Y. 300, 4 L. R. A. 331; New England Exp. Co. v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 57 Me. 188; Scotfield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 43 Ohio St. 617, 54 Am. Rep. 846; Sandford v. Catawissa, W. & E. R. Co. 24 Pa. 378, 64 Am. Dec. 676; Hays v. Pennsylvania Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 309; Atty-Gen. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 35 Wis. 426; Samuels v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 81 Fed. Rep. 57; Providence Coal Co. v. Providence & W. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 363.

A writer on railway law thus expresses the general rule: "Railways are held to the strictest impartiality in the conduct of their business, in withholding all privileges or preferences from one customer which are not extended to all others." 1 Wood, Railway Law, 565. Of course there are some exceptions to the general rule, and we are not unmindful of the rule which permits a common carrier to discriminate in favor of a shipper who transports large quantities of a given commodity in one parcel at a time, as against a shipper who transports the same commodity in small quantities in broken packages. Such discrimination is rendered necessary by the increased expense of handling, storing, and caring for the smaller quantities, and is not unreasonable. Nor have we overlooked the rule which permits the common carrier to discriminate in favor of one class of goods over others of a different class. These rules constitute an exception to the general rule but in our opinion they have no application here. In this case the commodity shipped for Dickerson and the commodity shipped for the appellees was the same. All was shipped in full carloads and from the same stations. It is difficult to perceive how it is possible that it should cost more to ship a carload of cross-ties for the appellees than to ship a carload for Dickerson. It is plain, therefore, we think, that discrimination of $10 on the car was unreasonable unless there was something in the special contract between the appellant and Dickerson which rendered such discrimination reasonable.

It is contended by the appellant that in view of the fact it secured by its contract with Dickerson a certain income of $7,000 per month that it could as well afford to carry ties for him at $14 per car as to carry them for the appellees at $24 per car.

We find it unnecessary to inquire whether the appellant is correct or otherwise in this contention, for as we understand the law a railroad company engaged in the business of a common carrier is not permitted by the law to discriminate in favor of a shipper who is able to furnish a large amount of freight over one engaged in the same business who is unable to furnish the same quantity as that shipped by his more opulent rival. The reasons for prohibiting such discrimination are well stated in the case of Hays v. Pennsylvania Co., supra. In that case it was said: "The discrimination complained of rests exclusively on the amount of freight shipped by the respective shippers during the year. Ought a discrimination resting exclusively on such a basis to be sustained. If so, the business of the country is in some degree subject to the will of railroad officials; for if one man engaged in mining coal and dependent on the same railroad for transportation to the same market can obtain transportation thereof at from twenty-five to fifty cents per ton less than another competing with him in the same business solely on the ground that he is able to furnish, and does furnish the larger quantity for shipment, the small operator will sooner or later be forced to abandon the unequal contest and surrender to his more opulent rival. If the principle is sound in its application to rival parties engaged in mining coal, it is equally applicable to merchants, millers, dealers in grain and everybody else interested in any business requiring any considerable amount of transportation by rail, and it follows that the success of all such enterprises would depend as much on the favor of the railroad officials as upon the energies and capacities of the parties prosecuting the same. . . . The men who control railroads would be quick to appreciate the power with which such a hold would invest them, and, it may be, not slow to make the most of their opportunities, and perhaps tempted to favor their friends to the detriment of their personal or political opponents, or demand a division of the profits realized from such collateral pursuits as could be favored or depressed by discrimination for or against them, or else seeing the augmented power of capital, organize into overshadowing combinations and extinguish all petty competition, monopolize business and dictate the price of coal and every other commodity to the consumers."

In our opinion, the fact that Dickerson was able to furnish a larger number of carloads of ties for shipment than the appellees could, constituted no sufficient reason for a discrimination in his favor over the rates charged to the appellees. As to whether the fact that Dickerson agreed to furnish the appellant such ties as it desired for its own use, at a given price, relieved the discrimination of its objectionable features by which it became a reasonable discrimination was a question of fact which was properly submitted to the jury for its determination.

The court at the request of the appellees, instructed the jury in substance that a carrier cannot rightfully establish rates in order to keep on its line material for which it has use or to keep the price low for its own advantage; that the producers are entitled to sell it when they wish and in the most available market. Common carriers are forbidden to attempt this by applying disproportionate or unreasonable rates.

It is contended by the appellant that there was no evidence in the cause to which this instruction could apply, but we think otherwise. The fact that the appellant made a contract with Dickerson for cross-ties, to be used by it, at less than the selling price, and then discriminated against all other dealers in such a manner as to drive them from its road authorized the inference that one object in view was to keep the ties it desired to use upon its line and to keep down the price. We think the instruction stated the law correctly and that it was applicable to the evidence in the cause. Reynolds v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 685.

We are of the opinion that there is no error in the instructions given by the court of which the appellant has the right to complain.

Instruction No. 8 asked by the appellant and refused by the court was vicious in that it was calculated to create the impression upon the minds of the jury that the contract between the appellant and Dickerson did not amount to an unjust discrimination if it was based upon an adequate consideration.

If the contract was of such a character as to destroy the business of the appellees by reason of the discrimination in favor of Dickerson and thus enable Dickerson to acquire a monopoly of the business of purchasing and shipping cross-ties on appellant's road, the discrimination was unjust without regard to the consideration upon which it was based. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 67 Ill. 11, 16 Am. Rep. 599; People v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 55 Ill. 111, 8 Am. Rep. 681; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 56 Ill. 365, 8 Am. Rep. 690; Garton v. Bristol & E. R. Co. 6 C. B. N. S. 641; Orouch v. London & N. W. R. Co. 14 C. B. 254; Sandford v. Catawissa, W. & E. R. Co. 24 Pa. 882, 64 Am. Dec. 667; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Thompson, 19 Ill. 584; Western Transp. Co. v. Newhall, 24 Ill. 466, 76 Am. Dec. 760.

There was no evidence in the record to which the fourth instruction asked by the appellant was applicable, and for that reason it was properly excluded.

The sixth instruction asked by the appellant and refused by the court was defective in that it excluded from the consideration of the jury the question as to whether there had been an unjust discrimination made by the appellant in favor of Dickerson, whereby the appellees had been damaged.

In our opinion, there is no error in the record for which the judgment in this case should be reversed.

Judgment affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN &
SOUTHERN R. CO. Appt.,

v.

A. B. FERGUSON

Injury to a colt by running into a barbed-wire fence along a railroad when frightened off the track by a train whistle does not make the railroad company liable although the colt got upon the track through defects in the fence where the railroad company is not required by statute to fence out stock.

NOTE.—For notes as to liability of railroad company for lack of fence, see Gallagher v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Conn.) 5 L. R. A. 737; Moses v. Southern Pac. R. Co. (Or.) 8 L. R. A. 135. 18 L. R. A.

(December 3, 1902.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hempstead County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the loss of a colt alleged to have been killed by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dodge & Johnson, for appellant; In the absence of a statute requiring a railroad to fence its track, there is no legal obligation resting on it to do so.

Campbell v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 50 Conn. 128, 18 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 589; Ward v. Paducah & M. R. Co. 4 Fed. Rep. 862, 1 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 620; St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. v. Busby, 81 Mo. 48, 22 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 589; Boston & A. R. Co. v. Briggs, 182 Mass. 24, 7 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 541; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Walbrink, 47 Ark. 330.

The doctrine laid down in Hot Springs R. Co. v. Newman, 36 Ark. 607, and Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Trotter, 37 Ark. 593, is conclusive as to this case. In each of these cases the animals were injured by getting into a culvert. As in this case the engine or any part of the train did not strike the animals. They were frightened into going into the culvert.

The court said: "Though the injury might not have happened if the train had been sooner stopped, yet it was not to have been foreseen or anticipated by the person in charge of it, as a natural and probable consequence of the cars not stopping sooner, that the cars would attempt to pass over the culvert, or be injured, and which they, as persons of ordinary care and prudence, should have guarded against. Negligence cannot be imputed to them or the defendant.

Mr. James H. McCollum, for appellee:

All railroads which are now or may be hereafter built shall be responsible for all damages to persons and property done or caused by the running of trains in this state.

Mansf. Ark. Dig. § 5537.

Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do.

Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Co. 11 Exch. 764. See Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439, 24 L. ed. 506.

It is lawful in this state to permit stock to graze upon the commons.

Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Finley, 37 Ark. 593; Jones v. Nichols, 46 Ark. 207, 55 Am. Rep. 575.

Defendant is well aware of the fact that stock running at large and feeding upon the commons are liable to, and frequently do, stray upon its right of way and track. The defendant further knows that stock become frightened and wildly flee for safety at the approach of railway trains, and blindly run over precipices and into hollows, ditches, wire fences or anything else in the way, in their wild and frantic efforts to escape destruction. For the defendant, with a full knowledge of all this, to fence its track with a wire fence, and fail to connect same at the ends with its track, and fail to repair it for three years, and suffer it to become greatly dilapidated, and permit it to remain for months in that condition, as to allow stock running at large to stray on the inside and across same, upon its right of way and track, where such stock would be greatly endangered, entrapped, and liable to almost certain destruction, by being frightened and driven into the fence by the defendant's passing trains, unquestionably is culpable negligence.

The fence was the proximate cause of the accident.

Bizzell v. Booker, 16 Ark. 308; Jones v. Nichols, supra; Cameron v. Vandergriff, 53 Ark. 381; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 12 L. R. A. 189, 54 Ark. 209; *Millen v. Law, p. 889, and note.

It is wholly immaterial as to who actually built the fence, or for whose benefit it was built.

The defendant was not required by law to build the fence; but as it undertook to erect and maintain the same, the law declares that it should have been kept in a good and safe condition.

Sisk v. Crump, supra; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Guertin, 115 Ill. 466, 24 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 385.

The fence was a nuisance and the defendant should be held liable for any damages flowing therefrom.

Wood, Nuisances, §§ 118, 184, 188.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant inclosed a part of its railway track and right of way with a wire fence. For three years the fence was permitted to stand without repairs. The result was, at the end of that time, it was in a very bad condition. There were several gaps in it, and it was not connected with the track at the ends. While it was in this condition the colt of appellee strayed on the right of way of appellant, and upon the part of its railway track so inclosed; and an engineer of an approaching train, discovering it upon the track, sounded the alarm, frightened the colt, and it ran from the track against the wire fence by which its throat was cut, and the colt died from the wound.

Was the appellant liable to the appellee for the loss occasioned by the failure to construct the fence so as to make it harmless to stock, and keep the same in good repair?

A well-established rule of law is that the owner of private grounds is under no obligations to keep them in a safe condition for the benefit of trespassers or those who may go upon them uninvited, from motives of private convenience in no way connected with the owner, or from curiosity. He is under no obligation to fence or guard any wells, ditches, stone quarries, or other pitfalls, or dangerous places on his uninclosed grounds, in order to protect animals staying thereon against injuries, and is not liable for the damages suffered because he failed to do so. Hughes v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 66 Mo. 325; Clary v. Burlington & M. R. Co. 14 Neb. 232; Leesman v. South Carolina R. Co. 4 Rich. L. 413; Gilman v. Sioux City & P.

R. Co. 62 Iowa, 299; 1 Thomp. Neg. pp. 298, 303; 8 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. §§ 1149, 1151, and cases cited.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Fairbairn, 48 Ark. 493, Chief Justice Cockrill, speaking for the court, said: "The appellee was injured by stepping into a cavity caused by a rotten plank, in the appellant's platform at Biene station. The jury found the issues in his favor, and the question whether the appellee was lawfully on the platform at the time when he was injured is the only one properly left for our consideration. If he was there merely from curiosity, or for his own convenience for the transaction of business in no way connected with the railway company, no relation existed between him and the company which imposed upon the latter the duty of exercising even ordinary care in maintaining a safe platform for his own use, and it is not liable for his injury."

Is an owner of private grounds under greater obligation to owners of livestock as to such stock? In Kansas City, S. & M. R. Co. v. Kirksey, 48 Ark. 368, the court said: "The railroad's obligation as a carrier, or its duty to a person rightfully upon its track, are not coincident with the negative duty not to injure, unnecessarily, stock that wanders upon its right of way and track. It is held to a rigid observance of its public duties, but, as to stock straying upon its right of way, its obligation is not different from that of other owners or occupants of real estate. . . . The statute has placed no obligation upon the railroad in that respect, and the rights and liabilities of the company and stock owner are governed by the common law. The company is not required to fence out the stock, and the stock owner enjoys the passive license of free pasturage upon its open premises as upon those of natural persons, without being held to accountability as a trespasser. . . . The technical wrong that the landowner suffers by the entry of another's stock is regarded as too slight to engage the attention of the law,—damnum absque injuria. But the privilege of entry and free pasturage is not a right which can be demanded and enforced,—it is only an immunity from suit or punishment; and the company or other landowner is under no obligation to expend money or labor in preparing the land for a convenient or a safe enjoyment of it." And this court, in that case, held that "the duty of railroad companies to avoid unnecessary injury to stock upon their tracks does not require them to keep their entire right of way clear of obstructions which conceal stock from view of the engineer of the train until they rush upon the track unseen, and too late to avoid the injury."

The law upon this subject, and the reason for it are clearly and succinctly stated by Chief Justice Gibson in Knight v. Abert, 6 Pa. 472, 47 Am. Dec. 478. He said: "In this, and perhaps every American, state, an owner of cattle is not liable to an action for their browsing on their neighbor's uninclosed woodland. But it follows not, because such browsing is excusable as a trespass, it is a matter of right. It is an immunity, not a privilege, or, at most, a license revocable at 18 L. R. A.

the will of the tenant, who may turn his neighbor's cattle away from his grounds at pleasure. Their entry is, in strictness, a trespass, which, for its insignificance, is not noticed by the law, probably on the foot of the maxim, de minimis, or perhaps because it is better that all waste lands should be treated as common without stint. It certainly saves vexatious litigation. The particular loss from it is inappreciable, even as a subject of nominal damages, and would probably be held so even in England, where waste land is altogether worthless. But, even if an owner of cattle had the right claimed for him, the tenant would not be bound to expend his money or his labor in preparing his land for the safe and convenient enjoyment of it. A man must use his property so as not to incommode his neighbor, but the maxim extends only to neighbors who do not interfere with it or enter upon it. He who suffers his cattle to go at large takes upon himself the risks incident to it. If it were not so, a proprietor could not sink a well or a sand pit, dig a ditch or a mill race, or open a stone quarry or a mine hole, on his own land, except at the risk of being liable for consequential damages from it, which would be a most unreasonable restriction of his enjoyment. He might as well be required to level a precipice, put a fence round a swamp, or cut down reclining trees. It is enough, in all reason, that his neighbor's cattle have the range of his forest, without imposing on him the duty of looking to their safety. If the owner of them does not choose to enjoy his license on that footing, let him keep them at home, or send a herdsman along with them. The law imposes no such duty on the tenant."

Upon the principle stated in the cases we have cited, railroad companies are not required to cover culverts and bridges in their tracks so as to permit stock to pass over them in safety; yet it is a notorious fact, as attested by the records of this court, that cattle frightened by approaching trains have run into uncovered culverts and been killed; and it never has been suggested by any court, so far as known to us, that a railroad company was liable for such injuries because the culverts were uncovered. Hot Springs R. Co. v. Newman, 36 Ark. 607; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Trotter, 37 Ark. 593.

There is, however a class of authorities which holds, by way of exception to the general rule, that it is the duty of the owners of private grounds to erect suitable guards around the excavations made by them thereon, so near a public road that persons and animals passing on the road might accidentally fall into the same, and that they are liable to any one who may be injured by accidents resulting from their failure to do so. Clary v. Burlington & M. R. Co. 14 Neb. 232, and cases cited; 3 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1157, and cases cited; 1 Thomp. Neg. p. 807. In Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East, 277, A. kept on his open grounds near the highway, without notice, certain traps baited with flesh, for the purpose of catching his neighbor's dogs, and B's dog, led by his natural instinct, ran into one of these traps and was killed, and it was held that A. was liable to B. for the damages caused by the killing of the dog. And in a case in which the defendant had dug a pit under a cotton gin, near a highway, and kept it uninclosed, with corn and cotton seed scattered about it, and the plaintiff's cow, which he had turned out at a place remote from the gin, fell into it and was killed, this court held that the defendant was guilty of negligence, and liable to the plaintiff for the value of the cow. Jones v. Nichols, 46 Ark. 207, 55 Am. Rep. 575.

In this case the appellant was under no obligation to construct and maintain a fence along its track or highway, or to place guards around wells or other pitfalls or dangerous agencies on its right of way, to protect animals, uninvited, wandering thereon against injuries. It was under no greater obligations to provide safeguards against wire fences than it was to place them round pits or other dangerous places. The peculiarity of the danger does not alter the duty or liability. The owner of animals, in permitting them to run at large, assumes all the risks to which the animals are exposed by reason of such dangers.

In the trial of this case no evidence was adduced tending to show that the appellant placed anything on its right of way calculated to invite or induce horses and cattle to go thereon between its track and the wire fence, and that appellee's colt was thereby invited or induced by appellant to go upon the same at the time it was killed, as in the case of Sisk v. Crump, 112 Ind. 504, 12 West. Rep. 184, 2 Am. St. Rep. 213, cited by appellee. There was no evidence tending to show that the wire fence was constructed or maintained in such manner and so near a public street or road as to make it dangerous for horses or cattle passing along the street or road. There was no evidence to show that this case comes within any exception to the general rule. The evidence tended to prove, in short, the following facts: That the wire fence was in bad condition by reason of the gaps in it; that appellee's colt, uninvited, wandered upon the right of way and track of appellant, was frightened by an alarm lawfully given on a passing train, and ran against the fence, and was thereby wounded and killed. The case comes clearly within the general rule, as we have stated it.

But appellant did owe to appellee the duty, when it discovered his colt upon its track, to use ordinary or reasonable care to avoid injury to it by running its train against it, or by frightening and driving it by unnecessary alarms against the wire fence. *St. Louis, I. KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

J. C. GOODRICH & Wife, Plffs. in Err.,
v.
BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS of Atchison County.

(.....Kan.....)

*1. On the trial of a cause a defendant may object to the reception by the court of any evidence under the petition, although his demurrer to the same petition has previously been overruled; and the court commits no error by entertaining and passing upon said objection.

2. For all purposes of establishing and opening highways under our statute through mortgaged premises the mortgagor in possession is to be regarded as the owner of the land.

(November 7, 1891.)

NOTE.—Rights of mortgages of premises taken by eminent domain.

- a. As between mortgagor and mortgagee.
- b. As between mortgagee and appropriator.
- a. As between mortgagee and mortgagee.

It seems to be universally admitted that a mortgage of land taken for public use under eminent domain proceedings has some rights which a court will protect, but there is considerable diversity of opinion as to the precise extent of those rights and as to the most appropriate means for protecting them. As between mortgagor and mortgagee the general rule is that the award takes the place of the land appropriated, under the rule that when land is turned into money the mortgage becomes a lien upon the fund instead of the land. Astor v. Miller, 2 Paige, 68, 2 L. ed. 816.

The money represents the land for the purpose of satisfying the mortgage. Gimbel v. Stolte, 59 Ind. 453.

The damages awarded take the place of the land in respect to all the rights and interests dependent thereon. 18 L. R. A.

upon and incident to it. Utter v. Richmond, 112 N. Y. 610.

Consequently it has been held that in a road proceeding the court will not award the damages assessed to the owner of the soil without first inquiring whether or not there are incumbrances, and if there are an equitable distribution of the fund will be made. Re Noble Street, 1 Ashm. 276.

The jury should apportion the damages between the owners of the land and those having interests as mortgagees, leasees, or otherwise. Rentz v. Detroit, 48 Mich. 547.

If the mortgagee seeks to appropriate the fund it must be paid to him although he was not made a party to the condemnation proceedings. Bright v. Platt, 32 N. J. Eq. 370.

And the mortgagee is entitled to be satisfied out of the fund before the mortgagor is entitled to any part of it. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Slee, 10 West. Rep. 154, 123 Ill. 95.

The fund must be first applied on the mortgage. Dodge v. Omaha & S. W. R. Co. 20 Neb. 281.

As between a mortgagor and mortgagee the fund belongs to the latter to the extent of the mortgage debt. South Park Comrs. v. Todd, 112 Ill. 383.

ERROR to the District Court for Atchison County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of a strip of land which had been taken for the purposes of a highway. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. J. T. Allensworth, for plaintiffs in error:

The Constitution of the United States provides: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Amend. 1789, art. 5.

No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.

Ord. 1787, art. 2, § 9.

No right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until full compensation therefor be first made in money, or secured by a deposit of money to the owner irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation.

Kan. Const. art. 13, § 4.

Are the plaintiffs, mortgagees out of possession, and before foreclosure, "owners" within the protection of those provisions.

The mortgagor, it is true, holds the legal title, but the mortgagee has an equitable interest in, or right to, the mortgaged property, and under the statute, is an owner of the property.

Severin v. Cole, 38 Iowa, 468.

The term "owner" in this statute includes every person having an interest in real estate capable of being damaged by the laying out of a street.

Parks v. Boston, 15 Pick. 208; Ellis v. Welch, 6 Mass. 646, 4 Am. Dec. 122; Cool v. Crompton, 18 Me. 250; Platt v. Bright, 39 N. J. Eq. 128; Sherwood v. LaFayette, 7 West. Rep. 524, 109 Ind. 411, and authorities cited.

Certainly the mortgagee's interest is "property" within the provisions of the Constitution. It has value, is taxable, is the subject of commercial transactions.

The plaintiffs in error could have brought an action in ejectment foreclosure having been had, to recover possession of the land embraced by the road, but have elected to prosecute the present action which they can do.

On Petition for Rehearing.

While it is true the Legislature has the power to provide a tribunal which shall adju-

The mortgagees have a right to the damages awarded. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Baker, 102 Mo. 560.

The sum due on foreclosure should be ordered paid out of the condemnation money rather than to order a sale of the land. Colehour v. State Sav. Inst. 40 Ill. 153.

A mortgagee who is not made a party to the condemnation proceedings may waive the omission and assert his claim to the award, and such claim, where it is shown that the property is insufficient to pay the mortgage debt and that the mortgagor is insolvent, constitutes a lien thereon superior to that of a prior attachment levied by a creditor of the mortgagor. Sawyer v. Landers, 56 Iowa, 422.

Some of the authorities, however, hold that the award cannot be resorted to by the mortgagee until the remainder of the mortgaged property has been exhausted. Thus, in an action to determine the right to the award in which it does not appear whether or not the mortgagee was made a party to the condemnation proceedings the court said that the property condemned was no longer liable to be sold under the mortgage, and that the lien was transferred to the fund awarded, and decreed that such fund could not be resorted to by the mortgagee until they had exhausted the remainder of the land. Home Ins. Co. v. Smith, 28 Hun, 800.

An award to owners will be construed to include mortgagees. Therefore when the state on abandoning a canal made compensation to landowners for damages thereby occasioned they are subject to the lien of a mortgage upon the land to an extent sufficient to satisfy any deficiency upon a foreclosure of the mortgage. Bank of Auburn v. Roberts, 44 N. Y. 192.

Where an award is made for land taken for a street, and an assessment made on the remaining land for benefits, the award may be allotted to the mortgagee without deduction of the assessment, 18 L. R. A.

and a decree rendered for foreclosure of the remaining property to satisfy the unpaid balance of the mortgage. Hooker v. Martin, 10 Hun, 308.

The agreed rate of interest will continue on the mortgage during the time payment is delayed by proceedings for the assessment of damages under a proceeding for the assessment of the damages for a taking of the land for public use. Union Sav. Inst. v. Boston, 129 Mass. 82, 37 Am. Rep. 305.

Where the mortgagee foreclosed and purchased the land he was held to have lost all claim to the fund awarded in condemnation proceedings and new proceedings must be taken to determine what the corporation must pay to retain possession of the land. Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. v. Central R. Co. 35 N. J. Eq. 870.

b. As between mortgagee and appropriator.

Upon the questions how far the one seeking to appropriate land for public use must take notice of a mortgage thereon and what steps he must take to protect himself against such mortgage there is considerable conflict among the authorities. It has been said that a railroad company cannot obtain by proceedings under the statute greater rights than it can acquire as an innocent purchaser for value from the mortgagor. Severin v. Cole, 38 Iowa, 467.

And it seems, in many jurisdictions at least, to be necessary for the corporation to take some measures to protect itself against the claim of the mortgagee. Wooster v. Sugar River V. R. Co. 57 Wis. 312.

It has been said that the corporation must see to the discharge of a prior mortgage in order to secure its own title, and may award the sum allowed as damages to the mortgagee or keep sufficient of the fund until the mortgage falls due. Re John & Cherry Streets, 19 Wend. 659.

The corporation may require or provide for the dicating the rights of a nonresident party whose property is taken under the exercise of the right of eminent domain, yet when such tribunal consists of a jury, or commissioners, or road viewers, the notice to the nonresident must be given in such manner that the property holder could have the opportunity of appearing at the selection of such tribunal, and exercising his right of securing impartial and fair men to pass upon his rights in the premises, and the notice referred to in section 8 is given after the road viewers are appointed, and he could not, even if such notice were jurisdictional, have his day in court, as the Constitution and the law of the land provide, and is not the taking of private property by "due process of law."

Langford v. Ramsey County Comrs. 16 Minn. 375; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 865, and authorities cited, § 866, and authorities cited in notes 7, 9.

Because said Act under which the road in question was condemned does not provide for any notice whatever to nonresidents, mortgagees, or lienholders, the entire Act as to the taking of their property is unconstitutional and void.

Lewis, Em. Dom. § 865, and authorities cited, § 868, and notes 1, 2; Langford v. Ramsey County Comrs. supra.

The right of the mortgagees in the property referred to is property within the constitutional prohibition against the taking of private property without compensation and without "due process of law."

Messrs. W. T. Bland, County Atty., and James W. Orr, for defendant in error:

The law which requires a notice to be given to owners does not include mortgagees not in possession.

Chick v. Willetts, 2 Kan. 384; Burhans v. Hutcheson, 25 Kan. 625; Waterson v. Devoe, 18 Kan. 223; Vanderliffe v. Knapp, 20 Kan. 647.

A mortgagee of real estate is in no sense an owner of the land, either legal or equitable.

Kuhn v. Freeman, 15 Kan. 428; St. Louis, L. & D. R. Co. v. Wilder, 17 Kan. 289; Parish v. Gilmanton, 11 N. H. 298; Astor v. Miller, 2 Paige, 68, 2 L. ed. 816; Ballard v. Ballard Vale Co. 5 Gray, 470; Watson v. New York Cent. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 157; Farnsworth v. Boston, 126 Mass. 1.

It is urged that if the plaintiffs can be deprived of a portion of their security by the taking away of so much thereof as is necessary to make a road through the land, then, by the same reasoning, they could be deprived of the whole security, and have no remedy.

This court, in the case of Kuhn v. Freeman, supra, said: "The exercise of the right of satisfaction of the mortgage. Devlin v. New York, 121 N. Y. 127.

The mortgagee has such an interest in the proceedings that in case he is omitted therefrom by mistake the corporation may maintain an injunction suit to withhold the fund from the mortgagor until the rights of the mortgagees may be ascertained and provided for. Calumet River R. Co. v. Brown (Ill.) 12 L. R. A. 84.

On the other side, it has been held that notwithstanding the existence of mortgages on the property the mortgagor may have his damages assessed to the same extent as if they did not exist. Breed v. Eastern R. Co. 5 Gray, 470, note.

How far mortgagees must be made a party and given notice.

Expressions are found as broad as that the term "owner" includes everyone having any title or interest in the land. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Thompson, 10 Md. 87.

And it would seem that at least the numerical weight of the cases in which the question has been passed upon recognize the right of the mortgagee to notice, and in many cases in which no opinion is expressed on the point there seems to be an assumption that notice to him was necessary.

In Siman v. Rhoades, 24 Minn. 25, the court said the interest of the mortgagee could have been bound by making him a party to the proceedings.

A requirement of notice to all parties "interested in the land" to be taken includes the mortgagee. Warwick Sav. Inst. v. Providence, 12 R. I. 144; State Easton & A. R. Co. 36 N. J. L. 184.

Under a charter requiring notice to persons interested if the mortgagee is not notified he will not be bound by the proceedings. Platt v. Bright, 29 N. J. Eq. 123.

Under a statute requiring notice to all persons 18 L. R. A.

whose interests are to be affected by the proceedings notice must be given to the mortgagee; and the existence of a mortgage which is a lien on the land taken is a defect in the title within the meaning of a statute authorizing the company in case of the existence of such defect to proceed anew to acquire a valid title in the same manner as if no appraisal had been made. Re New York Cent. R. Co. 20 Barb. 419.

The same rule has been applied when the statute provides for notice to the "owner."

The term "owner" is to be regarded as descriptive of the persons equitably entitled to receive compensation for damages rather than as designating the person having a legal title to the land. And between the mortgagor and mortgagee the latter is entitled to the fund. Danforth v. Suydam, 4 N. Y. 68.

The mortgagee is an owner in such sense that he is entitled to notice of the assessment of damages for a right of way over the mortgaged property. Severin v. Cole, 38 Iowa, 467.

It is only by treating the mortgagee as having a right to notice that the statute can be upheld. Payment of the award to the mortgagor without any notice to the mortgagee will not protect the corporation from being held liable to pay it to the mortgagee. Sherwood v. Lafayette, 7 West. Rep. 524, 108 Ind. 411.

A condemnation of property upon which there is a mortgage of record without notice to the mortgagee and without his knowledge will not affect his rights in the premises. The mortgagee's rights are protected by the constitutional provision that property shall not be taken for public use without compensation. Dodge v. Omaha & S. W. R. Co. 20 Neb. 281.

A mortgagee out of possession whose mortgage is recorded should be made a party to proceedings by a railroad company to ascertain the damages of eminent domain is the exercise of a sovereign power, and no person is presumed to covenant against the acts of sovereignty."

Mr. T. M. Pierce also for defendant in error.

Strang, C., filed the following opinion:

September 24, 1881, one Silas H. Hamilton and Francis B. Hamilton gave Alexander M. Sutherland a mortgage upon a quarter section of land in Atchison county, to secure the sum of $5,800, which mortgage was placed upon record October 9, 1888. Sutherland duly assigned said mortgage to J. C. Goodrich, and on the same day Goodrich assigned an interest in said mortgage of the value of $2,818.05 to Ann B. Sutherland, both of which assignments were placed of record on the 12th day of October, 1888. January 8, 1884, a petition was filed with the county clerk of Atchison county, asking the board of county commissioners to cause a public road to be laid out, in part across and over the land covered by the mortgage above described. March 25, 1884, the road prayed for was established across said land, the viewers assessing damages to the said land in the sum of $250 and awarding the same in the name of T. C. Beard, agent of the mortgagors. Afterwards said T. C. Beard appeared before the board of county commissioners, and procured an increased allowance of damages in the sum of $100, making a total award of damages of $350, which was paid to said Beard. During the time when said road was being laid out, as well as when the award of damages was paid to Beard, the mortgagors were in possession of the land, and had been ever since the execution of the mortgage. February 8, 1885, the mortgage was foreclosed in the United States circuit court, and the land sold by a master to the plaintiff J. C. Goodrich for the sum of $2,500. April 11, 1887, this action was begun by the plaintiffs to recover the amount of said award from the board of county commissioners of Atchison county, claiming that they were entitled to the damages as mortgagees of the land, and alleging that said damages were wrongfully paid by said board to the agent of the mortgagors. March 7, 1888, defendants filed a demurrer to the petition, which demurrer was overruled by the Hon. S. H. Glenn, judge pro tem., the regular judge being disqualified to sit in the case. Answer and reply were afterwards filed, and the case came on for trial February 5, 1889, before the regular judge of the district, Hon. Robert M. Eaton, who in the mean time had been elected and qualified. A jury was ob-

If the mortgagee is not made party to the condemnation proceedings he will not be bound by the award. Calumet River R. Co. v. Brown (Ill.) 12 L. R. A. 84.

If the mortgagee is not made a party the company may be compelled to make payment for his rights although having once paid the mortgagor and the mortgagee may insist on another appraisal of the value of the land taken. Bright v. Pratt, 32 N. J. Eq. 370.

Mortgagees are necessary parties to a suit to recover the damages for the taking of the property. Davis v. Lacrosse & M. R. Co. 12 Wis. 18.

And if they do not they will be liable to him in trespass although they have condemned the right of the mortgagor and paid damages to him. Hagar v. Brainerd, 44 Vt. 302.

Under the English statutes the mortgagee must be made a party and his rights provided for. Ran-kin v. East & W. India D. R. Co. 12 Beav. 304; Martin v. London, C. & D. R. Co. L. R. 1 Eq. 145.

Under the Michigan statute mortgagees must be made defendants to proceedings to condemn land. Michigan Air Line R. Co. v. Barnes, 40 Mich. 382.

Under the Massachusetts Statutes of 1881, chap. 110, notice must be given to all persons interested as mortgagors or mortgagees, and the award must be distributed in accordance with the equitable interests of those interested; but that statute does not exclude the equitable remedy of a mortgagee who is not made a party against the mortgagor to reach the amount awarded to him. Wood v. West-borough, 1 New Eng. Rep. 594, 140 Mass. 403.

It seems that the mortgagee must be made a party under the Vermont statute. Wade v. Hen-nessy, 55 Vt. 210.

But where the mortgagee is made a party to the proceedings the damages awarded may cover the 18 L. R. A.

full value of the property taken and be assessed to the mortgagor leaving the rights of the mortgagor and mortgagee to be settled between themselves, and the damages awarded stand in place of the land; and in such case the company cannot be com-pelled to pay a second time by the fact that the mortgagee permitted payment to be made to the mortgagor and the fund to be wasted. Thompson v. Chicago & S. F. & C. R. Co. (Mo.) March 2, 1892.

In contrast with the above the following cases have held that no notice need be given to the mort-gagee:

For the purpose of receiving notice of the open-ing of a highway the mortgagee cannot be regarded as the owner of the land mortgaged under the terms of the statute. Parish v. Gilmanton, 11 N. H. 298.

After notice and compensation to the mortgagor the city is not liable to the mortgagee for lands taken for a city street under a charter providing for notice and compensation to the owner. Whit-ing v. New Haven, 45 Conn. 303.

In a taking of land for public use the mortgagor is regarded as having the entire estate in the prem-ises and entitled to receive the whole value thereof without any deduction on account of any mort-gages thereon. Read v. Cambridge, 126 Mass. 427.

In Farnsworth v. Boston, 126 Mass. 1, the mort-gagee is held not entitled to join in a petition for the assessment of damages on the ground that equity will regard the fund awarded as land and protect his rights, and that the proceeding being a public one the mortgagee has equal knowledge with the mortgagor of the proceeding.

A mortgagee cannot recover for consequential injuries to the mortgaged property from the con-struction of a railroad where the mortgagor has without fraud made an amicable settlement for such damages with the company. Knoll v. New York C. & St. L. R. Co. 1 L. R. A. 386, 121 Pa. 467.

If the company submits the matter to arbitration as provided by statute the mortgagee will be bound by the appraisal, but if the company pays the money to the mortgagor in pursuance thereof when it should have been paid to the mortgagee, it will be compelled to pay it over again to the tained, and a witness placed upon the stand, when the defendants objected to any evidence being received under the petition for the following reasons: "(1) Because this court has no jurisdiction to try this case; (2) because the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant." This motion was sustained. A motion for a new trial was then filed, which, upon a hearing, was overruled, and the case brought here for review.

The first question presented is raised by the contention of the plaintiff that the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the petition settled the law of the petition so far as the trial court was concerned; that, having overruled a demurrer to the petition, thus holding the petition to state a cause of action, the trial court could not subsequently in the same trial, when evidence was offered under the petition, sustain an objection to the reception of such evidence on the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that, when the court overruled the demurrer to the petition, such action of the court was a final adjudication in favor of the plaintiff as to the sufficiency of the petition, and, if the defendant felt aggrieved thereby, its only remedy was by appeal, and not by objecting to the introduction of the testimony. We do not think this position is tenable. This is a jurisdictional question, and we think the defendant may raise it at every stage of the trial. Though the court has overruled a demurrer, a party defendant may, in the same trial, object to the reception of evidence under the petition, and thus again secure the attention of the court to and challenge its judgment upon the same question raised by the demurrer; and if the court overrules its objection it may still raise the question before the final judgment against it by a motion for a new trial. The object of a motion for a new trial is to call the attention of the court to alleged errors, that the court may have an opportunity to correct its own errors, if it concludes, even after the trial, it has made any, or suffered any to be made. If it is proper to permit the defendant to argue the question raised by the demurrer anew on a motion for a new trial, we know of no reason why it is not proper to raise and argue the question by an objection to the reception of evidence under the petition. The object sought to be obtained is the same. By filing an answer the defendant waives his right to demur, but he does not thereby waive his right to raise the same question that he could have right party. Kennedy v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 22 Wis. 586.

Under the West Virginia statute the mortgagee need not be made a party to a proceeding to open a road. Keystone Bridge Co. v. Summers, 13 W. Va. 462.

It seems that in California the mortgagee is not a necessary party in street-opening proceedings. Schumacher v. Toberman, 56 Cal. 508.

Special circumstances under which no notice need be given.

When the statute does not provide for notice in case of the opening of a town way a notice must be given on general principles of justice to the owners of land over which it is to be located, but for that purpose a notice given to the one in possession is sufficient whether mortgagor or mortgagee. Cool v. Crommet, 13 Me. 254.

Under a statute providing that premises taken for a street shall be discharged of all rents and contracts after the land is taken, a prior mortgage cannot be enforced against the part taken but the fund awarded will represent the land and the lien of the mortgage will be good against it. Astor v. Hoyt, 5 Wend. 610.

A mortgagee of land taken for a railroad need not be made a party to proceedings for the assessment of damages if he gives his assent thereto in writing filed in the case. Meacham v. Fitchburg R. Co. 4 Cush. 291.

The mortgagees of the franchises and easements of a railroad company need not be made parties to a proceeding to condemn a right of way across its track for a street if the track is not disturbed and the company is left in control of its road. Grand Rapids v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 58 Mich. 641.

The mortgagee has no interest in the amount awarded to a mortgagor for flowage under the Mill Acts since they relate only to the damages suffered prior to the time of the rendering of the decree and are like any other annual product or inquiry thereto or to the possession of the land merely, and the mortgagee is therefore not a necessary party. Paine v. Woods, 106 Mass. 162; Vaughn v. Wetherell, 116 Mass. 188.

Effect of failure to give notice.

The mortgagee must resort first to the land remaining after the condemnation before resorting to the condemned land. Dodge v. Omaha & S. W. R. Co. 20 Neb. 281.

If after sale of the remaining land there is a deficiency the corporation must satisfy it to the amount of the value of the land taken and damages for taking it estimated as of the time of the taking, and it cannot redeem by simply paying such a proportion of the mortgage debt as will be equal to the relative value which its condemned land bears to the whole tract. Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Easton & A. R. Co. 38 N. J. Eq. 152.

Where the company took title to the land under the statute upon agreement with the mortgagor as to the price to be paid the court held that upon foreclosure of the mortgage the company was bound to contribute towards the satisfaction of the mortgage if anything remained due after applying the remainder of the land upon it to the full value of the property taken at the time of the taking. Dows v. Congdon, 16 How. Pr. 571.

The amount to be paid the mortgagee is the value of the lands at the time of the taking. Aspinwall v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 41 Wis. 474.

In New Jersey it was held that where condemnation proceedings are not instituted but the road is constructed under agreement with the mortgagor the land will be subject to be sold to satisfy the mortgage and the sale may include improvements. Price v. Weehawken Ferry, 31 N. J. Eq. 81.

But in North Hudson County R. Co. v. Booraem, 28 N. J. Eq. 457, in which possession of the land had been obtained by agreement with the mortgagor, the court held that the company was compelled to contribute towards payment of the mortgage, and that the amount of the contribution might be ascertained by condemnation proceedings to which the mortgagee was made a party. Reversing 27 N. J. Eq. 372, where the chancellor held that the mortgagee was entitled to apply the full value of the property taken including improvements in satisfaction of his mortgage.

raised by demurrer to the petition by objecting to the reception of evidence under the petition. We have examined the cases cited. The case of Sanford v. Weeks, 89 Kan. 649, instead of supporting the position of the plaintiffs, seems to militate against such position, so far as it is in point. In that case Sanford demurred to the petition, which was overruled, and no exception taken. He then objected to the reception of evidence under the petition, which was the same practice that prevailed in this case, and which is now objected to. That case also holds that, if the defendant had taken exceptions to the overruling of his demurrer, the question raised thereby might have been reviewed by this court. There is nothing in the case of Union Pac. R. Co. v. Estes, 37 Kan. 229, that supports the contention of the plaintiff. That case simply holds that a party who seeks to have a ruling on a demurrer to a petition reviewed by this court may either stand on his demurrer, and bring the case direct to this court for review, or take his exception to the ruling, file his answer, and go to trial, and, after trial, bring his case here, and have the ruling on the demurrer reviewed. That a defendant, whose demurrer to the petition is overruled, may except and stand on his demurrer, and come to this court at once, and have the question settled as to the sufficiency of the petition, is not denied in this case. That question is not involved in the case. The case cited, however, settles the question that he need not stand on his demurrer, and come at once to this court, but may take his exception, answer over, and at the end of the trial come to this court and have the question raised by his demurrer reviewed. The cases cited from Ohio, Nebraska, and New York, relate simply to the question as to whether a defendant whose demurrer has been overruled can answer over, and afterwards at the end of the trial have the ruling on his demurrer reviewed by the superior court. What the law may be in those states upon that question is not very material, as that precise question is not raised in this case, and, if it were, the cases in 87 Kan., and 89 Kan., above cited, settle the law so far as this state is concerned.

The next and more important question in this case is: "Are the plaintiffs, mortgagees out of possession, owners," within the meaning of paragraph 5477, General Statutes of 1889? Mr. Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain, (section 324,) enters upon the discussion of the general subject as to whether mortgagees are necessary parties to condemnation proceedings by saying that "the authorities on the question are not only conflicting, but very unsatisfactory." The same author adds: "The cases go almost entirely upon the language of the statutes, as though it was a matter entirely within the control of the Legislature." So, in our examination of the question, we have found the authorities thereon inharmonious, and depending very largely upon the language of the statutes, and upon the law relating to mortgages in the states where the decisions are found. In those states where the common-law doctrine relating to mortgages prevails, where the mortgagee is held to be the possessor of a defensible title to the land, it is generally held that he is a necessary party to the condemnation proceeding; while in states where the mortgage is held to be a mere security creating a lien upon the property, but vesting no estate in the mortgagee, it is generally held that the mortgagee is not a necessary party to condemnation proceedings. In some of the states, where the decisions depend upon the language of statutes, such language is broader than it is in others. In some states the statute simply requires notice to be given to the "owner," while in other states the language of the statute in relation to notice requires it to be given to the owner, mortgagee, lienholder, lessee, or other person having an interest therein. The law of mortgages is well defined in our state. In Chick v. Willetts, 2 Kan. 389, a mortgage is declared to be a mere security, creating a lien upon the property, but vesting no estate whatever in the mortgagee, either before or after condition broken. "It gives no right of possession, and does not limit the mortgagor's right to control the property." In Vanderlice v. Knapp, 20 Kan. 647, Justice Valentine, writing the opinion, says "that a mortgagor of real estate has the right to the possession of the mortgaged property, and to sever and remove timber, wood, sand, earth, coal, stone, or anything else therefrom, and to sell the same, unless it unreasonably impairs the mortgage security. When it unreasonably impairs the mortgage security, the remedy of the mortgagee is not at law, but in equity; not replevin to recover the property severed from the realty, but generally injunction to restrain the commission of waste upon the realty." Upon this question of the law of mortgages, see Clark v. Heyburn, 1 Kan. 281; Curtis v. Buckley, 14 Kan. 456; Pritchett v. Mitchell, 17 Kan. 358, 23 Am. Rep. 287; Alexander v. Shonyo, 20 Kan. 705; Robbins v. Sackett, 23 Kan. 804; Seckler v. Deife, 25 Kan. 185; Tomlinson v. Thompson, 27 Kan. 72; Perkins v. Dibble, 10 Ohio, 439, 36 Am. Dec. 97; Norwich v. Hubbard, 22 Conn. 587; Astor v. Hoyt, 5 Wend. 615. The statute of our state upon the question under discussion (par. 5477, Gen. Stat. 1889) reads as follows: "It shall be the duty of at least one of the petitioners to cause six days' notice to be given in writing to the owner or owners or their agents, if residing in the county, through whose land such road is to be laid out and established, of the time and place of meeting, as specified in the notice of the commissioners." The notice of the commissioners is pointed out in paragraph 5476 of the same statutes, and requires the county clerk to give notice "by advertisement set up in the county clerk's office and every municipal township through which any part of said road is designated to be laid out for at least twenty days, and by publication for two consecutive weeks in a newspaper, if there be one published in the county, setting forth that such petition has been presented, giving the substance thereof, and that viewers will on the day designated proceed to view said road, and give all parties a hearing." In view of the statute in our state in relation to notice in road proceedings, and the law relating to mortgages, and rights of mortgagors and mortgagees, we do not think it was necessary to serve notice on the plaintiffs for the purpose of establishing the road which was laid out across the lands upon which they at the time held a mortgage. There is nothing in our statutes that requires service of notice upon any one in such proceeding except the "owner." It has been seen that in our state a mortgagee of land is not the owner thereof. The mortgagor holds the legal title, and, in the absence of stipulations to the contrary, the right of possession. He is regarded as the owner of the land, and, when in possession by himself or agent, notice to him or his agent is, in proceedings to establish a public road, notice to the "owner," to the full intent of our statute requiring such notice.

The case of St. Louis, L. & D. R. Co. v. Wilder, 17 Kan. 246, goes a long way towards settling the law of this case. In that case, Mr. Justice Valentine, speaking for the court, says: "We think Wilder is entitled to the same damages as though he owned the unincumbered fee of the land. Da Lee is not entitled to any portion of such damages. Da Lee is entitled to the $3,000 which Wilder owes him, and to nothing more, except that he holds the legal title to the land (and possibly a lien on the damages awarded if he choose to assert that lien) as a security for his claim on Wilder." The case of Kuhn v. Freeman, 13 Kan. 423, is in line with the above case. The law upon this question is fully settled in many of the states. In Parish v. Gilmanton, 11 N. H. 298, Justice Woods says: "In the third place it is objected that certain mortgagees of land over which the road is laid were not notified of the proposed laying out of the way, and that no damages were awarded them. By the first section of the statute, as already seen, it is provided that notice shall be given to the owners of the land through which the highway is to be laid out. Whether the exception can prevail depends upon the proper decision of the question whether the mortgagee is to be regarded as the owner of the land for the purpose of receiving notice, and having damages awarded for the injury done in taking easement to the lands mortgaged. It does not appear in the present case that the mortgagees was in possession. In such cases we think that the mortgagor in possession is to be regarded as the owner, and as such is entitled to the notice. Indeed, it would now seem to be a firmly established doctrine in this state, that the mortgagee is entitled to have his mortgage interest regarded as real estate, and himself as the owner of the land mortgaged, so far only as to enable him to protect and avail himself of his just rights intended to be secured to him by the mortgage, and to give him all necessary and appropriate remedies for that purpose, and that in all other respects, and for all other purposes, it is to be treated as a chattel interest; and we think this is not one of the cases in which the mortgagee is entitled to be regarded as the owner of the land mortgaged." In Read v. Cambridge, 126 Mass. 427, the court says: "In every taking of land for public use the mortgagor is regarded in this commonwealth as having, at law, the entire estate in the premises, and entitled to recover the whole value thereof, estimated according to the provisions of the statute, without any deduction on account of the mortgages and liens thereon." In Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 160, Wells, J., delivering the opinion 18 L. R. A.

of the court, says: "This is a complaint for flowage under the Mill Act. The complainant is the mortgagor in possession of the land flowed. The mortgage was given before the erection of the dam of the respondents. The mortgagee has never entered or taken any steps towards foreclosure. The ground of defense is that the complaint cannot be maintained by the mortgagor without joining the mortgagee. The respondents insist that, as the mortgagee will not be bound by the judgment, they will be exposed to the risk of making double compensation for the same injury, if these proceedings are maintained. This objection is not tenable. For all the purposes of these proceedings, the mortgagor in possession is a sufficient party, without joining the mortgagee." A mortgagee out of possession is not the proprietor of the mortgaged premises, and, in common parlance, is never spoken of as such, nor is he so recognized in a legal sense. In truth, the mortgagee has only a lien, and cannot be considered or treated as a proprietor or owner of the mortgaged estate." Norwich v. Hubbard, 23 Conn. 587. "In laying out new highways, either by selectmen or by the county courts, or in repairing old ones, no provision is made by law for notice to be given to mortgagees; nor in practice is this ever done. The interests of the mortgagees are not regarded in these proceedings. They are necessarily connected with the interests of the mortgagor, and, in this respect, subject to them." Whiting v. New Haven, 45 Conn. 806. "In a complaint under the Mill Act by a mortgagor it is no defense that the respondent has acquired the right of the mortgagee by an assignment of the mortgage." Vaugh v. Wetherell, 116 Mass. 188. "The mortgagor of land taken by a railroad corporation for the purpose of their road may recover the full amount of damages, without regard to the mortgagees." Ballard v. Ballard Vale Co., 5 Gray, 468. We have examined the case of Severin v. Cole, 88 Iowa, 468. The cases therein referred to in 2 Ohio St. 114, and 4 Ohio St. 101, in support of the position taken in that case, relate to mechanics' liens, and are not analogous cases, and do not depend upon the same principle as the case in which they are cited, nor upon the same principle as the case at bar. The case of Ballard v. Ballard Vale Co., 5 Gray, 468, does not sustain the opinion promulgated in the Iowa case. The case in 5 Gray was under the Mill Act of Massachusetts. It was brought by the mortgagee in possession after foreclosure, and did not claim damages for any of the period of time during which the mortgagor was in possession of the premises. In fact, the case conceded that under the statute, which provided for the assessment of annual damages, the mortgagor is entitled to such annual damages while in possession; and it was undecided and left an open question as to whether the mortgagor in possession could, under the same statute, which provided also for the assessment of damages in gross,—that is, damages for all time,—elect to take damages in gross, and thus deprive the mortgagee of the right to recover annual damages after the reduction of the land to his possession; and whether the mortgagor in possession could release the owners of the mill, the dam to which caused the overflow, from the damages for all time, and thus conclude the mortgagees after obtaining possession. Merrick, J., in that case uses the following language: "The respondents [assignees of the mortgagor] have never had any interest except that which they derived from Marland, the mortgagor. His deed to them was a mere quitclaim and release of all his right, title, and interest in the premises; and these consisted only of the right of redemption, and the right of possession, previous to a breach of the condition of the mortgage. Of the former the respondents have never availed themselves; and of the latter they have had the uninterrupted advantage and enjoyment,—no claim being made for damages occasioned by the flowing before the time when the complainant entered upon and took possession of the premises for the breach of the condition of the mortgage, and to foreclose the right in equity of redemption. The right of the respondents is now superseded by the paramount title of the complainant; and they have, therefore, no defense to set up against the complaint, and can show no reason why it should not be maintained. It has been argued for the respondents that a mortgagor in possession has the power and right effectually to release and discharge a millowner from all claims for damages which have been or which may be occasioned to the mortgaged premises, either by the past or future maintenance of the dam, used and to be used forever, for the purpose of raising water to work his mill. Without intending in any degree to sanction that position, as a principle of law resulting from a just interpretation of the provision of the statute for the support and regulation of mills it is sufficient to say that the determination of this question is not requisite in this case: for it does not appear that Marland (mortgagor) has released or discharged, or even attempted to release or discharge, the respondents from all the claim to which they were or might become liable by reason of the maintenance of their dam, and the consequence to the complainants' land by overflowing it with water." Justice Cole, in the opinion of the Iowa case, says: "The case of Breed v. Eastern

R. Co. is only reported as a note to the case of Ballard v. Ballard Vale Co." That is true; but the principle decided in the case of Breed v. Eastern R. Co. is carried back and made a part of the syllabus in the case of Ballard v. Ballard Vale Co. With this examination the Iowa case loses some of its force, and we prefer to follow the precedents cited from other states, as being in line with our authorities so far as this court has already gone in analogous cases, and also in line with our numerous decisions affecting the law of mortgages, and the rights, respectively, of mortgagors and mortgagees, and hold that for all the purposes of opening highways the mortgagor in possession is to be regarded as the owner of the land. Whether a mortgagee may by a proceeding in equity intervene, and have the damages applied in accordance with what the court under all the circumstances might consider as equitable, we are not called upon in this case to decide, and therefore leave that question open to be settled in a case wherein it is raised. It will be seen that there is no provision in paragraph 5477 for notice to nonresident owners who have no agent in the county; nor is there elsewhere in our statute any provision for notice to them except the notice required to be given by the county clerk in paragraph 5476, above referred to. As that notice is required to be posted in the county clerk's office, and each municipal township through which the road or any part of it is to be established, and also published in a newspaper of the county, if there is one in the county, the Legislature probably intended this notice to reach nonresident owners; but as, under our view of the law, the plaintiffs—mortgagees out of possession at the time the road was established—are not to be regarded as "owners," it matters little, so far as this case is concerned, what the Legislature might have intended as to nonresident owners.

We recommend that the judgment of the District Court be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Clark R. GRIGGS, Respt.,

v.

Melville C. DAY et al., Exrs., etc., of Cornelius K. Garrison, Deceased, Appts.

(.....N.Y.)

1. A private entry on one's own book of accounts which shows an intention to take at seventy-five cents on the dollar certain notes held as collateral which he surrenders to the maker in exchange for bonds cannot be used by the pledgor, who did not consent to such entry or to such use of the notes as evidence of a sale thereof to the pledgee at their face value.

2. For the conversion of notes by a pledgee by surrendering them to the maker in exchange for bonds without authority from the pledgor he is liable to the latter for their actual value only if that is less than their face value.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York, affirming a judgment entered upon the report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to obtain an accounting upon certain transactions between plaintiff and defendant's testator. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Melville C. Day, with Mr. William R. Bronk, for appellants:

If the plaintiff, after the entries came to his knowledge, had not rejected, but had elected to ratify and adopt them, this adoption would have constituted Garrison the unqualified purchaser of the certificates at the price of 75 per cent as specified in the original entry.

Whenever a plaintiff avails himself of a statement, admission, or confession of the defendant to charge him, the defendant is equally entitled to the benefit of that, or any other statement made by him at the same time and in respect to the same transaction, tending to explain or qualify or destroy the use which the plaintiff might otherwise make of the admission or statement called out by him.

It was legally impossible for plaintiffs to reject or ratify one of the entries without rejecting or ratifying all.

A creditor holding negotiable paper as collateral security has an undoubted right to exchange the security without the consent of the debt, or unless restrained by the express terms of the pledge. And it is only in case loss results to the debtor from want of proper care and diligence in the exchange, that the creditor becomes responsible to the debtor for the loss sustained.

The taking by a creditor even of a negotiable promissory note does not constitute the payment of a debt unless so agreed by the parties, and the creditor can recover on the original indebtedness upon surrendering or canceling the note.

If the certificates were valid and their surrender constituted an unlawful conversion, then the defendants would be only liable for their actual value as the obligations of an insolvent debtor.

Mr. Esek Cowen, also for appellants:

If a party chooses to prove the declarations of his adversary they are evidence not only against but for such adversary.

Vibbard v. Staats, 8 Hill, 143; Clinton v. Rowland, 24 Barb. 634; Low v. Payne, 4 N. Y. 247.

If the plaintiff in this case had put the entry charging the notes to the company, as creditor, and crediting it with the bonds, in evidence, and had stopped there, the defendants would have had a clear right to prove the entry, showing the purchase of the notes at twenty-five per cent discount, upon the principle that, where a party puts his opponents' books in evidence and proves entries favorable to himself, those entries may be explained by other entries in the same books.

Low v. Payne, supra; Dewey v. Hotchkiss, 80 N. Y. 497.

The referee was in error in holding that the surrender of these notes to the company, without consideration, discharged an equivalent amount of the plaintiff's debt to him. A pledgee of a promissory note has no right of disposition of the pledge, except to collect it and apply the proceeds on his debt. He cannot sell or even compromise it.

Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392.

Much less can he extinguish it, without consideration, by its surrender to the maker.

Nothing done by Garrison either destroyed or prejudiced Griggs' right of action.

Garlick v. James, 12 Johns. 150.

There was ample evidence in the case to show the utter insolvency of the company, and a refusal to find either way as to a material fact on the ground that it was immaterial, presents a question of law that may be reviewed by this court.

James v. Cowing, 82 N. Y. 449.

Messrs. Robert G. Ingersoll and Calvin Frost, with Mr. John H. Post, for respondent:

The creditor holds all collaterals as a trustee, to be collected for the benefit of the debtor, and whenever he transfers them absolutely, without authority, he takes them at their face in satisfaction, to that extent, of the principal debt. The debtor can ask nothing more, and he is not obliged to accept anything less.

Farmers Bank of Amsterdam v. Blair, 44 Barb. 641.

Whatever amounts to satisfaction of the bill or note by the maker or acceptor operates as an absolute discharge of all parties collaterally liable.

Nothing could more effectually release or satisfy a promissory note than its surrender to the maker and its cancellation by him.

The delivery by the company to Garrison of the 2280 bonds at the agreed price of 75 per cent was equivalent to the payment of so much money by the company upon its notes.

Howard v. Norton, 65 Barb. 161.

Earl, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought against Cornelius K. Garrison, since deceased, for an accounting. It was referred to a referee, and he ordered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for upwards of $188,000. The record is very voluminous, and in the briefs submitted and the arguments of counsel many questions of law and fact were presented for our consideration. A careful study of the record has satisfied me that the judgment appealed from is both illegal and unjust. In September, 1879, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company, an Ohio corporation, for the construction and equipment of its line of railroad in that state according to the specifications and upon the terms and conditions mentioned in the contract. By one of the provisions of the contract the railroad company was "to furnish the contractor available subscriptions, or proceeds thereof, and aid, to the amount of $4,000 per mile of main track, branches, and sidings, or so much as may be necessary to furnish right of way, grade, bridge, and tie said railroad between Hudson's and Martin's Ferry," a distance of 148 miles, and "to use its best endeavors to secure for the contractor available subscriptions and aid to the extent of $4,000 per mile, or so much as may be necessary," for a similar purpose, as to the balance of the road, a distance of 58 miles. For the performance of this contract, besides the aid to be furnished as above stated, the plaintiff was to receive bonds and stock of the company. He was without financial ability, and he applied to Garrison for financial aid to enable him to perform his contract; and upon his application Garrison, from time to time, advanced him large sums of money, amounting in all, besides interest, to nearly $4,500,000. For the money so advanced the plaintiff assigned and delivered to Garrison as collateral security his construction contract and bonds and stock of the company, and some of it was repaid by the sales to him of bonds and stock. In 1882 the plaintiff received from the company for extra work claimed to have been done by him, and on account of its failure to perform the portions of the contract above quoted, its promissory notes, amounting to $1,949,710.72, and they were delivered by him to Garrison for moneys advanced and to be advanced by him for the construction of the road. Garrison held these notes until May, 1883, when there was due to him for moneys advanced to the plaintiff for the construction of the road nearly $2,500,000. He then received from the company 2,280 of its second mortgage bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each, at seventy-five cents on the dollar, amounting, with some interest, to $1,736,600, to apply upon his claims, and he then surrendered to it all of the above-mentioned promissory notes, and they were canceled. On the same day he caused an original entry to be made in his journal,—one of his accounts books,—as follows: "This amount of notes and interest, $2,062,648.13, taken from contractor at 75 per cent,

$1,546,982.85." He then charged the company in his books of account with the whole amount of the notes and interest, and gave it credit for $1,736,600,—the price, including interest, at which he took the second mortgage bonds; and he credited the plaintiff with the sum of $1,546,982.85. The difference between the total amount due upon the notes and the amount allowed by him for the second mortgage bonds was $326,048.13, and thus he had in his hands, not used for the payment of the bonds, the notes to that amount which he then surrendered to the company without any consideration whatever; and, as the referee found, he elected to look to the company as his debtor on open account for that amount. The referee also found that by reason of the surrender of the notes in consideration of the purchase of the bonds, and by reason of the surrender of the balance of the notes, and by reason of the election before mentioned, Garrison discharged the indebtedness of the plaintiff to him to the amount of the face value of the notes at the time of the surrender. He also found that the plaintiff's rights as pledgor in the construction contract, and in the bonds, stock, and other property transferred to Garrison as collateral security, were never cut off by foreclosure of his rights, or in any other way. These facts having been found by the referee, he found, among other conclusions of law, that the legal effect of the surrender by Garrison to the railroad company of the promissory notes held by him as collateral security for moneys advanced to the plaintiff, and of the charge by him against the railroad company of the full amount of the notes and interest, was to relieve the plaintiff from any liability to him for the amount thereof; and in the accounting he charged Garrison with the full amount of the notes, with interest. The only question which I deem it important now to consider is whether the learned referee was right in making that charge.

The further fact must be taken into consideration that the notes surrendered were of no value as against the company. It was utterly insolvent, with property no more than sufficient to pay its first mortgage bonds. The second mortgage bonds were absolutely of no intrinsic value. The referee held these facts to be immaterial, and that, under the circumstances, Garrison had made himself chargeable with the full amount of the notes, without reference to their value. Such a conclusion is somewhat startling, and should not be sanctioned unless it has support in well-recognized principles of law or authorities which we feel constrained to follow. The entries in Garrison's books of account in reference to these notes have very little bearing upon the controversy between these parties. They were private entries, made by Garrison, undisclosed to the plaintiff, and without his authority. They were important simply as evidence, and are entitled to no more weight than would have been the oral declarations or admissions of Garrison made to any third party. They show what use he made of the notes, and about that there is no dispute. They did not bind the plaintiff, and he has never, so far as appears, assented to them. They show that Garrison intended to take the notes at seventy-five cents on the dollar, and that he was willing to allow the plaintiff that sum for them. But there was no actual purchase of them. If that entry had come to the knowledge of the plaintiff, and he had adopted it, and so notified Garrison, he could probably have held him to a purchase of the notes for that sum. But he repudiates that entry, and refuses to let Garrison have the notes for that sum. He cannot use that entry to fasten upon him a purchase of the notes at their face value. The minds of the parties never met upon such a contract. Garrison either purchased the notes used in exchange for the bonds at 75 per cent of their face value, or he did not purchase them at all. Therefore, as the plaintiff repudiates the purchase at the price named, there was no contract of purchase; and as to these notes, pledged for collateral security, Garrison must be held to have wrongfully converted them to his own use. It would make no difference whether we consider these notes as having been exchanged for the bonds, or as having been used in payment for the bonds. In either view, Garrison was, at most, guilty of a conversion of them. As to the balance of the notes, which were surrendered to the company without any consideration, there was simply a wrongful conversion of them. They had no value as obligations against the company, and it is preposterous to suppose that Garrison intended by the surrender to charge himself for their full face value against an indebtedness of the plaintiff to him for money actually loaned. By the surrender he did not intend to release the company from its indebtedness evidenced by the notes, but he intended and elected still to hold the indebtedness, evidenced by his charge in open account upon his books. The obligation of the company was not impaired or lessened by the transaction, and it owed just as much after it as before. Even if he made the notes his own by surrendering them, there was simply a conversion of them. It is true that he elected to hold the company as his debtor upon open account, just as it was his debtor before for the same amount evidenced by the notes. He did not take a new debtor, but he retained and intended to retain the same debtor. Here there was no novation, and nothing resembling it. It usually, if not always, takes three parties to make a novation, and they must all concur upon sufficient consideration in making a new contract to take the place of another contract, and in substituting a new debtor in the place of another debtor. "Novation" is thus briefly defined: "A transaction whereby a debtor is discharged from his liability to his original creditor by contracting a new obligation in favor of a new creditor by the order of the original creditor." 1 Pars. Cont. 217. Here there was no element answering to this definition. There was no intention to make a novation, no consideration for a new contract, no concurrence of the three or even of the two parties. So we reach the conclusion as to all the notes that Garrison, by their surrender, made himself liable for a wrongful conversion of them to his own use, and thus became responsible to the plaintiff for the damages caused by the wrong; and the question is, What were such damages? The answer must be, the value of the notes converted. There can be no other measure, as that measures the entire damage of the plaintiff absolutely. As to the notes surrendered for the bonds, the plaintiff could have elected to take the bonds or their value; but this he refuses to do, as the bonds have no value, and thus he is confined absolutely to the value of the notes.

Now, how does the case stand upon authority? In Garlick v. James, 12 Johns. 146, the plaintiff deposited with the defendant a promissory note of a third person as collateral security for a debt, and the defendant, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, compromised with the maker of the note, and surrendered the note to him upon payment of one half of the face thereof. It was found that the maker was at the time of the compromise abundantly able to pay the full amount of the note, and under such circumstances it was properly held that the pledgee was liable for the balance unpaid upon the note. In Hawks v. Hinchcliff, 17 Barb. 492, the plaintiff sued the defendant upon an account for merchandise delivered, and the defendant showed that the plaintiff took two notes for the amount of the account as collateral security for the payment thereof; that he transferred one of the notes to a person, who recovered judgment thereon against the makers, and afterwards assigned the judgment to one Prindle; that he recovered judgment upon the other note, and assigned that to Prindle; and it appeared that the defendants in those judgments had never paid the notes or the judgments. It was held that the plaintiff, the pledgee, could not recover upon his account. It was not shown upon what consideration the notes and the judgments were transferred by the pledgee, or that at the time of the transfer the makers of the notes were not perfectly solvent. The plaintiff there relied upon the simple fact that the notes and judgments were not paid. Upon this state of the facts the court held that the presumption, nothing appearing to the contrary, was that the note and judgment were transferred by the plaintiff for the full amount appearing to be due upon them, and hence he was charged with the full amount. There are some broad expressions contained in the opinion, which, when isolated from the facts of the case, tend to give some countenance to the plaintiff's contention here. In Voss v. Florida R. Co., 50 N. Y. 369, it was held that a wrongful sale by a creditor of collateral securities placed in his hands by the principal debtor does not, per se, discharge even a surety for the debt (much less the principal debtor) in toto, but that by such sale the creditor makes the securities his own to the extent of discharging surety only to an amount equal to their actual value. In Potter v. Merchants Bank, 28 N. Y. 641, 86 Am. Dec. 273; Booth v. Powers, 56 N. Y.

22; and Thayer v. Manley, 37 N. Y. 305,—it was held that in an action to recover damages for the conversion of a promissory note the amount appearing to be unpaid thereon at the time of the conversion, with interest, is prima facie the measure of damages, but that the defendant has the right to show in reduction of damages the insolvency or inability of the maker, or any other fact impugning the value of the note. In Exeter Bank v. Gordon, 8 N. H. 66, where the bank had received a note as collateral security, and had subsequently, without the consent of the pledgor, compromised it by receiving the one half thereof from the maker, it was held that the bank was bound to credit the pledgor with only the amount received upon compromise, upon proof that the compromise was advantageous, and that the maker was insolvent, and unable to pay the balance; and the general rule was laid down which was announced in the cases last above cited. If the pledges of the note of an insolvent maker may surrender it upon a compromise for one dollar without being made liable for more than he receives, upon what conceivable principle can a pledgee be held for the face value of a worthless note by surrendering it without any consideration whatever? If one intrusted with a note as agent, or holding it as pledgee, loses it by his carelessness, or even willfully destroys it, he can, in an action against him by the principal or pledgor, be held liable only for the value of the note. If Garrison had broken into the plaintiff's safe and taken these notes without any right whatever, in an action for their conversion the plaintiff could have recovered against him as damages only the actual, not the face, value of the notes. I need go no further. Other illustrations are not needed. Our attention has been called to no case in law or equity which upholds the plaintiff's contention as to these notes. I should be greatly surprised to find any, and do not believe there are any. I have assumed, without a careful examination of the defendants' objections to the notes, that they were valid, and properly issued by the company for their full amount. I have also assumed, without examining the matter, that upon this record we must hold against the contention of the defendants that the second mortgage bonds took the place of the notes given for them, and were held in their stead as collateral security.

Statements made upon the argument by the counsel for the appellants render it unnecessary for us to consider any other objections to the judgment, and for the reasons stated the judgment should be reversed, and new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

All concur; Gray, J., in result.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Louis KAUFFMAN, Appt.,

v.

Joseph MAIER et al., Repts.

(94 Cal. 299.)

1. The appellate court is not limited upon appeal from an order granting a new trial to an exclusive consideration of the grounds upon which the new trial was allowed although all other grounds relied on were distinctly overruled; but all the grounds embraced in the motion excepting an allegation of insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict, will be examined and the order sustained if justified by any of them irrespective of the ones mentioned by the trial court.

NOTE.—Liability of master for injuries caused by defects in machinery while used for a purpose not contemplated.

In Felch v. Allen, 98 Mass. 572, cited in the principal case, the servant used a defective elevator for a purpose for which it was not designed or intended, and it was held that there could be no recovery.

In Cahill v. Hilton, 9 Cent. Rep. 255, 106 N. Y. 512, the plaintiff was injured while standing on a ladder attempting to repair machinery. One of the grounds on which the right to recover was denied was that there was no proof that the ladder had been designed for the use to which the plaintiff put it.

An employer is not liable for injury to an employee caused by the latter's contributory negligence and his use of an elevator for a purpose unauthorized by the employer, although he failed to

2. A master is not liable to his servant for injuries received by the latter in attempting to remove a towel from a shaft with which his service was in no way connected, where he had hung it for his own convenience to get it out of his way, while engaged in the performance of his duties, where the shaft was not designed for, and the master could not have contemplated, such use, although the construction of the shaft was defective.

3. The motives which prompted a servant to inform the foreman about the condition of machinery as well as his opinions concerning it are immaterial upon the question of the master's liability to another servant for injuries caused by it.

4. The opinion of an expert cannot be

An employee in a flouring mill who is injured while climbing upon a spout which, under his weight, gives way and precipitates his arm into a set of cog-wheels, cannot recover against the mill-owner for the injury, where the spouting did not give way because of any defect in its construction, but only because of its being used by plaintiff for a purpose and in a manner for which it was not designed, especially where the same spouting had previously given way under his weight. Schmidt v. Leistikow, 6 Dak. 386.

The court said that the defendant "was not bound to anticipate that the spouting running through the different stories of his mill, for the purpose of passing grain and mill stuffs from one place to another, would be used by one familiar

5. The court cannot properly charge the jury that the statements of a witness as to verbal admissions of another should be received with caution under a constitutional provision that judges "shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact."

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County, in favor of defendants, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Max Loewenthal, George J. Dennis and J. L. Murphey, for appellant:

There is not as a matter of law contributory negligence where a servant, not having the control or supervision of a shaft which unnecessarily and negligently is permitted by a master to protrude into the apartment where the servant is at work, the shaft being in a dangerous condition, which fact is unknown to the servant and known to the master, for the purpose of more efficiently doing his work, places a towel which he carries, as all servants in his work do, upon the shaft under which he is at work while such shaft is not in motion, and when the shaft is set in motion without the customary notice or order, apprehending possible danger from continuing his work under the shaft now revolving with the towel hung upon it, he thinks it better in the hurry of work carefully to slip the towel from the shaft rather than to cause the stopping of all the machinery, and in the attempt is injured—not because he placed the towel on a stationary shaft, nor because he attempted to take it from a revolving shaft, but because the edge of the shaft itself was in such a jagged and splintered condition that owing thereto the injury was inevitable.

with the purpose for which they were designed and used to bear his weight, or serve in the office of a ladder, floor, or platform.

In Durgan v. Munson, 9 Allen, 386, 85 Am. Dec. 770, the defect in an engine, which was alleged as the cause of the plaintiff's injury, was the insufficiency of the brake to prevent the engine from running off while it was turned on the turn-table. It was held that the trial court should have permitted the defendant to show that, before the accident, instructions had been given to the engineers to have the wheels of their engines "chocked" while turning on the turn-table, and that the accident occurred by failure of some servant of the company to obey instructions. Said Hoar, J.: "The defects of the engine in the abstract were not the gist of the plaintiff's complaint; but its defects at the time and for the service in which the defendant allowed it to be used when it ran on to the

The risks of the business did not cause the loss in this case; it is the danger to which the business is exposed by permitting this unnecessary shaft to remain at the place where plaintiff must work without proper safeguards.

Negligence of the defendants was gross in omitting all appliances for safety in a situation absolutely of great and needless exposure to injury.

The master is bound to inform his servants of facts within his knowledge affecting the safety of the servant in the service to be performed, when the latter is ignorant of the facts.

The master, whether a corporation or an individual, is bound to furnish its employes safe materials and structures. The employe has the right to presume that the master has discharged this obligation.

Beeson v. Green Mountain Min. Co. 57 Cal. 29.

The servant only takes risks of what are called "seen dangers." If the master knows or ought to know of defects in the machinery where he sets his servant to work, it is his duty to inform the servant, and if he fails in this duty, he will be liable for any injury that may result from such failure.

plaintiff. If it were fit and sufficient for use in the manner in which the defendant then allowed it to be used, its insufficiency for other service, at other times, would not concern the plaintiff. Now, it is plain that a machine may be safe and fit for one use when it is not for another. To put an extreme case, by way of illustration: Suppose the defendant had a worn-out engine, unfit for any service, and he had given orders that it should not be run at all, yet some workman had, without his knowledge, undertaken to run it; could the master be held responsible to the fellow servant? Suppose a car that was not fit to run with steam power was kept for use only when drawn by horses; or an engine which had not the proper appliances for a locomotive, was employed solely as a stationary engine; would an unauthorized change of the use make the master liable?" The servant has the right to presume, in the absence of notice to the contrary, and except as to matters that come within the range of his own peculiar skill, that the master will perform the duty imposed upon him of furnishing proper, adequate, and perfect implements and appliances necessary for the performance of any duty required of the servant.

If the circumstances are such that the servant could not, if he exercised his reason, but know of the danger, or if the danger is such as to suggest itself to a man of ordinary intelligence, he must know it, and he must govern himself with the prudence which the circumstances require if he undertakes the service at all.

Cahill v. Hilton, 9 Cent. Rep. 255, 106 N. Y. 512; Cunningham v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 17 Fed. Rep. 882.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action against the defendants to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from their negligence. He was in their employ 18 L. R. A.

at the time of the injury, and the negligence charged upon them was their permitting the shaft of a wheel to protrude into the room where he was at work, by reason of which his sleeve was caught upon the jagged end of the shaft, causing him to be carried around it, whereby his arm was so injured as to require amputation. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the court below, and a new trial was granted upon the motion of the defendants, and from this order the plaintiff has appealed. In their statement upon the motion for a new trial the defendants have assigned various errors of law on the part of the court, as well as many particulars in which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient.

1. In its order granting a new trial the court included the following as a part thereof, viz.: "The new trial is hereby granted upon the following ground specifically, and upon no other ground or grounds, no error being by this court deemed to have occurred at the trial on account whereof a new trial should be granted to defendants, except such ground above referred to, which ground is as follows, to wit: The court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, which motion should have been granted on the sole ground that the placing of the towel on the shaft, as shown by the evidence, constituted such contributory negligence on his part as to preclude him from recovering in this action. On all other grounds embraced in said motion save said ground aforesaid, said motion for a new trial is denied." The proposition of the appellant that this court is limited upon this appeal to a consideration of the grounds specified in the order granting the new trial is untenable. A party has the right to move for a new trial upon any or all of the grounds permitted by the statute; and, if the record on which his motion is based discloses more than one ground for which a new trial should be granted, the court cannot, by stating in its order that the motion is granted upon one ground only, and denied upon the others, deprive the other party of the right to a review by this court of the entire record. The action of the court below is limited to granting or refusing a new trial, and, excepting those cases in which it is justified in limiting the new trial to one or more designated issues, the effect of an order granting a new trial is to place the cause in the position it held before any trial had been had. Upon an appeal from that order this court will review the entire record upon which the order was based, and, if there be found any error in the record which would have justified the court in making the order, the order will be affirmed, upon the same principles that an order sustaining a demurrer to a defective complaint will be sustained, even though the ground upon which the trial court sustained it may be held untenable. A motion for a new trial is a proceeding of the nature of a new action, wherein the statement or bill of exceptions corresponds to the complaint, and the specifications of error to a demurrer thereto, and the action of the trial court in sustaining the motion is to be treated on the same principles. If there be any grounds upon which its action can be upheld, the order will be sustained, irrespective of the particular ground given by that court, whether in an opinion or by a statement in the order itself. A contrary rule might work great injustice. If a new trial is granted, the former decision is set aside, and the party whose motion has prevailed is not "aggrieved," and has no ground for an appeal. By the order granting the new trial the judgment is vacated, and the cause is in the same condition as when the issues were joined. But if, upon an appeal from that order, the action by this court is limited to a review of merely the ground designated by the lower court, and that ground should be held insufficient, the moving party would be deprived of the new trial to which the record might show that he is manifestly entitled. This rule has a limitation in cases where one of the grounds upon which the new trial is sought is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or decision. If in such a case the trial court in its order granting a new trial excludes this as a ground of its action, by direct language, and the record shows that there was a conflict of evidence, this court, upon the same principles that cause it to affirm an order granting or denying a new trial upon that ground, will accept the conclusion of the trial court, and not re-examine the evidence.

2. The plaintiff was employed in the malt-room, and at the time of the injury was engaged in cleaning the elevator,—an endless belt, with buckets attached thereto, for carrying the malt from this room to the upper portion of the building. This elevator passed into a hopper about a foot in depth below the surface of the floor, into which the malt was shoved in order that it might be taken up by the buckets attached to the elevator, and was carried around a wheel, whose shaft, an inch and a half in diameter, and about six feet above the floor of the room, projected into the room about eighteen inches beyond the timbers upon which it rested. The end of the shaft had been battered by hammering, so that it had a crown a little larger than the shaft itself, with its edges jagged and rough. On this day, after the malt that had been spread upon the floor had been all carried to the upper part of the building, the plaintiff commenced to clean the elevator, and, having an endless towel upon his shoulder which impeded him in his work, he threw it over the projecting end of the shaft, and went across the room to get a broom. After he left, the engine started, and on his return he saw the towel going around with the shaft, and as he was to work directly under the shaft, thinking that the towel in its movements might interfere with his work, he attempted to remove it, and in so doing was in some way caught by the shaft, and sustained the injury complained of. At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendants asked for a nonsuit, upon the ground that the evidence showed that the injury was not the result of any negligence on their part, but resulted solely from an act of the plaintiff unconnected with his employment. The plaintiff's right to recover from the defendants for injuries received by him from defective machinery depends upon the negligence of the defendants in respect to the machinery upon which he was employed to work, and cannot be maintained by showing negligence on their part in reference to other machinery with which his employment had no connection, unless such machinery was in some way incidental to the service in which he was engaged. The fact that certain machinery furnished by an employer is defective does not furnish a basis for recovery for an injury, unless that machinery is the proximate cause of the injury. The negligence for which the employer is held responsible is his failure to supply his employé with suitable machinery for the service for which he is employed; but, if that machinery is sufficient, it is no ground of action that other machinery, not furnished for his service, is defective, or that the employé makes use of the machinery which is furnished him in a mode unauthorized by his employment, or for a purpose not contemplated by the employer. "If the servants undertake to use machinery or instruments for purposes for which they were not designed, and for which the employer had no reason to suppose they would be used, it is their own fault or folly if harm comes from it." Felch v. Allen, 98 Mass. 575.

The act of the plaintiff in hanging the towel upon the shaft had no connection with the service for which he was employed, but was an act done by him for his own convenience, and in which he voluntarily selected the means by which he would subserve that convenience. The projecting shaft was not a part of the machinery with which his service was connected, and was never intended for the use to which he applied it. Even if its condition was such that the defendants would have been liable for an injury sustained by one of their employés in case he had accidentally come in contact with it while engaged in the service for which he was employed, that condition does not establish any negligence on their part towards the plaintiff in the present case. The plaintiff was not injured by any accidental contact with it while engaged in his employment, but his injury was the result of an unauthorized act of his own, which he did for his own convenience, and at his own risk. He was looking for a place on which to hang his towel, and, seeing this projection, availed himself of it as being the most convenient. The defendants cannot be held liable for the injury received in taking it off, any more than if he had thrown it across a saw, or hung it upon a sharp hook, and been injured in its removal. Not being under the necessity of making use of the shaft for any purpose connected with his employment, whatever risk attended his selection of it for his own purposes was a risk assumed by himself. As his selection of it as a place on which to hang his towel could not have been contemplated by the defendants, they were under no obligation to make it suitable for that purpose, and cannot be held liable for the injury sustained therefrom. See Pennsylvania Co. v. Lynch, 90 Ill. 333; Pittsburg & O. R. Co. v. Bentmeyer, 92 Pa. 276, 87 Am. Rep.

The proximity of the shaft to the place where he was working was but an incident, and does not affect the liability of the defendants. That proximity doubtless determined his selection of it as the place on which to hang the towel; but as this was a use of the shaft never intended by the defendants, its selection by him for such use cannot render them liable for the injury any more than if it had been at the end of the room opposite to the place in which he was at work. When, therefore, it appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff that the injury received by him resulted from his voluntary act, unconnected with the service for which he was employed, the court should have granted the nonsuit asked by the defendants, and its order granting a new trial for the error committed in refusing this motion must be affirmed.

3. For the purpose of showing that the defendants had knowledge of the character of the shaft, the witness Geiger was allowed to testify that previous to the injury to the plaintiff he had informed the foreman Geisner, of its character. He was then asked "What made you tell August Geisner?" to which objection was made by the defendants. The court reserved its ruling upon the objection, and allowed the witness to answer, who said: "I told Geisner that the shaft was of no value there, and it should be cut off; and it was said then that I had nothing to say about it, and it was left as of yore. As foreman, it was Geisner's business to look out and do what was stated to him, but nothing was done there. He was the head man in the malt-house." After the answer had been given, the court overruled the objection to the question, and allowed the testimony to remain. The reason for permitting this witness to give testimony of what he had told Geisner was merely that the knowledge of the defendants concerning the condition of the shaft might be shown as a fact from which their negligence could be inferred, but the motives which prompted the witness to inform the foreman, as well as the opinions of the witness concerning the shaft were immaterial, and should not have been allowed in evidence.

4. A witness (Ekman) having been shown to be a machinist, and conversant with machinery, was asked the following question: "Question. If that shaft on the end had been pounded or battered, or was in a battered or splintered condition,—that is, having something in the nature of a crown, that made it wider there than it was in further, nearer the wall,—would that make it dangerous or not?" to which he answered: "Answer. If the shaft was battered or split or splintered, in motion it would be dangerous." Also the following question: "Q. If this shaft was smooth, and a towel had been hung upon it, and it in motion, would there be any danger in drawing that towel off?" to which he answered: "A. If the shaft is smooth, and the towel hung on the shaft in motion, it would not be dangerous to take it off. If the shaft were not smooth, it is likely to come in contact with clothing, and, if it comes in contact with clothing, will certainly wind the clothing up." Another witness (Johnson) was asked: "Q. What is your opinion as to whether a shaft protruding about eighteen inches, at the height mentioned by him, into a room where workmen are working, against which they might come in contact, if the surface of the same is jagged, rough, and broken,—whether it is dangerous or not;" to which he answered: "A. It is. Q. Why is it so? A. It is very likely to catch the clothing of the operator." These questions were objected to by the defendants upon the ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not a subject of expert testimony; but their objections were overruled. The court erred in not excluding this testimony. An answer to the questions did not involve the knowledge of any science or art, and was not the subject of testimony by an expert in machinery. The facts sought to be shown by the questions did not involve a knowledge of the construction or working of machinery, or in any respect depend upon such knowledge. Whether it is dangerous for a shaft with a rough surface or end to project into a room where there are workmen who may come into contact with it, is not in any case to be determined by expert testimony, but depends in every instance upon the circumstances of the particular case, and must be determined by the jury from all the facts of that case. Whether a towel can be safely taken from a smooth, revolving shaft is a matter of common observation, and is not to be determined by one who is an expert in machinery, any more than by an expert in any other branch of knowledge. Such questions are to be determined by the jury themselves, either from their own experience in matters of common observation, or from all the evidence in the case, and cannot be asked of witnesses, even if such witnesses are experts in some particular art or science. Sappenfield v. Main Street & A. P. R. Co. 91 Cal. 80. If the court permits the jury to be influenced by the judgment of such witnesses, it deprives the litigants of their right to have the jury render its verdict upon the facts in the case, and to this extent substitutes the judgment of the expert for what should be the judgment of the jury.

5. Evidence was given at the trial tending to show that shortly after the injury the plaintiff had made statements to the effect that it was the result of his own fault, and that the accident had been brought about by a different cause from that shown at the present trial. In its instructions to the jury the court said: "The court instructs the jury that, although parol proof of the verbal admissions of a party to a suit, when it appears that the admissions were understandingly and deliberately made, often afford satisfactory evidence, yet as a general rule the statements of the witnesses as to the verbal admissions of a party should be received by the jury with great caution, as that kind of evidence is subject to much imperfection and mistake. The party himself may have been misinformed, or may not have clearly expressed his meaning; or the witness may have misunderstood him; and it frequently happens that the witness, by unintentionally altering a few expressions really used, gives an effect to the statement completely at variance with what the party did actually say. But it is the province of the jury to weigh such evidence, and give it the consideration to which it is entitled in view of all the other evidence in the case." In thus instructing the jury the court disregarded the provision of the Constitution that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." While it is a matter of common knowledge that the statements of a witness as to the verbal admissions of another are liable to be erroneous, and for that reason should be received with caution, yet such conclusion is only an inference of fact which must be made by the jury, and is not a presumption or a conclusion of law to be declared by the court. The reasons which are to be urged in favor of receiving such statements with caution are based upon human experience, and vary in strength and conclusiveness with the facts and circumstances of each case, and their sufficiency in any particular case is an inference which the reason of the jury makes from those facts and circumstances; but there is no rule of law which directs the jury to invariably make such an inference from the mere fact that the proof of the admission is by oral testimony. That deduction, called a "presumption," which the law expressly directs to be made from particular facts, is uniform, and not dependent upon the varying conditions and circumstances of individual cases. To weigh the evidence and find the facts in any case is the province of the jury, and that province is invaded by the court whenever it instructs them that any particular evidence which has been laid before them is or is not entitled to receive weight or consideration from them. People v. Walden, 51 Cal. 588; People v. Fong Ching, 78 Cal. 178; Mauro v. Platt, 62 Ill. 450; Com. v. Galligan, 118 Mass. 202; McNeil v. Barney, 51 Cal. 603; People v. Dick, 84 Cal. 666.

The instruction above quoted is, in substance, an argument to the jury with "respect to matters of fact" that had been presented at the trial, and a comment by the court, upon the weight which they should give to that testimony. Whether the facts and circumstances proved in the case were sufficient to cause the reason of the jury to make this inference was fair matter of argument for the counsel of the respective parties; but the court forsook its judicial position when it assumed the office of commenting upon the weight and credibility of this evidence. The closing paragraph in the instruction, to the effect that it was for the jury to give to the evidence the consideration to which it was entitled, did not obviate the error, as by its remarks the court had in substance said to them that as matter of law the evidence was not entitled to any great consideration.

The order is affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

David REEVE, Appt.,
v.

LADIES' BUILDING ASSOCIATION, PER-PETUAL.

(.....Ark.....)

1. The contract of a member borrowing money from a building and loan

NOTE.—Usury in loans by building associations.

A usurious transaction is one in which more is taken for the use of money than the statute allows. Thompson, Building Associations, 102.

The form of the contract is immaterial. Endlich, Building Associations, § 869.

The courts of many of the states have followed the English rule as laid down in Silver v. Barnes, 6 Bing. N. C. 180, and uniformly adhered to in that country. That was the case of an unincorporated association, and the court said that "the rules of the society were in effect a mere agreement by partners that their joint contributions should be advanced for the use of one or the other."

This rule was subsequently applied to the case of societies incorporated under § 6 & 7 Wm. IV., chap. 82.

In this country the cases of unincorporated associations have been confined almost entirely to the states of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Penn-association is not within the Usury Laws where the rate of interest to be paid cannot be known until the maturity of the shares and whether it will be greater or less than the legal rate is wholly contingent on the prosperity of the association.

2. A borrowing member of a building and loan association has no right to receive interest on his stock payments or to sylvania and where the association is unincorporated the weight of authority is in favor of holding that the redemption of a share should be regarded, not as a loan, but as an advance out of partnership funds.

In Delano v. Wild, 6 Allen, 1, 83 Am. Dec. 605, it was said that it was proper to make the interest of the subscriber in the accumulating fund a subject of bargain and sale; and that the parties were bound by the contract into which they had entered. It was also held, following Silver v. Barnes, supra, that the transaction was a dealing as between partners in relation to a partnership fund. Followed in Bowker v. Mill River L. F. Assn., 7 Allen, 106.

In the earlier case of Merrill v. McIntire, 18 Gray, 165,—where the association was unincorporated,—the court took the same view and held the contract not usurious.

In Shannon v. Dunn, 42 N. H. 194, the association was unincorporated. It was held that the trans-have such payments applied in reduction of his indebtedness unless such right is expressly reserved.

(June 11, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the A Chancery Court for Pulaski County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to obtain the cancellation of certain mortgages. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John B. Jones, for appellant:

In 1886, in England, parliament exempted loan associations from Usury Laws.

Encyclopedia Britannica, title, Building Societies.

In many states in this country Legislatures have expressly exempted them from operation of Usury Laws.

In Pennsylvania there was an Act passed in 1850 under which associations could incorporate, but under that Act they were not exempt from operation of the Usury Laws. In 1859 it was enacted that all associations incorporated under the Act of 1850 should be exempted from Usury Laws.

In Kupfert v. Guttentberg Bldg. Asso., 80 Pa. 465, under the Act of 1850, the court says: "No institution is more cruel in theory; the contract is usurious."

In Reiser v. William Tell Sav. Fund Asso., 89 Pa. 137, the court says: "These associations have been in the habit of loaning their funds to those who bid the highest premium, at the rate of 6 per cent on the nominal amount of the loan. And this court has several times decided that they can only recover the actual amount loaned with interest thereon.

Bris & N. E. R. Co. v. Casey, 26 Pa. 296; Kupfert v. Guttentberg Bldg. Asso., supra.

In Link v. Germantown Bldg. Asso., 89 Pa. 15, the court says: "One point may be considered thoroughly settled; that prior to the Act of 1859 building associations, corporate or incorporate, could only recover on the mortgage the money loaned, with legal interest."

In Martin v. Nashville Bldg. Asso., 2 Coldw. 418, the court said: "It is the duty of the court to look into the transaction. If it is a shift or device to cover usury, or a contract for an advance of money, and thereby evade the Usury Laws, it cannot stand."

In Bibb County Loan Asso. v. Richards, 21 Ga. 592, the court, after giving the origin of these associations, says: "It is asked why so much complication and mystery about a system designed for the benefit of the masses, especially the poor and the humble. That it is all for the purpose of concealing the repulsive interest which they charge; that nothing can be understood of its workings, except that it produces most gratifying gains to the capitalist, who invests his money in it to accumulate; that the borrower, once in the web, may, like the little fly, struggle in vain to escape the entanglement."

In Montgomery Mut. Bldg. & Loan Asso. v. Robinson, 69 Ala. 419, the court says: "In the absence of this legislative sanction we would not hesitate to pronounce the transaction usurious."

action was not usurious unless the association was a cover for usury. Whether it was so or not was said to be a question for the jury.

To the same effect was Parker v. Fulton Loan & Bldg. Asso., 46 Ga. 163, followed in City Loan & Bldg. Asso. v. Goodrich, 48 Ga. 445; Redwine v. Gate City Loan & Bldg. Asso. 84 Ga. 474; Van Pelt v. Home Bldg. & Loan Asso. 79 Ga. 439.

In Pennsylvania prior to the Act of 1859, which declared that premiums should not be usurious, building associations, corporate or incorporate, could recover on their loans only the sum loaned with legal interest.

In Philanthropic Bldg. Asso. v. McKnight, 85 Pa. 470, recovery was allowed of all that the borrower had paid beyond the sum actually lent and 6 per cent interest thereon.

Jarrett v. Cope, 68 Pa. 67, reaffirmed the earlier cases as to unincorporated associations. Followed in Link v. Germantown Bldg. Asso. 89 Pa. 15.

By the Pennsylvania Act of 1859, it was provided "that no premiums, fines or interest on such premiums that may accrue to such corporation" shall be usurious. Selden v. Reliable Sav. & B. Asso. 81* Pa. 336, was a scire facias on a building association mortgage. It was held to be no defense to say that the borrower had only received a certain sum, for the difference between that and the face of the mortgage is presumptively the premium.

In Walbach v. Lehigh Bldg. Asso., 84 Pa. 211, it was held that the Act of 1859 taking premiums, fines, etc., out of the Usury Laws did not apply to loans to persons not members, or not sui juris, and that a married woman was not liable for more than the sum borrowed with legal interest.

In Tanner's App., 95 Pa. 118, this ruling was held not to be applicable to the case of a husband who was bound jointly with his wife, and who received the benefit of the loan.

The courts of most of the states have treated these associations as ordinary money-lending institutions.

But in White v. Mechanic's Bldg. F. Asso., 23 Gratt. 24, the court thought that the difference between the sums realized on their shares by the advanced and unadvanced stockholders was not a premium but was produced by the payment of interest authorized by the eighth section of the statute and therefore not usurious. It was held that the redemption by the association of a share of stock was a purchase and not a loan.

In Burns v. Metropolitan Bldg. Asso., 3 Mackey, 833, the contract was held not to be for a loan and not usurious. The court refused to disturb the impression gathered from obiter dicta in Pabet v. Economical Bldg. Asso., 1 MacArth. 335, and in Mulloy v. Fifth Ward Bldg. Asso., 3 MacArth. 594.

In Franklin Bldg. Asso. v. Marsh, 29 N. J. L. 225, it was held that though the borrower had to pay more than the legal rate of interest the contract was legal within the Act (Nix. Dig. 75) authorizing the formation of building associations, and providing that no premium given for the priority of a loan should be deemed usurious.

In Clarksville Bldg. & Loan Asso. v. Stephens, 26 N. J. Eq. 354, the defendant contended that the clause in the constitution providing for fines was an infraction of the Usury Laws. It was held not; since the mortgage was given to secure, not the payment of a loan of money, but the performance of his contract with his fellow stockholders.

In Hoboken Bldg. Asso. v. Martin, 13 N. J. Eq. 427, Chancellor Green said: "The money was not advanced by way of loan, but in redemption of the Interest cannot be charged on the premium. Parker v. United States Bldg. & Loan Assn. 19 W. Va. 776; Mutual Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Tascott (Ill.) Oct. 31, 1891; Forrest City U. Land & Bldg. Assn. v. Gallagher, 25 Ohio St. 215; Baltimore P. Bldg. & L. Soc. v. Taylor, 41 Md. 418; Mechanics & W. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Wilcox, 24 Conn. 147.

Premiums or interest charged to exceed the legal rate of interest have not been sustained except where expressly authorized by statute.

With the exception of Massachusetts and New Hampshire where alone the partnership theory seems to have been consistently carried through, the right independently of statutory sanction, of any association, incorporated or unincorporated, to deal with its members on partnership basis, has never been expressly recognized, but frequently denied.

Endlich, Building Associations, § 335.

In sections 331 and 337 Mr. Endlich shows there is nothing in the partnership theory, except where authorized by statute.

See also Pfeister v. Wheeling Bldg. Assn. 19 W. Va. 697; Jackson v. Cassidy, 68 Tex. 232; Columbia Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Bollinger, 12 Rich. Eq. 124, 78 Am. Dec. 463.

An agreement to pay ten per cent per annum on $1,000 when only $900 was loaned, is usurious.

Burlington Mut. Loan Assn. v. Heider, 55 Iowa, 424; Hawkeye Ben. & L. Assn. v. Blackburn, 48 Iowa, 385. See also Mills v. Salisbury Bldg. & Loan Assn. 75 N. C. 292.

A loan to members at legal rates with reasonable dues for maintenance of organization is good, but a loan for illegal interest divests it of its benevolent character and converts into an organization under form of law to fill its treasury by imposing oppressive burdens on its members who have been solicited to become the objects of its benevolence.

Henderson Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Johnson, 8 L. R. A. 289, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 830; Lincoln Bldg. & Sav. Assn. v. Graham, 7 Neb. 173; Lincoln Bldg. & Sav. Assn. v. Benjamin, 7 Neb. 181.

There can be no question where the bid is more than legal interest, it is usury, as both parties intended more than legal interest.

Pfeister v. Wheeling Bldg. Assn. 19 W. Va. 696.

Where a member becomes a borrower the consideration has become so much the nature of a loan that subsequent payments on stock are partial payments on the debt, and each payment pro tanto extinguishes the debt.

Overby v. Fayetteville Bldg. & Loan Assn. 81 N. C. 58.

It is preposterous to suppose that non-borrowers who own stock would be willing on business principles to permit their money or that of the institution to be loaned or advanced to other shareholders, which was never to be repaid, unless they reaped some advantage therefrom greater than loss of the principal.

Burlington Mut. L. Assn. v. Heider, 55 Iowa, 428.

Where upon a loan of money the lender contracts to receive, besides his principal, in lieu of interest, something which may be worth more than legal interest, though it may per-defendant's share, a mode of investment provided for by the constitution of the association."

In Patterson v. Workingmen's Bldg. & Loan Assn., 14 Lea, 677, the corporation was organized under the Act of 1875, the transaction was held not to be a loan, but a sale of the expected dividend, and not usurious.

Contract held usurious.

In some of the states the statutes authorizing the organization of such institutions do not exempt them from the Usury Law. In such cases the transaction is held to be a loan of money under a contract tainted with usury. Lincoln Bldg. & Sav. Assn. v. Graham, 7 Neb. 173; Mills v. Salisbury Bldg. & Loan Assn. 75 N. C. 292.

In Latham v. Washington Bldg. & Loan Assn., 77 N. C. 145, the transaction was held usurious but recovery was refused on the ground that the plaintiff was in pari delicto.

In Mechanics & W. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Wilcox, 24 Conn. 153, it was said that though one portion of the sum to be paid for the use of the money borrowed was called interest and another portion a bonus, yet, in fact, it was nothing else than a contract to pay fifteen per cent for such use; and this contract was held usurious under the Act of 1859 authorizing the establishment of building associations.

The facts in Mechanics & W. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Meriden Agency Co., 24 Conn. 163, were substantially the same as in the preceding case, and the ruling of that case was followed. See Mechanics & W. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Allen, infra.

Under the statute in Iowa the fines or premiums in addition to the interest cannot exceed 10 per cent per annum. In the light of this provision, the contract in Hawkeye Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Blackburn 18 L. R. A.

48 Iowa, 390, was usurious. Followed in Burlington Mut. L. Assn. v. Heider, 55 Iowa, 424.

In the case Columbia Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Bollinger, 12 Rich. Eq. 124, 78 Am. Dec. 463, the by-laws were not adopted as part of the charter. By the charter the corporation was authorized to make such by-laws as were not "repugnant to the laws of the land." It was held that the contract was an attempt to evade the Usury Law, and must fail. Followed in Mechanics & F. Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Dorsey, 15 S. C. 422, where the borrower, for the use of $1,000, agreed to pay annually $60 as interest and $37 as premium, when the legal rate was 7 per cent.

Where the constitution of a building and loan association provides that on the winding up of the association the rate of interest on any advance is not to exceed the legal rate, a contract for the loan of money by it will not be held void for usury, although it appears that more than the legal rate of interest is reserved thereon. Thompson v. Gillison, 23 S. C. 534.

In Martin v. Nashville Bldg. Assn., 2 Coldw. 418, there was no provision in the Act of incorporation exempting the association from the Usury Law. It was held that the redemption of a share was a loan of money and the retention of the premium tainted the transaction with usury. See Patterson v. Workingmen's Bldg. & Loan Assn. 14 Lea. 677.

In Robertson v. American H. Assn., 10 Md. 397, the only proof of the contract was in the mortgage. It was recited to be "a condition precedent to the money being loaned" that the mortgage should be executed. The consideration was stated to be $400; but the mortgage contained no covenant for the payment of the sum. The mortgage was held to be in conformity with the Act of 1832, chap. 103, and free from usury. The court expressly adopted the views of the court in Silver v. Barnes, 6 Bing. N. C. 120; Burbidge v. Cotton, 8 hapse prove to be worthless, the contract is usurious.

Tyler, Usury, 289, 290.

Wherever the lender stipulates for chance or advantage beyond the legal rate of interest, the contract is usurious.

Thomas v. Murray, 34 Barb. 157.

Agreement to pay the lender profits in addition to principal and interest is usurious.

Sweet v. Spence, 35 Barb. 44.

If the parties contract for more than 10 per cent interest it is usury.

German Bank v. De Shon, 41 Ark. 339.

If the transaction is a mere loan, and not a transaction under the statute, it is usurious.

Patterson v. Workingmen's Bldg. & Loan Assn. 14 Lea, 677; Pfeister v. Wheeling Bldg. Assn. 19 W. Va. 698.

It is the contract which constitutes usury, and not the amount he might or might not pay.

Burlington Mut. L. Assn. v. Heider, 55 Iowa, 424.

The contract is usurious on its face, and the court cannot presume, when the association would not contract, that the payments would cease at such time as would relieve the contract of usury.

Even if the contract had made such a guaranty and a shorter time was reached in which the stock would reach par value, by the borrower paying usurious interest, than it would by payment of legal interest, it would still be usury.

Jackson v. Cassidy, 68 Tex. 282; Columbia Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Bolinger, 12 Rich. Eq.

Eng. L. & Eq. 57; Seagrave v. Pope, 15 Eng. L. & Eq. 477.

In Awalt v. Eutaw Bldg. Assn., 34 Md. 435, where the excess of interest had been paid with full knowledge and no compulsion had been used, recovery was refused.

In Baltimore P. Bldg. & Loan Soc. v. Taylor, 41 Md. 418, the society was incorporated under an Act of 1867, which permitted the mortgage to stipulate for the payment of weekly installments on the shares redeemed or sold, "together with interest on the sum so paid or advanced." The mortgagor received $2,700, while the par value of his share was $3,000, on which latter sum the mortgage stipulated that he should pay interest. The contract was held usurious.

In a mortgage made by a member of a building association, combinations of interest with other payments were held intended to evade the statute against usury. And a transaction in which the annual interest on the loan at the legal rate would be $36, and the borrower was required to pay $1 a week on his shares, was held usurious. Waverly Land Assn. v. Burk, 1 Cent. Rep. 493, 64 Md. 338.

The use in the mortgage of the phrase, "This payment is for interest, expenses," etc., was held to be a subterfuge. Peter's Bldg. Assn. No. 5 v. Jaacksch, 31 Md. 201.

In Border State P. Bldg. Assn. v. Hayes, 61 Md. 600, the appellee, owning eight shares, had, to reduce his indebtedness, executed a new mortgage for half the amount of the former one on which he had paid interest at 8 per cent. The Act of 1876 provided that usury should not be a cause of action in any case where the debt had been settled by any consideration "except that of a renewal in whole, or in part." This transaction was held to come within the exception, and the appellee to be 18 L. R. A.

124, 78 Am. Dec. 463; Burlington Mut. L. Assn. v. Heider, supra; Endlich, Building Associations, §§ 831, 835, 837, 855, 856, 878; Pfeister v. Wheeling Bldg. Assn. supra; Lincoln Bldg. & Sav. Assn. v. Graham, 7 Neb. 178; Lincoln Bldg. & Sav. Assn. v. Benjamin, 7 Neb. 181; Oerby v. Fayetteville Bldg. & Loan Assn. 81 N. C. 58. Messrs. Blackwood & Williams, for appellee:

The principal reason of the existence of building associations is to enable persons belonging to a class whose earnings are small, and with whom the slowness of accumulation discourages the effort, to become, by a process of gradual saving, either at the end of a certain period, or by anticipation of it, the owners of homesteads.

Patterson v. Workingmen's Bldg. & Loan Assn. 14 Lea, 677; Endlich, Building Associations, p. 386.

In Patterson v. Workingmen's Bldg. & Loan Assn., supra, the court says if the transaction was a loan or a device to lend money at usury then the statute would not cure it, but being a sale of stock it is not within the Usury Laws and does not need the assistance of the statute.

In Parker v. Fulton L. & Bldg. Assn., 46 Ga. 166, the court says: "We think this contract on its face to be a mere sale by the plaintiff of his right to a share in the ultimate division of the accumulation. That is clearly the form of the contract. The plaintiff was the owner of stock or shares; they paid nothing, and were to pay nothing until the accumulation amounted to a certain sum, when, as is the result of the provision for winding up, that sum was to be entitled to a rebate of all the usurious interest paid on the original mortgage.

To the same effect was Border State P. Bldg. Assn. v. Hilleary, 68 Md. 52.

Effect of voluntary payment.

In Parker v. Fulton Loan & Bldg. Assn., 46 Ga. 166, it was held that upon the settlement of the transaction which embraces an item or feature of usurious interest, when the attention of the party paying such interest is distinctly called to it, and it is then knowingly included in the final adjustment, a recovery cannot be subsequently had for such usurious interest.

Contract not usurious.

But in most of the states these associations are exempted from the operation of the Usury Laws.

St. Louis D. & Sav. Loan Assn. v. Augustin, 2 Mo. App. 123, was the case of an association which was authorized by its charter to make a usurious contract.

In Hammerslough v. Kansas City Bldg. Loan & Sav. Assn., 79 Mo. 80, the member had never paid anything on his stock but had borrowed an amount equal to the face value of his shares, giving his note and agreeing to pay monthly the full legal interest, and $1 per share. He never drew the full amount of the loan, but it was always ready for him. This was held not usurious.

In Melville v. American B. Bldg. Assn., 33 Barb. 103,—the case of an unincorporated society—the borrowing contract was held to be tainted with usury; but it was expressly declared that this case was not affected by the Act of 1851, as all the transactions took place before the passage of that Act.

In Citizens' Mut. L. & A. F. Assn. v. Webster, 25 Barb. 263, the taking of a premium was held not to divided between such of the shareholders as had not sold. Having such shares, the plaintiff sold them to the company, the company advancing him a certain sum of money and he binding himself to do certain other things. It is not a loaning of money at all, nor is it a forbearance for the use of money, but a sale of certain shares of stock in the company to the company.

In McLaughlin v. Citizens Bldg. L. & Sav. Assn., 62 Ind. 264, the court says: "In our opinion, the bonus, premium, or percentage bid for the loan offered by appellee, and which is included in the note in suit, is not, strictly speaking, 'interest on money.'" be usury, the Statutes of Usury having been repealed as to such cases. Section 37, Act 1851.

In Concordia Sav. & A. Assn. v. Read, 93 N. Y. 474, Read had borrowed a sum from the association for which he paid a premium deducted from the whole sum. The taking of a premium, being sanctioned by the Act of 1851, amended by chap. 564, Laws 1875, did not render the loan usurious.

In Holmes v. Smythe, 100 Ill. 422, it was said that Smythe's being compelled to pay the face of the note, as well as interest, etc., was the result of his failure to comply with his contract; and that the obligation might be regarded as in the nature of liquidated damages.

In Freeman v. Ottawa Bldg. H. & Sav. Assn., 114 Ill. 182, this question was said to be no longer open for discussion in Illinois. As following these cases, see Winget v. Quincey Bldg. & H. Assn. 128 Ill. 67.

In Montgomery Mut. Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Robinson, 69 Ala. 413, the transaction was sanctioned by the Act of incorporation and was not usurious. So also in Security L. Assn. v. Lake, 69 Ala. 456.

By W. Va. Code, chap. 54, § 27, it is provided that dues, fines, or premiums taken by the association in addition to the usual interest "shall not be construed to make the loan usurious."

In Massey v. Citizens' Bldg. & Sav. Assn., 22 Kan. 624, under a similar statute the contract was held not to be usurious.

But in Forrest City U. L. & Bldg. Assn. v. Gallagher, 25 Ohio St. 208, the association was incorporated under an Act containing an exemption clause much like that of the West Virginia Act. The redemption was held to be a loan, and the agreement to take interest on the premium usurious. So in State v. Greenville Bldg. & Sav. Assn. 29 Ohio St. 92; Jackson v. Cassidy, 68 Tex. 232.

The decisions cited by appellant from Pennsylvania treated the transactions as mere loans and the monthly payments as partial payments on the principal sum borrowed. But the Supreme Court afterwards changed its rulings, and not on account of the Statute of 1859. But in the case of North American Bldg. Assn. v. Sutton, 35 Pa. 469, 78 Am. Dec. 849, decided in 1857 on a loan made in May, 1852, the court says: "The doctrine of those cases (Kupfert v. Guttenburg Bldg. Assn. 80 Pa. 465, and Hughes' App. Id. 471) was perhaps in advance of the general understanding," and decides that payments on stock are not ipso facto payment on the debt.

See also Spring Garden Assn. v. Tradesmen's L. Assn. 46 Pa. 495.

In Becket v. Uniontown Bldg. & Loan Assn., 88 Pa. 216, Judge Sharswood says: "A building and loan association, organized under the Act of April 12, 1859, is a species of partnership for dealing in money. The borrower has often to pay very large interest, and if he fails so as not eventually to secure the advantages of his contract, it seems very hard, even cruel, to exact so heavy a forfeiture; yet he became a member of the association in view of the large profits expected to accrue from these heavy discounts to the common fund.

"The borrower at usury is himself also a lender at usury, and if he can, by economy and self denial, manage to make his payments, is sure to come out in the end a large gainer. It would be very unjust to those who thus make their payments regularly, if the court, from sympathy for those who have fallen behind-hand, should refuse to enforce the obligations."

for a loan of $1,800 a note for $2,000 with interest at 10 per cent payable monthly is given, is not relieved of the taint of usury by a subsequent agreement by which the usurious interest paid is returned, and only lawful interest is to be paid in future, when the note for $2,000 remains in force, notwithstanding the rights of third parties have become affected upon new considerations. El Paso Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Lane, 51 Tex. 399.

An agreement by a borrower from a loan association of $1,440, for which a security of $2,600, with interest at 6 per cent is given, is not usurious as providing for the payment of more than 12 per cent per annum, where a by-law forming part of the contract provides that to redeem his shares the borrower shall pay, in addition to the sum actually received, one eighth of premium for each year he has had the use of money. International Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Abbott (Tex.) June 10, 1892.

Constitutionality of statutes.

And these statutes are generally held to be constitutional.

By Laws of 1889, chap. 41, § 3, Dak. Terr., building and loan corporations were declared to be benevolent institutions.

And in Vermont L. & T. Co. v. Whitted, 2 N. Dak. 82, Bartholomew, J., in delivering the opinion, said that the "operation of these associations when confined to their own members differs so radically from ordinary loan transactions that legislation placing them in a separate class for the purpose of regulations regarding interest and usury was clearly warranted."

In McLaughlin v. Citizens' Bldg. Loan & Sav. Assn., 62 Ind. 264, a provision in the statutes (1 Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 246) declaring that "no premiums, fines, or interests on such premiums" "shall be

The first case decided in England (and really the foundation of the decisions in the United States) was Silver v. Barnes, 6 Bing. N. C. 180. At this time no Act of Parliament had been passed regulating these building associations. The court says: "The question was whether the transaction was a loan of money, or a dealing with the partnership fund. If it was a loan it was usurious. We think it was a dealing with the partnership fund, in which the defendant had an interest in common with the other members of the society, and that it was not a loan."

The next cases,—Seagrave v. Pope, 15 Eng. L. & Eq. 477; Burbridge v. Cotton, 8 Eng. L. & Eq. 57; Moseley v. Baker, 81 Eng. Ch. 87, and Mosley v. Baker, 8 De G. M. & G. 1032,—were decided under the Statute 7 Wm. IV. chap. 32, but followed the same reasoning and placed their decision on the same grounds as Silver v. Barnes, supra, and were not dependent upon the statute.

The mere fact of many of the decisions in favor of appellee being under special statutes was a mere incident, and it does not follow that the same decisions would not have been under a general law like ours.

Patterson v. Workingmen's Bldg. & Loan Assn., 14 Lea, 677, says: "The Legislature cannot grant to a corporation or class of corporations the right to charge a higher rate of interest than the rate fixed by the general law."

When a member borrows he must keep his contract. He has no right to call for an account or settlement at any instant short of the times mentioned in his contract.

Endlich, Building Associations, § 480; Patterson v. Albany Bldg. & Loan Assn. 63 Ga. 378.

The profits are reserved to those members who continue to the end. For borrowing members who drop out by the way, there is nothing but disaster. The defendant dropped out by the way. There is nothing in the charter of the association, nor in his contract, to entitle him at this stage to a share of the profits.

Watkins v. Workingmen's Bldg. & L. Assn. of Hyde Park, 97 Pa. 523; Delano v. Wild, 6 Allen, 1, 83 Am. Dec. 605; Cason v. Seldner, 77 Va. 238.

Counsel says Reeve was not a stockholder; that he signed the articles merely to get a loan. He could become a stockholder for the avowed purpose of getting a loan.

Freeman v. Ottawa Bldg. H. & Sav. Assn. 114 Ill. 182; Parker v. Fulton L. & Bldg. Assn. 46 Ga. 166; Endlich, Building Associations, §§ 69, 76; Mechanics & W. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Wilcox, 24 Conn. 147.

The contract in this case upon its face is not usurious. It only stipulates for 9 per cent interest per annum which is 1 per cent less than the maximum allowed under our law.

Moody v. Hawkins, 25 Ark. 195; Jordan v. Mitchell, 25 Ark. 260.

Hughes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill filed in Pulaaki chancery court by appellant against appellee to cancel two mortgages given by appellant, one on block 152, city of Little Rock, to secure payment of dues, etc., on $1,200 of stock, and the other on lots 10, 11 and 12, block 65, city of Little Rock, given by appellant, to secure payment of dues, etc., on $7,000 of stock in appellee's association, on the alleged ground that the transactions were usurious loans, and asking judgment over against said association for all sums paid in on said transactions. Are these contracts usurious? We do not deem it necessary to the determination of this question to decide whether these transactions were sales or redemptions of the shares of the appellant, or transactions in partnership funds, as they are held to be in many of the decisions of the courts of last resort. The evidence shows that in each of these transactions there were two sep-deemed usurious," was held constitutional. Followed in Shaffrey v. Workingmen's Sav. Loan & Bldg. Assn. 64 Ind. 600.

Illinois Laws 1872, p. 173, providing that no premium, fines, or interest on premium that may accrue to a building association under the provisions of that Act shall be deemed usurious, is not in violation of Ill. Const., art. 4, § 22, which prohibits the passage of local or special laws regulating the rate of interest on money. Winget v. Quincey Bldg. & H. Assn. 128 Ill. 67.

In Mechanics & W. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Allen, 23 Conn. 97, the Statute of 1856, which provided that loans previously made upon monthly bonuses should not be usurious, was held not unconstitutional.

And so in Welch v. Wadsworth, 30 Conn. 158, 79 Am. Dec. 239.

And in Kentucky it has been held that a statute incorporating a building and loan association, providing that "the dues, premiums, interest, or fines that may accrue to the association in accordance with its charter shall not be deemed usurious," is an attempt to confer special privileges and violates the fundamental law. Henderson Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Johnson, 3 L. R. A. 239, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 830.

In Gordon v. Winchester Bldg. & A. F. Assn., 12 Bush, 110, 23 Am. Rep. 713, it was held that the charter giving the corporation power to charge a greater rate of interest than was allowed by the 18 L. R. A.

general law was unconstitutional; and, whether regarded as an exclusive privilege or partial legislation, was usurious.

In Ribb County L. Assn. v. Richards, 21 Ga. 532, a special Act of the Legislature had incorporated the association according to its Constitution and by-laws. The transaction of this case was held not usurious because the provision of the special charter had been followed.

Strict conformity with the statute is requisite,

It was held in Pfeister v. Wheeling Bldg. Assn., 19 W. Va. 684, that the association was not exempted from the Usury Laws unless it saw to it that the loan was applied by the member for the purposes specified by the Act.

In Bates v. People's Sav. & Loan Assn., 42 Ohio St. 655, the premium was not ascertained by competitive bidding as required by statute, and being in excess of the legal rate, calling it a premium did not make it any the less usurious.

A building association can claim exemption from the Usury Laws only on the ground that it is incorporated under the provisions of the Act of 1859, and its contracts must strictly conform to the requirements of that Act. Stiles's App. 95 Pa. 122.

The defense of usury is personal to the borrower and his heirs or representatives. Stein v. Indianapolis, etc. Assn. 18 Ind. 240.

arate contracts: First. The taking of shares in the association by the appellant, and the contract to pay for the shares monthly, as stipulated. Second. The sale or transfer of the shares to the association, in consideration of the advance to the appellant of the value of his shares, in anticipation of their par value, at the time when all the shares of all the members should be at par, by reason of the accumulations of the association. When this may be is uncertain, as it must depend upon the prosperity of the association. Whenever these shares are at par the borrowing member ceases to make his monthly payments of dues and interest on the advance made to him. What rate of interest he must pay is uncertain, and cannot be known until the final calculation can be made. The amount he may pay the association may be far less, or it may be more, than the sum he receives, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent per annum. There is, then, in the transaction an element of uncertainty and hazard that seems to exclude the idea of a loan of money at a usurious rate of interest. "Where the promise to pay a sum above legal interest depends upon a contingency, and not upon the happening of a certain event, the loan is not usurious." Spain v. Brent, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 604, 17 L. ed. 619; Tyler, Usury, p. 98; Lloyd v. Scott, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 205, 7 L. ed. 883. This principle is applied to contracts of insurance, of bottomry, to post-obits, and annuities. Tyler, Usury, p. 175 et seq.; Delano v. Wild, 6 Allen, 1, 83 Am. Dec. 605; Bowler v. Mill River L. F. Assn. 7 Allen, 100.

In Parker v. Fulton Loan & Bldg. Assn., 46 Ga. 166, the court said: "Even on the idea that he was borrowing the money, and was merely selling his interest in the dividend, it was wholly a matter of contingency whether he paid seven per cent, or more, or less than that, for the money. This fact, this uncertainty or contingency, introduces into the transaction an element wholly foreign to an agreement to pay so much for the use of money." The association does not know what it will get back, or what the borrower will eventually pay, as that depends entirely on how long it will take to reach the point of final winding up. Ibid.; Bidd County L. Assn. v. Richards, 21 Ga. 592; Shannon v. Dunn, 48 N. H. 194; Burns v. Metropolitan Bldg. Assn. 2 Mackey, 7.

There are expenses and losses incident to the business of these associations which must be considered in estimating the value of the shares of the members before maturity. Pattison v. Albany Bldg. & L. Assn. 68 Ga. 878. The testimony in this case shows that if the appellant had kept his contract, the interest he would have paid on the moneys he received from the association would have been in one of the transactions $7\frac{1}{4}$ per cent per annum, and in the other $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. It is contended by the counsel for appellant that the statutory rule for computing interest where partial payments are made is applicable to these transactions, and that the payments of monthly dues should bear interest, or cause interest to cease upon the principal, from the time they are made to the extent that they reduce the principal. But the member nowhere reserves the right to charge the association interest on his stock payments. He has no claim as a member to such interest, and it cannot be assumed that by incurring the additional obligations towards the association involved in the grant of an advancement his previous rights in respect to it have become enlarged. He continues liable on his original undertaking. A borrower's claim to have these items taken into account, and to be given credit therefor at any intermediate stage, "has no foundation in law or equity." "It must be remembered that he is, in the first place, a member, and only in the second place a borrower. In the former capacity he has no right to an account of profits except upon the termination of the scheme." "As for interest upon his several stock payments, his contract with the building association, upon acceding to it, never contemplated such a thing. No such stipulation, expressed or implied, ever entered into the bargain. All he was entitled to, all he reserved to himself the right to claim, was a share of the profits of the building association's dealings with the whole fund of subscriptions." Endlich, Building Associations, 456. Where the contract, however, is for a mere loan of money upon which a rate of interest greater than that allowed by law is exacted, no device, shift or cloak, whatever its form, or how specious soever it may be, can protect it from the taint of usury.

The decree of the Pulaski Chancery Court is affirmed.

The effect of an assignment of an insurance policy with consent of the insurer to create a new contract which shall be unaffected by acts of the assignor as declared by the main case is a question of very great importance and one on which there has been much confusion and disagreement among courts and text-writers. (October 4, 1892.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Keena & Lightner, for appellant:

The sale of the property and the assignment of the policy in suit by Mr. Hough to plaintiff and the consent of the defendant company indorsed on the policy constituted a new contract of insurance between plaintiff and defendant, and plaintiff is not bound by any act of his assignor.

Wilson v. Hill, 3 Met. 69; 1 May, Ins. 8d ed. § 878A.

The unearned and retained premium is a good consideration for the new contract.

Flanagan v. Camden Mut. Ins. Co. 25 N. J. L. 506; Cummings v. Cheshire County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 457; Shearman v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 46 N. Y. 526; Steen v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 89 N. Y. 326, 42 Am. Rep. 297; Pratt

v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. 64 Barb. 589, 14 Am. Rep. 804; Ellis v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. 64 Iowa, 507; Continental Ins. Co. v. Munns, 5 L. R. A. 480, 120 Ind. 80; Ellis v. Insurance Co. of North America, 32 Fed. Rep. 646.

Plaintiff had a sufficient title to the property insured to satisfy the requirements of the policy.

With no inquiries made by the company and no statements given by plaintiff, the provisions in the policy in regard to the title of the insured are at most representations, a substantial compliance with which is sufficient. If the company deemed an accurate knowledge of insured's title to be material it should have inquired in regard to the title.

Dak.)* Jan. 5, 1891.

The meaning of "title or possession" in the clause relating to the title or possession becoming involved in litigation, is some interest in the property asserted in opposition to the title of, or derived from the insured. A possession of the premises under plaintiff is an "occupancy" and not legally a "possession."

assignment to an owner of the property and an assignment merely as security for a debt.

Prior acts.

The doctrine of the above case that prior acts of forfeiture by an assignor do not affect the rights of a purchaser of the property to whom the policy is assigned with consent of the insurer is accepted in most of the more recent cases, even where the insurer is ignorant at the time of such acts of forfeiture. Ellis v. Insurance Co. of North America, 32 Fed. Rep. 646; City F. Ins. Co. v. Mark, 45 Ill. 482; Continental Ins. Co. v. Munns, 5 L. R. A. 480, 120 Ind. 80.

The rule is still plainer and has been followed in other cases where the consent has been given by the insurer with knowledge of the prior acts of forfeiture. Shearman v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 46 N. Y. 526; Pratt v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. 64 Barb. 589, 14 Am. Rep. 804; Steen v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 89 N. Y. 319, 42 Am. Rep. 297.

In Kreutz v. Niagara Dist. Mut. F. Ins. Co., 16 U. C. P. 181, the court says it does not mean to say whether notice to either party of the prior acts of forfeiture is material or not. In that case it appears that the insurer knew, but the assignee did not, of a prior cause of forfeiture by change of occupation of the premises, and it was held that this was waived by consent to an assignment of the policy. The court says this doctrine might not apply to some defenses such as those in respect to an original infirmity of title.

The doctrine is likewise applied to the case of a mortgagee who becomes a purchaser of property on foreclosure where the insurer consents that the policy originally payable to him as mortgagee shall continue in his favor. Pratt v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. 64 Barb. 589, 14 Am. Rep. 804.

And the same rule is adopted in respect to a purchaser.

chaser at sheriff's sale to whom an insurer with knowledge of a cause of forfeiture consents that the policy shall be assigned. Steen v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 89 N. Y. 315, 42 Am. Rep. 297.

The retention of the unearned premium is a good consideration for a new contract with the assignee of a policy. Shearman v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 46 N. Y. 526; Pratt v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. supra.

But in conflict with most of the above cases it is held in Ellis v. State Ins. Co., 68 Iowa, 573, 56 Am. Rep. 865, that the consent of an insurer to the assignment of a policy which provides that it shall be void if the title is "transferred, incumbered or changed" does not waive a cause of forfeiture which is not known to the insurer arising out of an undisclosed incumbrance.

An exception from, rather than a contradiction of, the doctrine of the main case is made in Insurance Co. of North America v. Garland, 106 Ill. 220, in which it is held that consent to an assignment of a policy on a house which is then vacant made subject "to all the terms and conditions" of the policy, one of which makes it a cause of forfeiture if the building shall "become vacant and unoccupied and so remain," will not waive that provision altogether and the assignee cannot hold the company liable if he allows the building to continue vacant. In this case one judge dissented on the ground that as a new contract was made with the assignee at a time when the premises were vacant the condition was waived altogether.

Another exception is made in the case of McCluskey v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., 126 Mass. 306, in which a policy which was void when issued for lack of insurable interest was held not to become valid in the hands of an assignee to whom the property had been conveyed where the assignment was made by mere consent of the insurer without any new consideration or any new undertaking.

The policy was valid when issued to Hough. Dupreau v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 76 Mich. 615, and cases cited.

And the contract to sell to Stevens and his possession taken thereunder did not avoid the policy.

1 May, Ins. 8d ed. § 267.

Possession taken by one holding under a land contract is not an avoidance of the contract.

Smith v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 13 L. R. A. 475, 91 Cal. 823.

The property being vacant at the time the policy was issued, the provisions contained therein as to vacancy and consequently as to change of possession do not apply.

Messrs. Hanchett, Stark & Hanchett, for appellee:

The sale by Hough to Stevens and placing him in possession under the contract, not having been consented to by the company renders the policy void. It was a change in the title interest and possession of the property by sale.

The policy having become void cannot be revived by any action of waiver or estoppel, unless done with a full knowledge of the facts.

An assignment and consent is not regarded as yielding any rights of the company. The same defense can be made as if the action were brought by the assignor.

Lycorning Mut. Ins. Co.* 51 Pa. 410; Elliott v. Ashland Mut. Ins. Co. supra; in-Substantially the same decision where there was no insurable interest originally is made in respect to a mutual policy in which the assignment is made subject to all liabilities, etc. Eastman v. Carrol County Ins. Co. 45 Me. 307.

But the fact that the insured had merely a partnership interest in goods insured [and not the entire title] does not defeat the right of an assignee to whom the policy has been assigned with the insurer's consent. City F. Ins. Co. v. Mark, 45 Ill. 482.

It does not appear in this case whether the insurer knew of the ground of forfeiture at the time of the assignment or not.

Where the assignee knows of the prior cause of forfeiture and the insurer does not, another important element is introduced. Actual knowledge of the prior forfeiture on the part of an agent of the assignee by whom the assignment is made is the knowledge of the assignee and if such cause of forfeiture is not known to the insurer it is not waived by consent to the assignment. Philadelphia Fire Assn. v. Flournoy (Tex.) May 17, 1892; Northern Assur. Co. v. Flournoy, May 17, 1892.

An insurer's consent to the assignment of a policy to the grantee of the property insured which was in fact but not so known to the company fraudulent as to the creditors of the insured, does not prevent it from avoiding the policy under a clause therein against fraud although the fraudulent grantee was the insurer's agent. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Willis, 70 Tex. 12.

An assignee of a policy only and not of the property by an assignment made before loss where the policy does not restrict a transfer is subject to all defenses against the insured. Bergson v. Builders Ins. Co. 38 Cal. 545.

A mortgagee to whom a policy is assigned as collateral, but who does not give any new deposit 18 L. R. A.

note or other security as required by the by-laws of a mutual company which issued the policy, takes it subject to a prior cause of forfeiture by misrepresentation in the original application for the insurance. Bowditch Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Winslow, 8 Gray, 43.

A mere assent by a mutual company to an indorsement by the insured directing payment "in case of loss" to another person "for value received" is not sufficient to show a new contract with the latter where a new deposit note is not given as required by the company's by-laws in case of assignment. Fogg v. Middlesex Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Cush. 387.

Subsequent acts.

Subsequent acts of forfeiture by the assignor do not affect the rights of a purchaser of insured property to whom the policy is assigned with the consent of the insurer. Ellis v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. 64 Iowa, 507.

An assignor of an insurance policy cannot afterwards bind the assignee by an agreement as to the amount of the loss. American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Sweetser, 118 Ind. 370.

The rights of an assignee of a policy as security cannot be defeated by an adjustment made between the mortgagee and the insurer. Hall v. Fire Assn. of Philadelphia, 64 N. H. 406.

An arbitration between a mortgagee and an insurer without notice to the mortgagee to whom the loss is made payable does not affect the latter's rights. Bergman v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 15 L. R. A. 270, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 720.

The same is true of an accord and satisfaction between the insurer and the mortgagee. Hathaway v. Orient Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 17 L. R. A. 514.

Some of the early cases which decided that an assignment made with the insurer's consent cre-

Insurance Co. of North America v. Garland, 108 Ill. 220.

In the case at bar we have the feature that it was not an assignment of a policy to the purchaser in a case of sale of the property, but the assignment of a policy to the assignee of a vendor's interest, a vendor who did not have the legal title and had contracted his equitable title to another. It is what might be termed the sale of an equitable mortgage merely with an assignment of a policy not issued on that interest but an interest as owner.

Even if the assignment of the policy and consent thereto in this case was a new contract of insurance, the condition of the title was such that plaintiff's interest was not sufficient to sustain the conditions of the policy.

Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt & L. Mfg. Co. 81 Mich. 346.

McGrath, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon a policy of insurance dated October 13, 1888, and running for three years, issued to J. C. Hough "on his two-story frame dwelling, . . . against all such immediate loss or damage sustained by the assured as may occur by fire to the property above specified, but not exceeding the interest of the assured in the property." By the terms of the policy, the assured by its acceptance "warrants that any application, survey, plan, statement, or description, connected with procuring this insurance, or contained in or referred to in this policy, is true, and shall be a part of this policy; that the assured has not overvalued the property herein described, nor omitted to state to this company any information material to the risk." The policy also provided that "this policy shall become void, unless consent in writing is indorsed by the company hereon, in each of the following instances, viz.: If the insured is not the sole and unconditional owner of the property; or if any building intended to be insured stand on ground not owned in fee simple by the assured; or if the interest of the assured in the property, whether as owner, trustee, consignee, factor, agent, mortgagee, lessee, or otherwise, is not truly stated in this policy; or if any change take place in the title, interest, location, or possession of the property (except in case of succession by reason of the death of the assured), whether by sale, transfer, or conveyance in the whole or in part, or by ated a new contract that could not be defeated by subsequent acts of forfeiture by the assignor applied the doctrine to assignments merely as security for debts where the assignee did not own the property insured. Tillou v. Kingston Mut. Ins. Co. 7 Barb. 570, affirmed 5 N. Y. 406; Allen v. Hudson River Mut. Ins. Co. 19 Barb. 442; Traders Ins. Co. v. Robert, 9 Wend. 404; Pollard v. Somerset Mut. F. Ins. Co. 42 Me. 221; Foster v. Equitable Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 Gray, 218; Charleston Ins. & T. Co. v. Neve, 2 McMull. L. 239.

The same doctrine is applied in New England F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wetmore, 32 Ill. 221, where the insurance was originally taken by a mortgagee and assigned with the mortgage.

But the case of Foster v. Equitable Mut. F. Ins. Co., supra, is distinguishable from the others in that the mortgagee to whom the assignment was made gave his own written promise to pay future assessments on the policy which was in a mutual company.

Later cases have repudiated the doctrine and have established the rule that a mortgagee or other creditor to whom a policy is assigned merely as security for a debt takes the policy subject to subsequent acts of forfeiture by his assignor if no new agreement is expressly made with the assignee or any new consideration received from him. Buffalo Steam Engine Works v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 401 (overruling the New York Cases above cited to the contrary); Grosvener v. Atlantic F. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 391 (although in this case there was no assignment but merely a clause held equivalent thereto by which the policy was made payable to the mortgagee); Swenson v. Sun Fire Office, 68 Tex. 461; Illinois Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fir, 53 Ill. 151, 5 Am. Rep. 88; State Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Robert, 81 Pa. 438; Home Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Houslein, 60 Ill. 521 (this also was a case of loss payable to a mortgagee); Hoxsie v. Providence Mut. F. Ins. Co. 6 R. I. 517; Burton v. Gore Dist. Ins. Co. 12 Grant, Ch. 156; Edes v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. 3 Allen, 362; Lawrence v. Holyoke Ins. Co. 11 Allen, 387; (in these Massachusetts cases the policies were in mutual companies and there was no new deposit note or other security given by the assignee as required by the by-laws in case of assignments.)

But after an assignment with the insurer's consent to a mortgagee who signs premium notes with the assignor, the assignor's acts cannot defeat the rights of the assignee. Boynton v. Clinton & E. Mut. Ins. Co. 16 Barb. 254; Foster v. Equitable Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra.

In Reed v. Windsor County Mut. Ins. Co., 54 Vt. 413, it is held that concealment or misrepresentation as to incumbrances in an application will defeat the right of an assignee although the insurer has consented to the assignment; that it is a case of mere substitution and any defense against the assignor is good against the assignee. It seems that this assignment was made as security for a mortgage although this is not definitely stated in the report.

In Pupke v. Resolute F. Ins. Co., 17 Wis. 373, 54 Am. Dec. 754, it is held that subsequent acts of an assignor such as fraud in respect to proofs of loss defeat the rights of the assignee equally with those of the assignor; but it does not appear in this case whether the assignment which was made, as is usual in such cases, subject to all terms and conditions of the policy, was made to the owner of the goods insured or merely as security.

An assignment of his interest in a policy by a mortgagee to whom the loss was made payable, made with the insurer's consent, is not an assignment of the policy, and the assignee's rights are defeated by the mortgagor's subsequent acts of forfeiture. Hale v. Mechanics Mut. F. Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 169, 66 Am. Dec. 410.

Assignment after loss.

An assignment of an insurance policy after a loss is merely an assignment of a chose in action and the assignee's rights are purely derivative which can therefore be no greater than those of his assignor. East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Coffee, 61 Tex. 287; Archer v. Merchants & M. Ins. Co. 43 Mo. 434; Bonenfant v. American F. Ins. Co. 76 Mich. 653; Wilson v. Hakes, 36 Ill. App. 539.

But an adjustment of a policy between the insurer and the insured who has assigned it after the loss occurred will not defeat the rights of the assignee if he is not given opportunity to participate on his request therefor. London Fire Asso. v. Blum, 63 Tex. 238.

legal process or judicial decree; or the title or possession be now or hereafter become involved in litigation; or if this policy be assigned or transferred before a loss." No written application for the policy was requested or made. The insurance was solicited by the company's agent, "who saw the building permit in the paper, and came to the office, [Hough's] and wanted to write a policy on the house." No statement as to the condition of the title or as to the nature of Hough's ownership was asked for or given. Hough, in November, 1887, had bought 10 acres of land for $18,000, a large portion of which had been paid, and had subdivided the land; the house in question being, at the time the insurance was effected, in process of construction on one of the lots known as "Lot 7." He held the whole under a contract of purchase, October 13, 1888, the policy was issued May 14, 1889. Hough contracted, in writing, to sell to one Stevens this lot 7 for $3,500, which was to be paid as follows: $25 on July 1, 1889, and the further sum of $25 in monthly payments thereafter, until the entire sum, with interest, should be paid. Stevens contracted to pay all taxes and assessments upon the property, and to pay the expenses of keeping the buildings insured against loss or damage by fire. Hough agreed, on performance of all of the covenants upon Stevens' part, to execute a good and sufficient deed to Stevens. It was further agreed that "the said party of the second part shall have possession of said premises on and after the date hereof, while he shall not be in default on his part in carrying out the terms hereof; and if said party of the second part shall fail to perform his agreements on this contract, or any part of the same, the said party of the first part shall, immediately after such failure, have a right to declare the same void, and may retain whatever may have been paid hereon, and all improvements that may have been made on said premises, to the extent of his just interest therein, and treat the party of the second part as his tenant holding over without permission." Stevens went into possession at once, and occupied the premises at the date of the fire, although he only made three monthly payments. On July 1, 1890, he was given notice to quit the premises, and that the contract had been declared void. In March, 1889, Hough assigned all his interest in the original contract held by him to plaintiff. At the time of that assignment, Hough assigned the policy to Hall and Hough and Hall went together to the office of defendant's agent. Hall told the agent that Hough had "assigned his interest in the property" to him (Hall), and that he "wanted the policy to read payable to him in case it should burn," and thereupon the consent of the company was indorsed upon the policy. Upon these facts the court directed a verdict for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The record presents two questions: (a) Was this contract valid at its inception? (b) Conceding that the policy was vitiated by the Stevens contract as to Hough, what was the effect of the company's consent to the assignment to plaintiff? It must be conceded that Hough, at the inception of the policy, had an insurable interest in the property. It is well settled in this state, at least, that an applicant for insurance is not required to show the exact condition of his title, unless requested so to do, (Castner v. Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Co. 46 Mich. 15; Guest v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 66 Mich. 98;) that the failure to mention incumbrances, if not inquired about, the application being oral, and no deceit being practiced, is immaterial, (O'Brien v. Ohio Ins. Co. 52 Mich. 131; Tiefenthal v. Citizens Mut. F. Ins. Co. 53 Mich. 306;) and that an equitable ownership will support a recital of ownership. Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fogelman, 35 Mich. 481; Guest v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. supra. See 1 May, Ins. 285-287, and 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law. 1020.

In the present case, neither Hough nor Hall were asked to state the nature of their interest in the property or the condition of the title; neither made any misrepresentation or was guilty of any fraud or concealment; and Hough at the inception of the policy, and plaintiff, at the time of the consent of the company to the assignment to him, had such an interest in the property insured as would support the recitation in the policy that it covered "his two-story frame dwelling." Hough's contract with Stevens was not executed until after the policy had been issued, and when Hall took Stevens was in default, but, in any event, Hall had at that time an equitable interest. The provisions of the policy in the present case, respecting the sole and unconditional ownership of the property, the truthfulness of the statement as to the interest of the assured in the property, and as to any change in the title, interest, location, or possession of the property by sale or transfer, are precisely the same as were passed upon in Hosae v. Prescott Ins. Co., 84 Mich. 309, and the court there held that all the provisions of the contract must be taken together; that if the insurer desired to know the interest it was insuring, it should have defined that interest in the policy; that it was the intention of the parties to make a binding contract of insurance when accepted by the insured; that the claim as to sole and unconditional ownership could only be held to relate to changes arising after the execution and acceptance of the policy, and did not apply to an existing state or condition of the property at the time that the policy was issued. That case, therefore, disposes of the first question.

The other question is the more serious one, and one upon which the authorities are by no means uniform. In Continental Ins. Co. v. Munns, 120 Ind. 80, 5 L. R. A. 430, the insured had mortgaged the property, and afterwards sold it to Munns, and assigned the policy, to which assignment the company, without knowledge or notice of the mortgage, consented. The court held that a contract of insurance is a purely personal engagement, and does not run with the property insured, citing Nordyke & Marmon Co. v. Gery, 112 Ind. 535, and Cummings v. Cheshire County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 457. "That the policy expires with the transfer of the estate, so far as it relates to the original holder, but the assignment and assent of the company constitute an independent contract with the assignee, the same, in effect, as if the policy had been reissued to him upon terms and conditions therein expressed. . . . The contract of insurance, thus consummated, arises directly between the purchaser and the insurance company, to all intents and purposes the same as if a new policy had been issued embracing the terms of the old. In such a case, no defense predicated on supposed violations of the conditions of the policy by the assignor will be available against the assignee. Until the latter himself does some act or permits a condition of things to exist in violation of the terms of the policy, he is not in default." That, being a new and independent contract, both parties are subject to the same rules which govern the making of the original contract. A large number of authorities are cited in support of the conclusions reached. In Steen v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 89 N. Y. 315, 42 Am. Rep. 297, the court held that the consent to the assignment created a new contract between the company and the assignee, unaffected by the forfeiture, if, in any event, it could have been insisted upon. In Shearman v. Niagara F. Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. 526, 7 Am. Rep. 880, the property was conveyed to plaintiff March 14th. The policy was renewed in the name of the grantor, March 21, and was assigned to plaintiff April 15, and on the same day the company consented to the assignment. The company insisted that at the time of its consent it had no knowledge of any fact except that at that time it was notified that the property had been conveyed to plaintiff, but the time of the transfer had not been given, nor the fact that the policy was issued after the transfer. The court held that "the renewal revived the original policy, and continued it with all the virtue which it would have had for any purpose, if it had not expired; that the consent to the assignment was equivalent to an agreement to be liable to the assignee upon the policy as a subsisting operative contract, for which agreement the retention of the premium received on renewal was a good consideration." In Hooper v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 424, the insurance was upon a stock of goods which had been sold on execution, and the purchaser obtained the consent of the company to an assignment to him, and the court held that the policy became a new contract of insurance between the underwriters and the assignee. "An assignment, therefore, being of no avail, except in case of an interest in the assignee in the subject insured, the request made to the defendant to consent to an assignment to plaintiff was of itself notice to them that he had acquired or was about to acquire an interest in the insured property. If, therefore, it was important to the defendants to know what the nature of the interest was which the plaintiff had acquired, they should have asked for information in respect to it. If they were content to give their consent without such inquiry, it was their own fault." In Ellis v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co., 64 Iowa, 507, it was held that, although "assured may have made statements in his application which by the terms of the policy would defeat a recovery thereon by him, yet, where the insured property is sold and the policy assigned to another, and the company assents to such assignment, a new contract arises, which is not affected by the fraud of the party originally insured." In Ellis v. State Ins. Co., 68 Iowa, 578, 56 Am. Rep. 865, a majority of the court held that the provision in the policy that, if the title of the property is incumbered, the policy should be void, was imported into the new contract, and that the existence of the mortgage invalidated that contract. The court divided upon the construction of this provision, a minority of the court holding that it was not against prior or existing incumbrances, but against those which should fall on the property subsequent to the execution and delivery of the new contract. Upon this question the dissenting opinion is in accord with the case of Hoose v. Thescott Ins. Co. supra. In Ellis v. Insurance Co. of North America, 32 Fed. Rep. 646, there is a very able discussion of the question by Brewer, J., who says: "That where an assignment goes with an absolute sale of the property there is the creation of a new contract. If it is a new contract for one purpose, it is a new contract for all purposes. The assignment is expressed to be subject to the terms and conditions of the policy. It is equivalent to saying that the assignee takes the contract as of present writing, containing the same terms and stipulations, binding him to the same duties, and subjecting him to the same liabilities that were imposed by the contract in the first instance upon the assignor. In no other way can it fairly be said that a new contract was made. Tested by that rule, the assignee, as the assignor, had agreed, in the first instance, that he would place no incumbrance upon the property, and that, if he did, the policy should fail. There is no pretense that he has violated that stipulation thus construed. It may well be doubted whether the use of the technical terms 'assignment,' 'assignor,' and 'assignee' are apt to describe the actual transaction. When the insured sells the property, that moment the policy falls. He has no insurable interest. The policy ceases to have legal force as a policy. Can it be said he is assigning that which is nothing, and that the insurance company contemplates and assents to the transfer of that which has no legal existence? This is a practical question, and we must look at these matters in a practical light. When the purchaser buys the property, naturally the thought in his mind is insurance. It being his, and the old policy being dead, he looks for insurance. He finds a policy which had been in force, dead because of his purchase and cessation of the insurable interest in the assignor, yet which the insurance company is willing to have transferred to him. Would it not be an injustice to him if, after the insurance company had consented to that transfer, it could turn back to acts done by the person from whom he obtained the policy, and claim that those acts vitiated the whole thing, and rendered it not liable to the assignee? But it is said there is really no consideration for this contract on the part of the company; the assignment of this policy is an assertion, practically, by the assignor of a right to an unearned premium, and the claim of such unearned premium, presented to the assignee, is assented to by the company when it consents to the assignment. It matters not that there may have been no actual right to such unearned premium, for the recognition and compromise of a claim is consideration. Further than that there would be the injury to the assignee as well as the benefit to the insurer to be considered. Again, it is said that there can be no waiver without knowledge; that the insurance company was ignorant of the fact of this incumbrance; and therefore it should not be held to have waived its rights. There may be estoppel without knowledge. This consent to the assignment, dealing with things in a practical way, must be construed as a statement by the insurance company that it recognized that policy as a valid instrument. Surely it would be unjust to think that the insurance company put itself into the position of assenting to the transfer of a policy, which had no validity, going through the form of consenting to that which had no legal existence, and was worthless. These considerations, although we concede that the question is one of not perfect transparency, leads us to the conclusion that this assignment must be taken, in the language of the text-books and the authorities, to create a new contract between the assignee and the insurance company,—a new contract embracing, as of present writing, the same terms and stipulations as were embraced in the contract originally written between the assignor and insured." 2 May, Ins. 878; Wood, Ins. 110, 366; Fland. Ins. 494; Cummings v. Cheshire County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 457; Wilson v. Hill, 3 Met. 66; Pratt v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. 64 Barb. 589, 14 Am. Rep. 804.

An insurance policy is a personal contract of indemnity. It is nonassignable, except with the assent of the insurer; nevertheless the assignment of policies of insurance is an incident of nearly every transfer of personal property or improved real estate. Unexpired policies, before loss, have, as a rule, in the hands of the person to whom issued or his assignee, a certain face value, which is the unearned premium or indemnity to the assignee for the unexpired term. They are either transferred as a part of the consideration for the purchase money, or the value of the unearned premium is agreed to be paid in consideration of the assignment. The assignee acquires the right to the unearned premium, or the right to the indemnity for the unexpired term for value. The right to the unearned premium may be subject to the conditions of the contract, for he takes that right subject to the consent of the company. But suppose that the unearned premium is paid over to the assignee of the policy, or credited upon the premium for a new policy, could it be contended that the company would have the right to recover back the sum so paid or credited from the assignee? The company, in such case, recognizes the validity of the policy, and the assignee is simply reimbursed for what he has paid to the assignor. The ordinary railroad mileage ticket is not transferable, and attached is a condition that its use by any other person will operate as a forfeiture. Suppose that A. holds such a ticket, which he desires to transfer to B., and they go together to the office of the railroad company, and A. transfers the ticket to B., and the company indorses its consent, B. paying the value represented by the unused strip for the transfer. Could the railroad company be afterwards heard to say, as against B., that A. had, before the transfer, forfeited the contract, even though it had no knowledge of the breach, and therefore the contract was void as to B.? Certainly not. By consent, a new contract between the company and B. is created. The company has agreed with B. that the unused coupons are good in his hands. The company cannot be said to have waived that which they had no knowledge of, but they have waived the right as against B. to insist upon A's infirmities, whatever they may have been. The contract which, prior to the transfer, was personal with A., has ceased, and has become personal with B. B. does not agree that A. has not violated its provision, but only that he will not. Insurance contracts are peculiar, and hence rules applicable to other contracts are applicable to them only so far as the provisions are analogous.

When a party to a non-assignable instrument, representing upon its face an unearned value, consents to its transfer without reservation, and the assignee in good faith pays value for such transfer, the party consenting cannot be heard to set up mental reservations or prior breaches which were unknown to either party. The rule applicable to the transfer of an assignable contract has no application to such contracts. The consent to the assignment imported validity. The right to withhold or grant it is for the benefit of the insurer. It has its burdens as well as its advantages. The application for consent is, in effect, one for a contract of indemnity to the assignee. It affords an opportunity to the company to examine the risk, or to inquire as to the title or interest to be insured, or as to whether there had been any other change in risk or title. Had it done so, and refused its consent, plaintiff would have been in a position to retain or recover the consideration paid, and to seek indemnity elsewhere. It is too late now, after the loss, to set up the changed conditions. It may be said, too, that at the time of the application for the consent of the company to the assignment, plaintiff informed the company that Hough had assigned his interest in the property to him. That was sufficient, of itself, to put the company upon inquiry.

Defendant insists, further, that, inasmuch as plaintiff had commenced proceedings against Stevens before a circuit court commissioner, to recover possession of the premises, the policy was invalidated thereby. The policy contained a provision that, "if the title or possession be now or hereafter involved in litigation," the policy should become void. Stevens was clearly in default, having occupied the premises for twelve months, and paid but $75, whereas he had agreed to pay $25 per month. Plaintiff had declared the contract under which Stevens occupied void, as he had the right to do under the contract. From that moment Stevens became and was a tenant holding over without permission. The proceeding to recover possession was predicated upon these provisions of the contract. It cannot be contended that the provision of the policy referred to contemplated that, in the event that proceedings were instituted to oust a tenant, the policy should become void. This provision, taken in connection with the other provisions of the policy, clearly relates to a litigation over the title or possession of the insured.

The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial had, with costs of this court to the plaintiff.

The other Justices concurred.

Rehearing denied.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SUPREME COURT.

Henry KRAAK

v.

Eva FRIES.

(.....D. C.....)

1. A note given as a forfeit in case of the non-performance of a parol contract for the sale of land void under the Statute of Frauds is itself void.
2. A purchaser of land who does not offer to perform the contract on his part until several days after the time set for performance cannot enforce a forfeiture for non-performance on the part of the vendor.

(October 24, 1882.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Special Term in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Calderon Carlisle for appellant.

Mr. B. F. Leighton for appellee.

Hagner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit at law by the plaintiff against the defendant, upon her note dated March 12, 1887, for $100, payable on demand to the order of Henry Kraak, at the National Bank of Washington, with interest until paid.

The declaration is in the usual form.

The defendant pleaded general issue, and also a plea in set-off, which alleged the plaintiff was indebted to her in a like sum of $100, which, in the particulars of defense, is described as a check made by the defendant to the order of the plaintiff contemporaneously with the note, for that amount.

At the trial the plaintiff proved the note and rested. Thereupon the defendant testified that on the 12th day of March, 1887, the day the note was given, the plaintiff came to her and asked her to sell him her house and lot, and offered her therefor the sum of $4,000; that she agreed to accept the offer; and it was then agreed between them that the sale should be consummated on or before the 20th day of March, 1887, and further that the plaintiff and defendant should each deposit with Charles A. James, the cashier of the National Bank of Washington, the sum of $100, to be forfeited by either party who should fail to perform his part of the contract to the party able and willing to perform it on his or her part; that upon this agreement the defendant executed the note sued on, and the plaintiff executed his check for the sum of $100, and both were then delivered to James, the cashier, to hold in escrow upon the conditions above mentioned; that the contract for the sale of the land was entirely in parol, the only papers signed being the note and the check, neither of which contained any reference to the contract.

The defendant further testified that the plaintiff did not perform his said oral agreement on the 20th day of March, 1887, but made default therein; but that afterwards, about the 29th day of March, the plaintiff offered to perform his contract by taking the real estate and paying the sum of $4,000.

There the defendant rested.

The plaintiff then gave evidence tending to show that there was no time fixed for the performance of the contract except such as was necessary for an examination of the title; that on the 12th of March the plaintiff and defendant went to the Real Estate Title Company's office, and the plaintiff ordered an abstract of title, which the company agreed to furnish by the 20th of March; that the company did not furnish it until the 27th of March, and thereupon the plaintiff offered to comply with the terms of the agreement by offering on that day to pay for the property,

NOTE.—Validity of promissory note given as a forfeit or as collateral to an invalid oral agreement which is within the Statute of Frauds.

The question presented in the above case has rarely arisen notwithstanding the very numerous decisions in relation to the Statute of Frauds.

The case of Rice v. Peet, 15 Johns. 502, which is cited in the opinion, is very nearly a direct precedent. There an action was brought for money had and received on a note which had been given as a pledge to be forfeited in case of failure to complete an oral agreement for the exchange of farms; and the note was held to be without consideration and the action for money had and received was upheld.

In Goodrich v. Nickols, 2 Root, 498, the question was one of evidence, and it was held that parol evidence was not admissible of an agreement to convey land or in default thereof to forfeit a certain sum of money.

To substantially the same effect it is decided in Patterson v. Cunningham, 12 Me. 506, that an oral agreement in the alternative to convey land or to pay a certain sum of money was not valid.

But parol evidence has been held admissible to prove that a note was delivered in escrow to be valid if an oral agreement for lands should be executed.

Cut. Couch v. Meeker, 2 Conn. 302, 7 Am. Rep. 274.

So a note for the purchase price of land bought by oral agreement is valid when the contract is executed. Edelin v. Clarkson, 3 B. Mon. 31, 38 Am. Dec. 177.

And an oral agreement to surrender a note on the removal of certain buildings was held valid as a good satisfaction of the note when the agreement was executed by removal of the buildings. Thayer v. McEwen, 14 Ill. App. 416.

And a note given for the purchase price of lands can be enforced by the vendor although the sale of the land was not in writing if the vendor chooses to execute the contract. It is no defense to the maker that he has failed to bind the vendor. Crutchfield v. Donathon, 49 Tex. 691, 30 Am. Rep. 112; McGowen v. West, 7 Mo. 569, 38 Am. Dec. 468; Rhodes v. Storr, 7 Ala. 347; Gillespie v. Battle, 15 Ala. 276.

Somewhat analogous to the above cases are those deciding that money deposited with a third person to be paid as a forfeit for failure to fulfill an oral contract of sale which is within the Statute of Frauds is not earnest money which will make the sale valid. Howe v. Hayward, 108 Mass. 54, 11 Am. Rep. 306; Noakes v. Morey, 30 Ind. 108. B. A. R.

but that the defendant refused to convey the land.

The only other evidence was that of Mr. James, who testified that when the papers were left with him, he heard nothing said with reference to the limitation to the 20th day of March as the date when the contract should be consummated.

Thereupon, upon application of the defendant, the court below directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant.

The ground of the defense was that the note having been given only as a forfeit for the non-performance of a parol contract respecting the sale of land was, therefore, without consideration and incapable of sustaining a recovery.

The question has been very well argued by counsel on both sides, and being an interesting one, we have given it full attention.

As a matter of course, the verbal contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was distinctly within the 4th paragraph of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds; and therefore was totally void and incapable of being enforced or taken cognizance of by any court except by decree for a specific performance upon such proof of part payment as is recognized as sufficient by a court of equity. The note of the defendant was, therefore, given to secure the execution of a void agreement—in other words of no agreement at all; and hence was equally void, as without consideration.

We think this position is clear from a proper consideration of the authorities, notwithstanding its apparent conflict with some of those quoted by counsel for the plaintiff.

In Browne on the Statute of Frauds, § 134, in illustrating the results of the invalidity of parol contracts for the sale of land, the author says: "This case, Carrington v. Roots, 2 Mees. & W. 248, affords a very clear exemplification of the general rule which may be here reasserted, that no action can be brought to charge the defendant in any way upon a verbal agreement not put in writing according to the statute. And it may be briefly illustrated further. If land be sold at auction or otherwise, and no memorandum made, and the purchaser refuses to take it, no action will lie against him to recover the loss sustained upon a second sale to another party; this could be done, manifestly, only upon the ground that he was originally legally liable to take and pay for the land himself. Nor will a discharge from performing a verbal contract within the statute be a sufficient consideration to support another engagement. No action whatever could have been maintained against the defendant for any breach of that contract. A discharge from it, therefore, is of no use to him. And upon exactly the same principle an engagement to forfeit a certain sum of money, in case of failing to perform another engagement which, within the Statute of Frauds, could not itself be enforced, is not enforceable by the party to whom it is made."

"So where the defendant agreed to take up certain notes and receive a conveyance of land which a third party had verbally engaged to give, the defendant's promise was held void for want of consideration."

This is the principle decided in the case of Goodrich v. Nickols, 2 Root, 498, which seems to be directly applicable to the case under consideration.

To the same effect is the case of Rice v. Peet, 15 Johns. 502. There two parties agreed verbally to exchange their farms, and one of them delivered to the other a note which had been given to him by a third person to be forfeited in case he should not comply with the contract. He failed to comply; whereupon the other party went to the drawer of the note and collected the money. The plaintiff in the case thereupon brought suit for the money thus collected and it was held that he could recover the money. The court after examining other points said:

"There is another ground on which the plaintiff had good right to recover the money received by the defendant on that note. It was received by the defendant without consideration; the contract for the exchange of farms was void by the Statute of Frauds, being by parol only."

The case of Lemy v. Brush, 45 N. Y. 589, is a very instructive one. Two parties agreed that one of them should attend an auction and purchase a piece of land which was to be there offered for sale. The person who was to bid it off was to pay for it, and then it was to be held jointly for the two, and the second party was to reimburse the purchaser one half the money so paid. At the auction he did buy the land, but signed no note of the purchase, and the auctioneer failed to make any memorandum of the transaction, so that the contract of sale was entirely verbal and void under the Statute of Frauds. The purchaser who had thus possessed himself of the land under this agreement refused to make good his contract with the other party, who filed a bill to compel him to receive one half of the money and convey one half of the land. The relief was refused upon the ground that the contract of sale of the land at the auction, in the absence of an agreement or memorandum or note thereof, was totally void under the Statute of Frauds and therefore the collateral agreement, so called, to divide the land when bought, was also void and could not be enforced. The court said (p. 594): "If no valid contract for purchase had been made, the plaintiff would have had no remedy against the defendant, although the failure to make such contract was wholly from the default of the defendant. In other words, an action will not lie by one party against another for the breach of a verbal agreement to unite with him in the purchase of a designated piece of land, the title to be taken by them in common. No purchase having been made, such an agreement would come within the statute," etc.

Again, the court, replying to an argument advanced by counsel for the plaintiff, that the statute cannot be invoked as a shield to protect a party in the perpetration of a fraud, says:

"But no case can be found where a contract has been taken out of the statute in favor of a party who had no existing interest in the property, who had done no act of part performance, who had parted with nothing under the contract, simply upon the ground that the other party was guilty of a fraud in refusing to perform his verbal agreement. That is all there is of this case, except the offer of performance by the plaintiff. To hold that to be sufficient to take the case out of the statute, would repeal it. Care must be taken that this is not done, under an idea that as the statute was enacted to prevent fraud, it cannot be applied to cases where it appears that, in a moral sense, a party is attempting to perpetrate a fraud. A party, in no legal sense, commits a fraud by refusing to perform a contract void by its provisions. He has not, in that sense, made a contract, and has a perfect right, both at law and in equity, to refuse performance."

'This case is cited with approbation by the Supreme Court in the case of Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 628, 24 L. ed. 1029.

The authorities cited by the plaintiff do not impugn this principle. It is true, a parol agreement collateral to a written contract concerning the sale of interests in lands, and not interfering with its terms, is not void under the statute. Such was the case of Morgan v. Griffith, L. R. 6 Exch. 70, where a landlord who had given a written lease afterwards agreed with the tenant that he would keep down the rabbits that were overrunning the crops. Upon failure to do so, the tenant brought suit upon the collateral agreement, and it was held it might be established by parol.

This and a similar case, Brakine v. Adoane, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 756, and many others to the same effect, were relied on in the case of Raub v. Barber, 6 Mackey, 245, where it was decided that a lessee under a written lease which gave him power to assign his term, might be held answerable under a contemporaneous verbal promise to divide with the lessor whatever profits he might make by the assignment. But such recognized collateral verbal agreements presuppose the existence of valid existing contracts, to which they are supplementary. If the principal agreement is void and not capable of being enforced, it is not easy to see how a penalty can lawfully be enforced for its non-performance. If there are any cases apparently to the contrary, they must have been governed by some other principle.

An additional reason why the plaintiff could not recover is that the contract was conditional. Payment was to be made and deed given on the 20th of March, on which day the defendant was ready to comply with the terms of the contract; but the plaintiff failed to do so. The excuse that he offered to comply on the 27th or 29th of March, was no more a legal performance by him of his part of the agreement than an offer to do so on the 29th of April would have been.

We think the judgment below correct, and it is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

James R. ALTON, Appt.,

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF WEBSTER.

(.....Mass.....)

Payment of the amount due on an instrument by one who indorsed it, which is made and accepted in the mistaken belief of both parties that such indorsee was legally liable, where the matter was equally open for the inquiry and judgment of both parties, cannot be recovered back whether the mistake is to be considered one of fact or of law.

(October 22, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Worcester County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover back certain payments which plaintiff had made to defendant under the mistaken belief that he was liable for them as surety upon certain instruments in writing. Affirmed.

The case was submitted to the Superior Court upon an agreed statement of facts of which the following is a copy:

In the spring of 1889, and for some time previously, one William Walker carried to the defendant bank, a national banking association located at Webster, Mass., a number of instruments in writing, indorsed in blank by this plaintiff and himself, a copy of one of which is as follows:

"$150. So. Woodstock, Ct., March 4, 1889.

"Received of W. H. Walker, this day, one bay horse, — Vinton horse, — one express wagon, for which I promise to pay said Walker or order one hundred and fifty dollars, five months from date, at First Nat. Bank, Webster, with interest at — per cent; said property to be and remain the entire and absolute property of said Walker until paid in full by me; and I hereby agree not to sell or dispose of and to keep said property in good order and condition, as the same now is; and, should said horse die before said sum is fully paid, I hereby agree to pay all sums due thereon; and should said property be returned to or taken back by said Walker I agree that all payments made thereon may be retained by said Walker for the use of said property.

"Charles H. Moore.

"Witness: I. L. Edmunds.

"Indorsement: W. H. Walker.

J. R. Alton."

The amount of such paper was about $4,400. Walker then supposed the instruments to be negotiable promissory notes, and the defendant, understanding and believing said instruments to be negotiable promissory notes, discounted them for said Walker, and credited the proceeds thereof to his account upon their books. The defendant discounted said paper, relying largely upon the strength of the plaintiff's indorsement. There was no want of certainty on the part of either Walker, the defendant, or the plaintiff as to the actual contents of the several papers. The plaintiff, living at New Boston, in Thompson, Conn., about four miles from Webster, had indorsed said instruments at said Walker's request, and solely for his accommodation, supposing them to be promissory notes. He received no consideration for said indorsement. Plaintiff believed at the time of his indorsement that if he had to pay the paper he could hold the property described in it as collateral security for the payment. The plaintiff indorsed these instruments understanding that it was Walker's purpose to raise money by obtaining their discount, and that it was to aid him in this that the indorsements were requested. He did not at first know where the discounts were to be obtained, but prior to January 1, 1889, he was informed by one of the directors that the defendant bank was discounting for Walker's notes with the plaintiff's indorsement, and was asked by him for a statement as to his financial condition, and the amount of his indorsements for Walker. The plaintiff, in reply, stated his financial condition, and that he thought that he was the indorser for Walker to the amount of $2,200 or $2,300. He also stated that he understood that he was liable to pay in case Walker did not. In June, 1889, Walker fled, making no provision for the payment of his indebtedness to the defendant. The defendant bank, understanding said instruments to be promissory notes, caused the same, as they became due, to be protested, of which the plaintiff had notice. After Walker's departure, the plaintiff deposited with the defendant bank $1,300, directing that it be applied to the payment of the notes upon which he was indorser, as they should mature. $1,061 of the money so deposited was applied as directed. The plaintiff, desiring to obtain possession of certain of these instruments before they were due, went to the defendant bank, and got three of his own notes discounted, and paid the proceeds thereof and a certain small sum besides, amounting to $710.20, to the defendant for an equal amount of these instruments not yet due, and the same were thereupon delivered to him by the defendant. At the time the plaintiff deposited said $1,300, with directions as aforesaid, and at the time he paid the $710.20 for the instruments not yet due, he still supposed them to be negotiable promissory notes, and that he was liable on them as indorser. Afterwards he was advised otherwise, and refused to pay any more of said instruments, whereupon the bank brought suit against him on one of these instruments in Connecticut, which was decided in his favor, being the case of First Nat. Bank of Webster v. Alton, 60 Conn. 402. This action is brought to recover back the money so received by the bank, viz., the sums of $1,061 and $710.20, making in all the sum of $1,771.20; and it is agreed that the declaration may be taken as if it specified these two sums, and the aggregate of them.

Messrs. W. S. B. Hopkins and Frank Bulkeley Smith for plaintiff.

Mr. Frank P. Goulding for defendant.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Lord Westbury sometimes is supposed to have taken a distinction as to the effect of a mistake of law, according to whether the mistaken principle is general or special. Cooper v. Phibbs, L. R. 2 H. L. 149, 170. But in the often-quoted passage of his judgment he only meant that certain words, such as "ownership," "marriage," "settlement," etc., import both a conclusion of law and facts justifying it, so that, when asserted without explanation of what the facts relied on are, they assert the existence of facts sufficient to justify the conclusion, and a mistake induced by such an assertion is a mistake of fact. In the case before him the mistake was one concerning the ownership of a fishery, and was induced by a general statement of a certain person that he owned it. Id. 164; Windram v. French, 151 Mass. 547, 551, 8 L. R. A. 750.

We will assume, merely for the purposes of this case, without expressing any opinion upon it either way, that a mistake of law of any kind, when the mistaken notion is made the avowed basis of a transaction, may be a ground of relief under some circumstances. We take it that the money sought to be recovered was understood by the plaintiff and defendant to be paid and received under the belief that the plaintiff was bound to pay it by his indorsement of the instrument set out in the agreed facts, and we also will assume that this belief was erroneous, as has been decided in Connecticut. First Nat. Bank of Webster v. Alton, 60 Conn. 402. See Sloan v. McCarty, 184 Mass. 245.

But the plaintiff meant to bind himself in the way in which he supposed he had done, and must be taken to have known that the defendant meant to have the security of his obligation before advancing, as it did, on the strength of it. If the case stopped there, the plaintiff hardly would have the boldness to contend that he could recover back what he had paid, and what he had meant to be understood and had been understood to promise, simply because, if he had found out the law soon enough, he might have backed out of his undertaking and honorary obligation. The plaintiff says that the case does not stop there, because, if the parties had been right in their view of the law, the plaintiff would have had the benefit of the security mentioned in the instrument, whereas now he has not.

If it be true that the plaintiff was not subrogated to the security upon payment, we are of opinion that it makes no difference as between the plaintiff and the defendant. The right of a surety to subrogation, like his right to contribution, is a collateral matter, and no part of his principal contract by which he makes himself surety. The existence of that right is not the implied foundation of the principal contract. The defendant was not concerned or bound to inquire what the expectations of the plaintiff might be as against a third person. It was for the plaintiff to obtain or preserve his rights as best he might. Aiken v. Short, 1 Hurlst. & N. 210, 215.

So far as this case is concerned, it does not matter whether the mistake was a mistake of fact or law; for even a common mistake as to a fact, but for the supposed existence of which the plaintiff would not have come into the transaction, as the defendant knew, would not warrant a recovery, when, as here, the fact was a matter equally open for the inquiry and judgment of both parties, and the defendant had a right to assume that the plaintiff relied wholly on his own means of information. Hecht v. Batcheller, 147 Mass. 335; Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr. 1905, 1910; Smith v. Hughes, L. R. 6 Q. B. 597.

There is no ground, however, for the suggestion that this was a mistake of fact in such a sense as to help the plaintiff. The plaintiff's indorsement was in the hands of the accommodated party until delivered in Massachusetts, and the payment was made in Massachusetts, so that the transaction was a Massachusetts transaction throughout. The plaintiff's obligation to know the Massachusetts law, whatever the measure of that obligation may be, was not affected by the accident of his being personally out of the jurisdiction. See Hill v. Chase, 143 Mass. 129. Probably the measure of the plaintiff's obligation would be the same in the case of a contract made in Connecticut, if on any ground its validity or effect depended on the law of Massachusetts. Cambios v. Mafet, 2 Wash. C. C. 98, 104; Merchants Bank v. Spalding, 9 N. Y. 53, 62; Graves v. Johnson (Mass.) 15 L. R. A. 834.

possession of a portion of a street in a city under a claim of right for ten years the title thereto vests absolutely in such occupant.

(December 18, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court for Lancaster County enjoining them from proceeding to cut down complainants' trees and otherwise interfere

NOTE.—Rights acquired as against the public by adverse possession of highway or city street.

All of the early cases in this country assume that in England no title to a portion of a highway could be acquired by adverse possession because of the operation of the maxim, nullum tempus occurrit regi. This may have been the law but if it was all of the subjects must have acquiesced in it without question, for the judges certainly had few if any occasions to apply it in cases in which title to highways on land were concerned. An examination of all available sources of authority for the preparation of this note has failed to reveal a single English case in which the question was raised and decided.

From the reasoning in Searby v. Tottenham R. Co., L. R. 5 Eq. 409, it would seem that under the present English statutes there was a possibility of acquiring adverse possession to a part of the highway.

In this country the rules laid down by the different courts are exceedingly diverse and unsatisfactory, so much so that it would be very difficult to determine in some states what rule was applicable to a particular state of facts until the court of last resort had applied it. Upon one extreme we find decisions that a prescriptive right may be acquired in a highway. Knight v. Heaton, 22 Vt. 480.

Title to land of a highway may be acquired by adverse possession. Webber v. Chapman, 42 N. H. 383, 80 Am. Dec. 111.

In Jersey City v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co., 12 N. J. Eq. 561, the court, after adverting to the fact that there had been some departure from the old common-law doctrine that the land of a highway could not be acquired by adverse possession, and citing some of the cases holding the new doctrine, refused to yield assent to them, criticising the doctrine as an application of the doctrine of adverse possession uncalled for and eminently disastrous to the public interests.

In accordance with that decision it is held that the public right to a highway cannot be lost by nonuser. Smith v. State, 23 N. J. L. 712.

In Philadelphia v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 53 Pa. 263, it is said that buildings erected on highways acquire no right on account of time.

No private occupancy for whatever time, either adverse or permissive, vests title inconsistent with the public use. Stevenson's App. (Pa.) May 3, 1893.

Presumption of abandonment.

There is a numerous class of cases which while refusing to subscribe to the idea that an individual could acquire by prescription or adverse possession any title against the public to a portion of a highway arrive at practically the same conclusion so far as the owner of the fee is concerned by presuming an abandonment. Thus it has been held that nonuser of a highway will forfeit the public right. Georgetown Street Comrs. v. Taylor, 2 Bay, 282.

A highway may be perpetually discontinued by nonuser. Gregory v. Knight, 60 Mich. 61.

It stands as against long user no better than other property. Coleman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 64 Mich. 163.

Nonuser of a highway may raise the presumption of abandonment so as to vest the right to possession in the owner of the fee. State v. Culver, 63 Mo. 607, 27 Am. Rep. 295.

When a city has permitted a party under a claim of right to occupy for thirty years land granted to it for a street it will be presumed to have abandoned its right thereto. Simplot v. Dubuque, 49 Iowa, 630.

Where land upon which a highway had been laid out has been in the open and exclusive possession of an individual for twenty years and there has been a complete nonuser of the easement by the public during that time an extinguishment will be presumed. Peoria v. Johnston, 56 Ill. 44.

with their property for the alleged purpose of opening a street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. P. Holmes, for appellants:

No right to obstruct a street can be acquired by adverse possession to the public.

People v. Pope, 53 Cal. 437; San Francisco v. Sullivan, 50 Cal. 608; Jersey City v. State, 80 N. J. L. 521; Cross v. Morristown, 18 N. J. Eq. 305.

Encroachments upon a public street are public nuisances.

Wetmore v. Tracy, 14 Wend. 250, 28 Am. Dec. 525; Robbins v. Chicago, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 637, 18 L. ed. 427; Neavin v. Peoria, 41 Ill. 503, 89 Am. Dec. 892; El Dorado County v. Davidson, 80 Cal. 520.

No length of time will legalize a public nuisance.

Folkes v. Chad, 8 Dougl. 340; Stoughton v. Baker, 4 Mass. 522, 3 Am. Dec. 286; Com. v. Upton, 6 Gray, 476; Burbank v. Fay, 65 N. Y. 57; New Orleans v. United States, 85 U. S. 10 Pet. 734, 9 L. ed. 601; Henshaw v. Hunting, 1 Gray, 203; Com. v. Boston, 16 Pick. 442; Wright v. Tukey, 8 Cush. 290; Fox v. Hart, 11 Ohio, 414.

A prescriptive right is merely a conclusive presumption of an actual grant. As public authorities cannot grant away title to streets no prescriptive right can grow up, because there can be no presumption of an actual grant; the presumed grant being ultra vires.

Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 281, 20 Am. Rep.

243; Sims v. Chattanooga, 2 Lea, 694; Sheen v. Stothart, 29 La. Ann. 630.

Messrs. Billingsley & Woodward and J. E. Philpott, for appellees:

Corporations are subject to the operation of the Statutes of Limitation in the same manner and to the same extent as natural persons; and notorious, actual, and adverse possession for more than ten years by a private individual under a claim of ownership of land dedicated to a city or town for a street or public square will bar the claim of the city or town to its use.

Cincinnati v. First Presby. Church, 8 Ohio, 298; Cincinnati v. Evans, 5 Ohio St. 594; Armstrong v. Dalton, 15 N. C. 588; Dudley v. Frankfort, 12 B. Mon. 610; Ang. Limitations, § 88.

Title to property can be acquired by actual, adverse, open, and notorious possession, through a period fixed by the Statute of Limitations, although it was owned by a municipal corporation.

1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 800, § 54, note 1; Buswell, Adverse Possession, § 99.

There is a distinction between public highways belonging to the sovereign state and to a municipal corporation.

Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 86; Pella v. Scholte, 24 Iowa, 293, 95 Am. Dec. 729; Cincinnati v. First Presby. Church and Cincinnati v. Evans, supra; Rowan v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 250; North Hempstead v. Hempstead, 2 Wend. 109; Denton v. Jackson, 2 Johns.

Nonuser of a highway for many years is prima facie evidence of a release of the public right. Beardslee v. French, 7 Conn. 125.

A public way may be shown to have been discontinued by proof that it has been shut up and the land enclosed by permanent fences and occupied and improved for purposes inconsistent with its use as a public highway for forty years. Holt v. Sargent, 15 Gray, 97.

It seems that twenty years' nonuser will work an abandonment. Amsbey v. Hinds, 46 Barb. 623.

A presumption of abandonment may be indulged to save an abutting landowner from criminal prosecution where the public has long acquiesced in the line which it is seeking to repudiate by proceedings to remove obstructions. Hamilton v. State, 106 Ind. 361.

Estoppel.

Some courts have resorted to the doctrine of estoppel to prevent the public from reclaiming land formerly part of a highway which has for a long time been in the adverse possession of an individual. See Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 91 Ill. 251; Chicago, R. L. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet, 79 Ill. 40.

Entire nonuser of a portion of a highway during the limitation period accompanied by adverse possession by one claiming an adverse title will estop the public from claiming any right in such portion. Orr v. O'Brien, 77 Iowa, 263; Smith v. Gorell, 81 Iowa, 218.

Where there has been an entire nonuser of the highway for a period of thirty years and one half of the same in width has been enclosed, and in open, notorious, and adverse possession for more than ten years, the public will be estopped to claim any right in the property thus enclosed. Davies v. Huebner, 45 Iowa, 574.

But merely permitting one to fence in a portion of the street will not estop the city from claiming the street when it needs it. Solberg v. Decorah, 41 Iowa, 501.

Rule in case of city streets.

In many jurisdictions a distinction is drawn between highways and city streets upon reasoning well shown in Fort Smith v. McKibbin, 41 Ark. 45, 48 Am. Rep. 19, where the court says municipal corporations are not really the state nor are their functions and powers conferred principally for the benefit of the whole people of the state. It may well be doubted whether the reason of the maxim [nullum tempus occurrit regi] may not be strained too far in applying it to these bodies. That the time and attention of the sovereign was occupied by the cares of government might well have excused a king from asserting his rights but affords no reason why the officers of a corporation should not be reasonably diligent in the discharge of the duties they were selected to execute. Nor does it afford a reason why citizens daily sensible of an encroachment on their common rights should be allowed to lie dormant for many years and then assert them to the detriment of others. The more wholesome rule for the citizen, individually and collectively, is that the laws favor the vigilant only; and the court then makes a distinction between an attempted claim to a prescriptive right which implies an original grant and a defense under the Statute of Limitations where no grant or even a lawful entry is necessary, holding that a defense under the statute may be valid while impliedly denying the validity of a claim by prescription.

In Cincinnati v. First Presby. Church, 8 Ohio, 298, 82 Am. Dec. 718, which is a case frequently cited in support of the doctrine that the statute will run against a municipality, the controversy was over some town lots and the court said none of the reasons for exempting the sovereign from the operation of the Statute of Limitations applied with much force to municipal corporations. The law imposed upon them the duty of defending the interests which they are created to uphold and has

Norval, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by August Meyer to enjoin the defendant, the mayor, councilmen, and street commissioner of the city of Lincoln, from opening an alleged public road or street in said city by cutting down and removing numerous fruit and shade trees owned by the plaintiff, which are claimed by the defendants to be within the limits of said highway or street, and to obstruct the travel thereon. It also appears that Adam Bax, Emma A. Beach, and Margaret Roath each brought a similar action against the defendants herein, which for convenience, by agreement of parties, were tried with this in the district court; it being stipulated that all the causes should abide the decision in the suit of Meyer against Graham and others. The trial court found the issues in favor of the plaintiff Meyer, and rendered a decree perpetually enjoining the defendants from entering upon plaintiff's premises, or from injuring or destroying the trees thereon, or otherwise interfering with the plaintiff's possession and enjoyment of the same. The defendants appeal.

In 1865 the territorial Legislature of Nebraska passed an Act entitled "An Act to Locate a Territorial Road from Forest City in Sarpy County to the South Line of Lancaster County." Charles H. Walker, John P. Loden, and Richard Wallingsford were named in the law as commissioners to locate the road. By the Act the commissioners were required to view and locate the road, and make return thereof to the county clerks of the several counties through which the road should pass, on or before the 1st day of August, 1865. Laws 1865, p. 144. The commissioners commenced their work in Lancaster county on August 1, 1865, but did not complete the same and make return to the county clerk of the county until the 5th day of September of the same year. A portion of this territorial road was located on the section line between sections 85 and 86 in township 10, range 6 E., and is now known as a portion of Fourteenth street in said city. At the date of the location of this road the title to the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 85 was in the United States. Subsequently, on the 15th day of January, 1870, the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 85 was laid out and platted by the owner as "Dawson's Addition to South Lincoln." The plat represents a street on the east side of the tract thus platted, and also the east tier of blocks as being the same in size as all other blocks in the addition. The legend recites conferred every power necessary to that end. The rights of such corporations seem well enough protected without evading the letter of the statute.

A municipal corporation has no more right than a natural person to claim the benefit and advantage of the maxim, nullum tempus occurrit regi. Dudley v. Frankfort, 12 B. Mon. 614; Rowan v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 289.

In Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 46, the court makes a very full review of the authorities and concludes that the maxim does not apply in favor of a municipal corporation.

But the above doctrine can by no means be said to be the generally accepted one. In many jurisdictions the title to city streets is said to be held in trust for the public without power of alienation, and from this premise the conclusion is drawn that property not susceptible of alienation cannot be acquired by prescription. New Orleans v. Magnon, 4 Mart. O. S. 2.

In a case where title by adverse possession was claimed to land which had been dedicated to a city by the United States for street purposes the court held that in keeping possession of the land the city was representing a public right of the nature of sovereignty and that the Statute of Limitations would not run against it. Simplot v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 16 Fed. Rep. 861.

No one can acquire by adverse possession as against the public the right to obstruct a street dedicated to public use and thus prevent the use of it as a public highway. People v. Pope, 58 Cal. 437.

The streets of an incorporated town are held by the corporation in trust for the public and an adverse possession thereof by an abutting owner cannot bar the right of the corporation to open it for public use. Vicksburg v. Marshall, 59 Miss. 571.

The title of the municipality to the soil of its streets for uses which conduce to the public enjoyment or convenience is permanent and exclusive and no private occupancy for whatever time and whether adverse or by permission can vest a title inconsistent with it. Barter v. Com. 3 Penn. & W. 259.

In Cross v. Morristown, 18 N. J. Eq. 312, where the title to a portion of a city street was in controversy, the court makes no distinction between such streets and highways but after quoting the common law with reference to adverse possession of highways, it cites from Domat, p. 492, to the effect that one cannot acquire by prescription the things which nature or the law of nations destined to a common and public use; and then says the absence of the doctrine that prescription will not run against the public from any legal system would be attended with much inconvenience for it is almost impossible to imagine a scheme of supervision over public interests which would be adequate for their protection against the constant and yet almost imperceptible aggressions of individuals.

In numerical strength the cases denying the power to acquire a portion of a street by adverse possession preponderate, the following cases recognizing the power: Cornwall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 87 Ky. 78; Boesworth v. Mt. Sterling, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 157; Big Rapids v. Comstock, 65 Mich. 78; Wayzata v. Great Northern R. Co. (Minn.) July 12, 1892; Schock v. Falls City, 31 Neb. 599; Cincinnati v. Evans, 5 Ohio St. 603; Galveston v. Menard, 23 Tex. 409; Ostrom v. San Antonio, 77 Tex. 347; Taylor v. Philippi, 35 W. Va. 556; Forsyth v. Wheeling, 19 Va. 322; while the following refuse to do so: Orena v. Santa Barbara, 91 Cal. 631; Vialia v. Jacob, 65 Cal. 484, 52 Am. Rep. 303; Grogan v. Hayward, 4 Fed. Rep. 161; Lee v. Mound Station, 118 Ill. 804; Sims v. Frankfort, 79 Ind. 451; Cheek v. Aurora, 92 Ind. 107; Waterloo v. Union Mill Co. 78 Iowa, 439; Louisiana Ice Mfg. Co. v. New Orleans, 43 La. Ann. 217; Sheen v. Stothart, 29 La. Ann. 630; Thibodeaux v. Maggiolo, 4 La. Ann. 78; Jersey City v. State, 30 N. J. L. 521; St. Vincent's F. Orphan that all lots are 142 feet deep by 50 feet wide. The plaintiff Meyer is the owner of lot 12 in block 44 of said addition, which lot lies on the east side of the addition, and next to the highway or street in controversy. Counting the lot 50 feet in width, the east side thereof is from 6 to 8 feet west of the section line between said sections 85 and 86. The plaintiff's improvements, which were sought to be removed by the defendant Byers as street commissioner, are on the strip which it is claimed was set apart for said street or road. The defendants contend that the street was 100 feet wide, the same as the other streets in the addition. If such is the case, the eastern tier of lots are much less than half the width called for in the legend attached to the plat of the addition. In argument the plaintiff insists that the territorial road already referred to was never legally located, nor was it ever ordered opened as a public highway, and that the land in dispute is a part of plaintiff's lot, and not within the limits of any street of the city of Lincoln. As we view the case, it will not be necessary for us to consider or decide the questions thus presented, but for the purpose of the case we will assume that the ground in controversy is within the limits of a legal public street of the city of Lincoln. The plaintiff alleges in his petition, and there is ample testimony in the record tending to show, that for more than ten years immediately prior to the bringing of the action the plaintiff and his grantor have been in the open, actual, adverse, peaceable, and continued possession of said premises, and held the same under claim of title. The evidence shows that a house with a cellar under it, a well, barn, smoke-house, fruit and shade trees, and a fence have been upon the lot since 1878 or the spring of 1879. The house is about twenty feet west of the section line, and within the strip claimed to be a part of the road or street known as "Fourteenth street." The trees were east of the house. The plaintiff and his grantor have paid, from year to year, the taxes levied upon said lot since 1870. Upon the trial there was no attempt to show that the land in controversy had been used or traveled upon by the public as a street for more than ten years, but, on the contrary, it is clear enough from the evidence that the traveled road was east of the section line. Most of the improvements were made by the plaintiff's grantor, Christian Bohman, who lived upon the premises for seven or eight years prior to 1885, when he sold the lot to the plaintiff, who immediately took possession and has resided thereon ever since. The possession of the plaintiff and his grantor was not in any manner disputed by any, nor did the city authorities make any claim to the land until about the 24th day of July, 1889, when the street commissioners commenced removing the fence and cutting down the trees, whereupon this action was instituted to restrain the city authorities from proceeding to open a street through the premises. By numerous decisions of this court it has been held that Asylum v. Troy, 76 N. Y. 114; Com. v. Moorehead, 118 Pa. 344; Kopf v. Utter, 101 Pa. 27; Memphis v. Lenore, 6 Coldw. 412; Sims v. Chattanooga, 2 Lea, 604.

But it will be observed that in some jurisdictions where the power is denied the doctrine of abandonment or estoppel is recognized.

Enclosure of part of the width of the way.

Besides the conflict in fundamental principles as shown above there is also much conflict in minor applications of principles. Thus it is held that enclosure of part of the width of a highway the remainder of which was traveled is a public nuisance and cannot be the legal commencement of an adverse claim, hence no title by adverse possession can be based upon it. Simmons v. Cornell, 1 R. I. 623.

Mere fencing in a strip off from the side of the street with notice of the true line, the public continuing to use the remainder of the street, cannot ripen into adverse possession. Childs v. Nelson, 69 Wis. 135.

Mere fencing will not give title to a part of a city street. Brooks v. Riding, 46 Ind. 15; Lane v. Kennedy, 13 Ohio St. 42; Fox v. Hart, 11 Ohio, 414.

Merely enclosing a portion of a highway by a fence does not constitute such adverse possession as against the public as will confer title by mere lapse of time. McClelland v. Miller, 28 Ohio St. 502.

The occupation of a portion of a highway by an individual is a mere obstruction and nuisance for which no lapse of time will enable him to prescribe and no acquiescence by the highway officials of the town will deprive the public of the right to use the whole highway. Driggs v. Phillips, 103 N. Y. 77.

But it had been previously held that under the New York statute if a fence encroaches on the highway in such a way as not to amount to a nuisance by obstructing travel, and remains there for twenty years, the land within the fence ceases to be a highway. Peckham v. Henderson, 27 Barb. 212. And see cases cited supra.

Neglect to open.

In Walker v. Caywood, 31 N. Y. 51, in which the commissioners had failed to open a highway to its full width for more than thirty years, the court held there was no Statute of Limitations which would apply to extinguish the rights of the public to the portions not opened and worked.

Where adverse possession was claimed to land over which a street had been laid out but never opened the court said the very nature of the rights vested in the town by the laying out of the street rendered it impossible that there should be as against it any adverse possession until an official order or adjudication was made that the street should be improved or until some acts were done which were equivalent thereto. Henshaw v. Hunting, 1 Gray, 218.

Until the time arrives when the land is actually needed for street purposes no mere nonuser, however long continued, will operate as an abandonment of it. Reilly v. Racine, 51 Wis. 522; Derby v. Alling, 40 Conn. 410.

Nor will the additional fact that during the time of nonuser the city treats the land as that of the owner of the fee have that effect. State v. Leaver, 62 Wis. 387.

Restraint of summary proceedings to remove obstructions.

There may be circumstances under which a city will not be permitted to proceed summarily to remove buildings alleged to be encroaching on its streets. Manko v. Chambersburgh, 25 N. J. Eq. 183.

After an adverse possession of a street for twenty-five years under a claim of right the city will not be permitted without due process of law to enter upon the land and pull down buildings, etc., under adverse possession of real estate as owner for ten years gives a perfect title to the occupant. Horbach v. Miller, 4 Neb. 47; Gatling v. Lane, 17 Neb. 79; Haywood v. Thomas, 17 Neb. 240; Taz v. Pfug, 24 Neb. 669; Levy v. Yerga, 25 Neb. 764; Obernally v. Edgar, 28 Neb. 70; Crawford v. Galloway, 29 Neb. 261; Petersen v. Townsend, 80 Neb. 376; Alexander v. Wilcox, 80 Neb. 795, 9 L. R. A. 735.

Appellants contend that no one can acquire title to a street by adverse occupation,—in other words, that the doctrine of adverse possession does not apply to municipal corporations. In our investigation of the subject we find the authorities conflicting. The decisions of the highest courts of some of the states, notably California, Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Rhode Island, and Louisiana, sustain the doctrine for which the appellants contend, while the courts of most of the other states have held that the doctrine of adverse possession applies to municipal corporations the same as individuals. The weight of the adjudications are certainly that way. Cincinnati v. First Presby. Church, 8 Ohio, 298; Cincinnati v. Keane, 5 Ohio St. 594; Armstrong v. Dalton, 15 N. C. 568; Rowan v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 232; Dudley v. Frankfort, 12 B. Mon. 610; Galveston v. Menard, 23 Tex. 849; St. Charles County v. Powell, 22 Mo. 525; Peoria v. Johnston, 56 Ill. 45; Richmond v. Poe, 24 Gratt. 149; Pella v. Scholte, 24 Iowa, 283, 95 Am. Dec. 729; Fort Smith v. McKibbin, 41 Ark. 45; Cornwall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 87 Ky. 78; Clements v. Anderson, 46 Miss. 581; Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 36; Webber v. Chapman, 42 N. H. 326; Schock v. Falls City, 81 Neb. 599.

Dudley v. Frankfort, supra, was an action to restrain the marshal from removing plaintiff's inclosure off of the street as an obstruction. The plaintiff claimed the right to part of the street by adverse occupancy. The court in the opinion, says: "If the private citizen at any time encroach with his buildings and inclosures upon the public streets, the municipal authorities should, in the exercise of proper vigilance and of their undoubted authority, interfere, by the legal means provided in their charter, to prevent such encroachment in due time, and thus preserve for the public use the squares, streets, and alleys of the town in their original dimensions; but if a private individual or citizen has been permitted to remain in the continual, adverse, actual possession of public ground, or of a public street, or of a part of a street, as embraced within his inclosure, or covered by his dwelling or other buildings, for a period of twenty years or more, without interruption, such citizen will be vested thereby with the complete title to the ground so actually occupied by him; and the title thus perfected by time will be just as available against a municipal corporation as it would be against an individual, whose elder title and right of entry may be barred by a continued adverse possession for twenty years of his land." In Wheeling v. Campbell, supra, that court, after a complete and critical review of the conflicting authorities, in the opinion says: "We see no reason why a municipal corporation should not be held to the same degree of diligence in guarding their streets and squares from encroachments as natural persons are in protecting their property from the adverse possession of others. We do see great reason why no time should bar the sovereign power, because the officers of the sovereign, whether king or state, have such various and onerous duties to perform that the rights of the sovereign may be neglected; and all the people of the kingdom or state are interested in having the rights of the sovereign preserved intact, and not subject to be impaired or lost by the neglect of officers. But the same reason does not apply to a municipal corporation. A city or town is a compact community, with its city or town council, its committee on streets and alleys, and its street commissioners, whose special duty it is its right to regulate highways. Varick v. New York, 4 Johns. Ch. 53, 1 L. ed. 761.

Equity will protect one in possession of part of a highway of which he has had adverse possession for a long period of time until the adverse claim is decided. Devaux v. Detroit, Harr. Ch. 98.

Right to lateral support.

No right to lateral support can be claimed by prescription because it is impossible that it could have been obtained by grant. Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 245, 20 Am. Rep. 243; Mitchell v. Rome, 49 Ga. 19.

Miscellaneous decisions.

No adverse user of a highway by a wrongdoer for any period less than ten years can alter its legal status or the rights of the public. Brown v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 20 Mo. App. 427.

The prescription must be under color of title. Coleman v. Thurmond, 56 Tex. 520.

The use of a part of a street by a railroad company "as and for a right of way" cannot ripen into absolute title. Indianapolis, P. & C. B. Co. v. Ross, 47 Ind. 25.

To perfect a title by adverse possession against a city the appropriation and use must be under claim of title hostile to the city with the assertion of exclusive proprietary rights in the land claimed. Briel v. Natchez, 48 Miss. 439.

The right of a county cannot be barred. Coleman v. Thurmond, 56 Tex. 520.

Statutory provisions.

In some states there is an express statutory provision that the Statute of Limitations shall not apply to lands belonging to the public. State v. Culver, 65 Mo. 607, 27 Am. Rep. 295; Ostrom v. San Antonio, 77 Tex. 347.

In some states the Statute of Limitations is expressly made to apply to the state. Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 46.

In Massachusetts the statute provides that where buildings or fences have been erected fronting on a highway and continued for more than twenty years and the true boundaries are not known or cannot be made certain, the buildings or fences shall be taken to be the true boundaries. See Morton v. Moore, 15 Gray, 575.

The charter of Pittsburg expressly precluded time from legalizing encroachments on a street and from being a bar to public prosecutions for such encroachments. Com. v. McDonald, 16 Serg. & R. 401.

Land covered by a highway is within the terms of the Connecticut statute limiting the time for commencing actions to quiet title to real estate. Litchfield v. Wilmot, 2 Root, 288.

to see that the streets, squares, and alleys are kept in proper order, and free from obstructions or encroachments. And if with all this machinery and power, confined to so narrow a compass, and the interest of the corporation to exercise it, the city authorities permit an individual to encroach upon the streets, alleys, or squares of the city, and hold, enjoy, and occupy the same, claiming them as his own under his title, without interruption or disturbance in that right, for the period prescribed in the Statute of Limitations, the city not only does, but, we think, according to reason as well as authority, ought to, lose all right thereto." Upon a careful consideration of the question we are satisfied, upon principle as well as authority, that adverse possession by an abutting lotowner of a portion of a street in a city for the statutory period of limitation will give a complete title thereto to the occupant. To have that effect the possession must be actual, visible, exclusive, and uninterrupted for the full period of ten years under a claim of right. Under the facts proven the city is barred from now asserting any right or claim to the property held by the plaintiff for ten years.

The judgment is affirmed.

v.
City of ST. PAUL, Respnt.

(.....Minn.....)

"The duty of providing and maintaining a city hall for the use of the city officers is a public and governmental use, for the negligence of its agents or servants in the discharge of which the city of St. Paul is not liable in a private action.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. H. Schriber, for appellant:

So far as municipal corporations exercise powers conferred on them for purposes essentially public—purposes pertaining to the administration of the general laws, made to enforce the general laws of the state, e. g., police powers,—they should be deemed agencies of the state, and not subject to be sued for any act or admission occurring while in the exercise of such power.

A municipal corporation in its private character as the owner, lessee, or controller of lands and houses, is to be regarded in the same light as an individual and dealt with accordingly.

In LaClef v. Concordia, supra, the city was sued for damages by a person confined in the city prison by reason of the negligent condition in which the prison had been maintained. The court says: "For the purposes of this case it will be presumed that the plaintiff has sustained the injuries complained of, and that his petition is in all respects sufficient to entitle him to recover, if the city is liable for this class of injuries. It has already been held in this state that counties are not liable for injuries of this kind."

A county is not liable for negligently failing to keep its court-house in repair.

Dowdell v. Olmsted County, 80 Minn. 96, 44 Am. Rep. 185.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint alleges that the city of St. Paul and the county of Ramsey owned and possessed, as tenants in common, a building known as the "Court-house and City Hall," that they negligently constructed the entrance to one of the elevator shafts in an unsafe manner; also that their servant in charge of the elevator handled it negligently, whereby the plaintiff was injured. As one of its defenses, the city pleaded the various statutes regulating the construction, custody, and use of the building, particularly Special Laws 1881, chap. 876, and Special Laws 1889, chap. 64. Briefly stated, the Act of 1881 created a special court-house commission, consisting of the mayor of the city of St. Paul (who was ex officio a member) and five other persons, to be appointed by the judges of the district court of Ramsey county. This commission was to prepare plans for a building for the use of the city and county "for a city hall and county court-house, and for offices for the city and county officers, and such other public uses as may be deemed expedient," and submit the same, together with an estimate of the cost, to the board of county commissioners and the common council of the city for their approval. Upon their approval of the plans the commission was to proceed and construct the building, which was to be paid for out of the proceeds of a fund called "the court-house and city-hall building fund," which was to be raised by the issue and sale of bonds of the city and of the county. The Act further provided that the city and county "shall hold the land occupied and needed for said building, together with the building which may be erected thereon, in common, and for the public uses aforesaid." The Act of 1889 provided that when completed the building should be placed in charge of a committee of seven, to be appointed as follows: Three annually by the president of the common council, and three annually by the chairman of the board of county commissioners; and that the mayor of the city should be ex officio a member and the chairman of the committee. This committee was to have entire charge of the building, with power to appoint such janitor, custodian, and other employees as they should deem necessary for the proper care and management of the building. The answer also alleges that the city has never had any control over either the construction or custody of the building, which have been entirely under the direction and control of the court-house commission and committee referred to. The court overruled a demurrer to this defense, placing its decision on two general grounds: First, that the special court-house commission which constructed the building, and the committee which has charge of it, were independent bodies, and not the agents or servants of the city, and hence that the city was not liable for their negligence; second, that even if the city had controlled the construction and custody of the building, it would, in so doing, have been performing merely a governmental duty for the benefit of the public, for any negligence in the performance of which no private action would lie. The decision might perhaps be sustained on either ground, but, as we are clearly of opinion that the second is well taken, it is unnecessary to consider the first.

The common-law rule is that no private action can be maintained against a municipal corporation for the neglect of a public duty imposed upon it by law for the benefit of the public, and from the performance of which the corporation receives no pecuniary profit. As respects what are sometimes called "quasi municipal corporations," such as counties, townships, and school districts, this is the rule everywhere, without exception. But as respects what are called "municipal corporations proper," such as cities and incorporated villages, the general current of the authorities is to the effect that, even in the absence of an express statute, they may be impliedly liable for acts of misfeasance or neglect of duty on the part of its officers and agents, while for the same or a similar wrong there is no such liability resting on quasi municipal corporations. The most noted and familiar instance of this is the different rule applied to towns and counties as respects liability for negligence in not keeping highways in repair, and that applied to incorporated cities for negligence in failing to keep streets in repair. But respecting the principle upon which to rest this distinction, or as to the nature of the duties to which it extends, the courts seem to be much perplexed, and their decisions, often in conflict with each other, leave the subject in some confusion. The ground for the distinction is not to be found in the mere fact that one is created by special charter, while the other is not, for both are alike subdivisions of the state, created for public, although local, governmental purposes. Nor is it to be found in the fact that the one is given greater powers than the other, unless the power is, not for public governmental purposes, but to engage in some enterprise of a quasi private nature, from which the municipality will derive a pecuniary benefit in its corporate or proprietary capacity; as, for example, power to build gasworks or waterworks, to furnish gas or water to be sold to consumers, or to build a toll bridge, from each of which the city would derive a revenue. In this class of cases it is generally held that corporations are liable for wrongful or negligent acts, because done in what is termed their "private" or "corporate" character, and not in their public capacity as governing agencies, in the discharge of duties imposed for the public or general benefit. But it is also generally held that they are not liable for negligence in the performance of a public, governmental duty imposed upon them for public benefit, and from which the municipality in its corporate or proprietary capacity derives no pecuniary profit. The liability of cities for negligence in not keeping streets in repair would seem to be an exception to this general rule, which we think the courts would do better to rest either upon certain special considerations of public policy or upon the doctrine of stare decisis than to attempt to find some strictly legal principle to justify the distinction. And, as already suggested, as to what are public and governmental duties and what are private or corporate duties the courts are not in entire harmony, and their decisions do not furnish a definite line of cleavage between the two. Nor shall we attempt to fix any such line of universal application. For a quite full discussion of the subject, see Dillon on Municipal Corporations, chap. 23; and for an exhaustive review of the authorities, see Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332. In Doddall v. Olmsted County, 80 Minn. 96, 44 Am. Rep. 185, we held that a county is not liable for the negligence of its board of county commissioners in failing to repair a court-house, the duty of maintaining a court-house being a public one, and for a wholly public purpose. In Bryant v. St. Paul, 83 Minn. 289, 58 Am. Rep. 31, we held that the city was not liable for the negligence of the board of health in the discharge of its duties, the same being public and governmental, and not corporate, in their character. And, for a like reason, in Grube v. St. Paul, 84 Minn. 402, we held that the city was not liable for the negligent acts of members of its fire department. We fail to discover any distinction in the character in this respect of the duty performed by the city in maintaining a board of health, a fire department, or a police department, and that performed in providing and maintaining a city hall for the use of the public officers of the city. The city, in its private or corporate capacity, derives no more pecuniary benefit from the one than it does from the others, and in each case alike the purpose is a public and governmental one. The duty which a city performs in providing a city hall for the use of the public officers of the city is exactly the same in its nature as that performed by a county in providing a court-house for the use of the county officers. The inconsistency of holding that the county of Ramsey is not liable (as must be, under the Doddall Case), but that the city is, would be forcibly illustrated by the special facts of this case. Our conclusion is that the city is not liable.

Order affirmed.

Henry L. SELICK

v.

LAKE SHORE & MICHIGAN SOUTHERN R. CO., Appt.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The obstruction of a railroad crossing by a freight train for a time longer than the statute allows may be a concurrent cause with smoke, steam, and noise of another train in frightening a team which is waiting to cross and render the railroad company liable for the damages thus occasioned where the team would not have been frightened by the other train if it had not been concealed from view by the freight train which obstructed the crossing.
2. Whether a freight train obstructing a highway crossing did or did not give to the noise, steam, and smoke of another passing train a character which they would not possess in the absence of the obstruction so as to make a concurrent cause of the frightening of a team, is a question for the jury where there is evidence that the team was accustomed to trains.

3. The question whether or not the result could have been anticipated is not the test of liability for an act which is negligence per se, but the person guilty of it is equally liable for its consequences whether he could have foreseen them or not.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Branch E County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George C. Greene and O. G. Getzen-Danner, with Mr. C. E. Weaver, for appellant.

NOTE.—Liability of a railroad company for obstructing a highway crossing.

A railroad company is subject to indictment for unreasonably obstructing a highway crossing. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 4 L. R. A. 298, 77 Iowa, 442; Com. v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 112 Mass. 412; State v. Morris & E. B. Co. 23 N. J. L. 360; State v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Tenn.) April 28, 1892; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. State, 3 Head, 523, 75 Am. Dec. 778; *State v. In some states the statutes have fixed five minutes as the limit of time for which obstruction shall be allowed by cars. Com. v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. supra; Young v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 56 Mich. 430.

A rule of the company against obstructing a highway more than five minutes is no defense to an indictment of the company if its employees violate the rule by obstructing it for an unreasonable 18 L. R. A.

time (in this case from twenty to thirty minutes). State v. Louisville & N. R. Co. supra.

Nor is it any defense to an indictment for obstructing the highway longer than the statute permits that the occupation was accidental and unavoidable and that due diligence was used to remove the obstruction. Com. v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. supra.

Nor is it any defense to an indictment for such obstruction to a highway that it was necessary for carrying on the railroad company's business and that such obstruction was only occasional. The necessity or convenience of such obstruction by a railroad company cannot be considered. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra.

A railroad company is liable for the injuries caused to an individual by such wrongful obstruction. Young v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. supra.

Damages are recoverable by a person for detention by cars allowed to stand across a highway for

Messrs. Campbell & Johnson, with Mr. Jno. B. Shipman, for appellee:

The cause of the fright was a proper question for the jury to whom it was submitted by the trial court, and who found it was not the steam and smoke of the passenger train but the freight cars which frightened the team. We are not able to believe that this court as a matter of law will decide that fact "in opposition to the finding of twelve men of vaster and more varied experience and with greater opportunities of knowledge than the court possesses."

Smith v. Sherwood Twp. 62 Mich. 159.

If these freight cars, while unlawfully obstructing the highway, were the cause of the horses becoming frightened, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover.

Malby v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 52 Mich. 108.

The fact of an intervening innocent cause producing the mischief does not settle the question of whether the original wrong was the proximate cause or not.

Some authorities hold that an intermediate responsible cause relieves the first actor from responsibility, but how this circumstance can break the chain of causation is not made clear. However, the majority of the cases is the other way.

Thomp. Neg. 1085, and cases in note 2.

The intervening cause in this case was set in motion by the original wrongdoer, and the defendant was directly in fault for the plaintiff's exposure to it.

What frightened the horses is a question of fact and not of law.

If the original act was wrongful and would naturally, according to the ordinary course of events, prove injurious to some other person or persons, and does actually result in injury through the intervention of other causes which are not wrongful, the injury shall be referred to the wrongful cause passing by those which were innocent.

Cooley, Torts, 70; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 38.

Whoever does an illegal act is answerable for all the consequences he immediately and directly brought about by the intervening agency of others, provided the intervening agents were set in motion by the primary wrongdoer, or, provided their acts causing the damage were the necessary or legal and natural consequences of the original wrongful act.

In Rauch v. Lloyd, 31 Pa. 358, 72 Am. Dec. 747, a highway was obstructed for about half an hour by a train of cars which ran for part of the trip by gravitation and was drawn by horses the rest of the way. The railroad belonged to the state and the regulations made the conductor the representative of the owners of the train for the trip. During the conductor's absence a teamster started the cars and injured a boy who was attempting to cross under the cars and the owner of the train was held liable.

In case of a dispute as to facts the question whether a crossing is obstructed or not is for the jury. Young v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 66 Mich. 430; Peterson v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 64 Mich. 621.

1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 82.

McGrath, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a case for negligence. Plaintiff, a bus driver, was en route for the depot with two passengers. Three railway tracks crossed the street near the depot. A freight train occupied one of these tracks, and obstructed the street for over twenty minutes. The conductor of the freight had gone to dinner. Plaintiff halted his team some three or four rods south of the tracks, and waited from ten to fifteen minutes for the freight to get out of the way, or to make a cut so that he might pass. While waiting, a passenger train came along on one of the tracks north of the track occupied by the freight train, enveloping the freight train at the crossing in smoke and steam. Plaintiff's horses became frightened, backed away, overturned the bus and ran away, throwing plaintiff out and injuring him. The horses were ordinarily gentle, and were used to running trains as well as to standing cars, and had not before that time taken fright at either. This is the second appearance of the case in this court. On the former appeal, this court held (Selleck v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 58 Mich. 195) that, while the declaration alleged that the horses were frightened, and the injury occasioned by carelessly and negligently causing the passenger engine to exhaust great quantities of steam and noise, the plaintiff had failed to give any evidence in support of the allegation of wrong to which he had by his declaration attributed the injury. Plaintiff amended his declaration, and now alleges that "defendant did then and there, by their said cars and train, obstruct the said public highway for more than five minutes at one time, to wit, at said time; that is to say, they negligently and unlawfully obstructed it for more than five minutes immediately preceding the time when the plaintiff reached the spot as aforesaid, with their said cars and train, and at a time when the west-bound passenger train run by the defendants over said road would arrive and depart from said depot, passing over the track on the north side of said freight train, and the engine drawing the same would exhaust great quantities of steam, and thereby, with its whistle and bell, make a great noise, and, the wind blowing fresh from the north, the smoke and steam from the passing engine would be driven south over the said freight train, carelessly and negligently and wantonly neglecting to cut the train and open a passage along said highway across said track at any time during said period of over twenty minutes, but wrongfully left the cars and train standing on the track across the said highway during all that time, totally blockading and preventing travel thereon during all of said period, well knowing people would need to use the street at said time in going to the depot, with and without teams and wagons, to meet the west-bound passenger train over said railroad; and also knowing that the blockage of said highway, as aforesaid, under the circumstances as aforesaid, made it an unsafe and dangerous place for teams to be caught in." It is insisted by defendant that the present case is ruled by the decision upon the former hearing, and stress is laid upon that part of the opinion in which the court says: "The plaintiff has not, by his declaration, attributed his injury to the illegal detention, and, if he had, it would have been idle, for the particular injury of which he complained, namely, the fright and running away of his horses, could not have flowed from that detention as a proximate cause." The court had already disposed of the first allegation of wrong, viz., that the defendant had negligently obstructed the street, and had eliminated that allegation from their consideration; but the trial court had instructed the jury that, if the plaintiff had been unavoidably detained, and by reason of that detention, and while waiting, the team became frightened by surroundings, in consequence of which plaintiff was injured, the defendant was liable. It was with reference to this instruction that this court used the language upon which stress is laid by defendant. It is not alleged or claimed that the fright and runaway were occasioned by the illegal detention as the proximate cause, but by the obstruction which caused the detention. That opinion was written by Mr. Justice Cooley, and filed at the June term, 1885; but in the case of Young v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 56 Mich. 430, 438, in an opinion filed at the April term of the same year, and concurred in by Mr. Justice Cooley, speaking for the court, Mr. Justice Champlin says: "If it be conceded that teams could be driven through the opening left by defendant between its cars and across the plank crossing without coming in contact with the rail of the main track, yet, if the freight car obstructed the traveled track, and by reason of such obstruction caused the plaintiff's horse to sheer off so as to throw one runner of the cutter against the rail of the main track, the horse being one of ordinary gentleness, such conceded facts would present a proper question for the jury to determine,—whether the injury resulted from leaving the freight car in that position, and whether plaintiff's husband was in the exercise of ordinary care while driving the horse. No railroad company has the right to obstruct a public highway with its cars an unreasonable length of time, and, as before stated, the Legislature has enacted that this shall not in any one instance exceed five minutes. The liability arises from the duty of the company to leave the traveled part of the highway unobstructed after the expiration of the rea-reasonable time limited by law. A violation of this duty is negligence, and, if a party is injured by reason thereof, being free from fault on his part, wrong and injury concur, and the liability attaches. . . . We can only apply the law to those facts. The shying of the horse was the result of the act of the defendant in obstructing the highway. If the car was lawfully there, and defendant had not violated any duty at the time, no liability would have attached, for the reason that, although injury might have arisen from the shying of the horse, the defendant had been guilty of no wrongful or negligent act which concurred in producing the injury." In the present case there was no intervening cause. The obstruction of the highway was a continuous breach of duty. It was a cause operating at the time of the injury. The smoke and steam were concurrent, rather than intervening, causes. They were contemporaneous. They enveloped and environed the freight train and produced a condition of the cars. It was for the jury to say whether the fright of the horses was caused by the appearance of the freight cars, surrounded as they were. Again, if the team was frightened by the noise and steam and smoke under the circumstances, it was for the jury to say, under testimony clearly tending to show that the team was used to passing trains and their attendant incidents, whether it was not the presence of the freight train across the highway, obscuring the origin of the steam and smoke and noise, that was the cause of the fright and injury. The wrongful act had not ceased to operate.

In the recent case of Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Robinson, 50 Fed. Rep. 810, 2 U. S. App. 205, the company had permitted one of its wires to remain suspended across a public highway, a few feet from the ground, and plaintiff came in contact with it during an electrical storm, and was injured by a discharge of electricity, which had been attracted from the atmosphere. The court held that, since the electricity would have been harmless except for the wire, the defendant was liable. "If," it is said, "the electric fluid with which the wire of the telephone company was charged at the time was an element, or the main element, in the production of the injuries to the plaintiff, still it is clear that the displaced wire furnished the means of the communication of the dangerous force which resulted in the injury. . . . To say that the agency of the telephone wire in the production of the injury was inferior to that of the electric current, which was the main cause, is not satisfactory. It is, in fact, to admit that the company's displaced wire furnished the means by which the dangerous force was communicated to and injured the defendant in error. True, it was a new force of power which intervened, with the production of which the telephone company had nothing to do; but upon this point, in Louisiana Msh. Ins. Co. v. Tweed, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 52, 19 L. ed. 67, the court says: 'If a new force or power has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of misfortune, the other must be considered as too remote.' The new force or power here would have been harmless but for the displaced wire, and the fact that the wire took on a new force, with the creation of which the company was not responsible, yet it contributed no less directly to the injury on that account." There the wire furnished the means of communication. Here it was a question for the jury to determine whether the cars did not give to the noise and steam and smoke a character which, as to this team, they did not possess in the absence of the obstruction. It was for the jury to say whether the new forces would or would not have been harmless except for the presence of the obstruction. In the case of Grimes v. Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co., 3 Ind. App. 573, recently determined, the rule is laid down that, "when two causes combine to produce an injury, both of which are proximate in their character,—the one being the result of culpable negligence, and the other an occurrence as to which neither party is at fault,—the negligent party is liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for such negligence." A large number of authorities are cited which support the doctrine. The rule is followed in North Manchester Tri-County Agr. Assn. v. Wilcox (Ind. App.) 80 N. E. Rep. 202.

In Campbell v. Stillwater, 32 Minn. 308, 50 Am. Rep. 567, it is said that, "when several concurring acts or conditions of things—one of them the wrongful act of defendant—produce the injury, and it would not have been produced but for such wrongful act or omission, such act or omission is the proximate cause of the injury." In Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (sec. 39) the authors say: "It is universally agreed that, if the damage is caused by the concurring force of the defendant's negligence and some other cause, for which he is not responsible, including the 'act of God,' or superior human force directly intervening, the defendant is nevertheless responsible if his negligence is one of the proximate causes of the damages, within the definition already given. It is also agreed that, if the negligence of the defendant concurs with the other cause of the injury in point of time and place, or otherwise so directly contributes to the plaintiff's damage that it is reasonably certain that the other cause alone would not have sufficed to produce it, the defendant is liable, notwithstanding he may not have anticipated, or been bound to anticipate, the interference of the superior force which, concurring with his own negligence, produced the damage." But if the superior force would have produced the same damage, whether the defendant had been negligent or not, his negligence is not deemed the cause of the injury." In Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Reaney, 42 Md. 117, Alvey, J., says: "The efficient and predominating cause in producing a given event or effect, though there may be subordinate and dependent causes in operation, must be looked into in determining the rights and liabilities of the parties concerned."

The rule laid down by Mr. Cooley in his work on Torts (page 76) is that, "if the original act was wrongful, and would naturally, according to the ordinary course of events, prove injurious to some other person or persons, and does actually result in injury through the intervention of other causes which are not wrongful, the injury shall be referred to the wrongful cause, passing by those which were innocent." In the note to page 78 the same author says: "It is equally true that no wrongdoer ought to be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong; and that, as a loss has actually happened while his own wrongful act was in force and operation, he ought to be permitted to set up as a defense that there was a more immediate cause of the loss, if that cause was put in operation by his own wrongful act. To entitle such party to exemption, he must show, not only that the same loss might have happened, but that it must have happened if the act complained of had not been done,"—citing Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716.

In the present case, while the passenger train was not put in operation by the act of obstruction, both trains were operated by defendant, and it was for the jury to determine whether the presence of the obstruction did not give a different color and character to the other operations, and convert otherwise harmless incidents into fear-exciting agencies, and whether the presence of the obstructing cars did not produce the effect which caused the fright, the runaway, and the injury.

In 2 Thompson, Negligence, 1084, it is said that "whoever does a wrongful act is answerable for all the consequences that may ensue in the ordinary and natural course of events, though such consequences be immediately and directly brought about by intervening causes, if such intervening causes were set in motion by the original wrongdoer." It is insisted that the result was not one that could have been anticipated, but that is not the test of liability in cases like the present. The question what a reasonable man might foresee is of importance in determining the question of negligence, but when the act complained of is negligence per se, the person guilty of it is equally liable for its consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not. Smith v. London & S. W. R. Co. supra; Grimes v. Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. L. R. 6 C. P. 21; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. supra.

The trial court properly submitted the question of the proximate cause to the jury, and we find no error in his instructions. It is unnecessary to discuss the other questions raised. Upon an examination of them, we do not discover any prejudicial error.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs to plaintiff.

The other Justices concurred.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Frank GOSNELL, Trustee for James W. Flack, Appt.,

v.

David Hudson FLACK et al., Adms., etc., of Thomas J. Flack, Deceased.

(.....Md.)

As against a trustee in insolvency as well as the insolvent a debt of the latter to a decedent's estate incurred while administrator thereof may be set off against his distributive share therein.

(December 2, 1892.)

A PPEAL from an order of the Orphans' Court of Baltimore City directing the amount due to James W. Flack as a distributee of the estate of Thomas J. Flack, deceased, to be set off against indebtedness which he had contracted to the estate while acting as administrator thereof. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., and Bryan, Roberts, Fowler, Briscoe, and McSherry, JJ. Messrs. Thomas M. Lanahan and Frank Gosnell for appellant.

Messrs. S. T. Wallis and William E. Hoffman, for appellees:

The indebtedness of a legatee or distributee constitutes assets of the estate, which it is the executor's or administrator's duty to collect for the benefit of the creditors, legatees, and distributees. Hence such indebtedness may be deducted from any legacy or distributive share of the debtor.

2 Woerner, Administrators, § 564.

The right to deduct or set off the debt of a distributee against his share of the estate has been settled in this state.

Eq. 135; Strong v. Bass, 35 Pa. 333; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. of Law, p. 816, note.

The appellant contended below that James W. Flack had a legal estate in his distributive share of the estate, and his debt could not, therefore, be set off. This contention, however, is not supported by law.

The administrator of an estate holds the legal title to the estate and is a trustee for the creditors, distributees, and all parties interested therein.

A legatee, distributee, or creditor, takes his rights through the administrator.

Hagthorp v. Hook, 1 Gill & J. 270; State v. Greenwell, 4 Gill & J. 414.

McSherry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1874, Thomas J. Flack died intestate, leaving a widow, several children, and some grandchildren surviving him. Administration upon his estate was granted to James W. Flack, his eldest son. Henry H. Flack and David Hudson Flack, two of his other sons, were indebted to their father in large amounts. These debts remaining unpaid, and Henry H. and David Hudson Flack becoming indebted also unto their brother, James W. conveyed to him, in 1877, by a deed absolute upon its face, certain valuable real estate owned by them, and know as the "Canton Property" or the "Distillery Property." At the same time there was also executed and acknowledged by the grantors and the grantee, in the deed referred to, an agreement in writing, setting forth the purposes for which the deed had been executed, and providing for the application to be made of the purchase money arising from a sale of the Canton property, when a sale thereof should be made by James W. Flack. The deed was at once placed upon record, but the agreement never was. James W. Flack, as administrator, stated several accounts in the orphans' court between the date of his appointment and the middle of October, 1883. During all that time, and until 1890, he collected rents belonging to the estate of his father, and expended thereof upwards of $12,000 upon the Canton property for taxes, repairs, and other purposes. In 1890, having become heavily involved and insolvent, he executed a deed of trust for the benefit of his creditors to Frank Gosnell, Esq.; and on the 9th of November, in the same year, his letters of administration were revoked by the orphans' court, and David Hudson Flack and William E. Hoffman, Esq., were appointed administrators in his stead. Mr. Gosnell claimed that the Canton property passed to him under the deed of trust; but the administrators of Thomas J. Flack disputed this, and filed a bill in the circuit court for Baltimore county against Mr. Gosnell and sundry creditors of James W. Flack, alleging that, under the limitations and provisions contained in the unrecorded agreement, James W. Flack held the title to the Canton property in trust to secure the indebtedness due by Henry H. Flack and David Hudson Flack to the estate of their father, Thomas J. Flack, and praying that the trustees of James W. Flack be restrained by injunction from making sale of the property. In that case this court decided—Hoffman v. Gosnell (Md.) 24 Atl. Rep. 28, (not yet officially reported)—that the unrecorded declaration of trust could not operate to the prejudice of James W. Flack's creditors, who became such in good faith, and in ignorance of its existence, and that the administrators were not at liberty to set up any secret equity to the exclusion of those creditors, but that they (the administrators) were entitled "to share pari passu with the other creditors in the distribution of the proceeds of the property."

In March, 1892, James W. Flack, in obedience to the order passed when his letters were revoked, propounded his seventh account in the orphans' court, and in that account he charged the estate of his father with the sum of $13,494.06 for expenses on the Canton property and for excess of interest. This charge was excepted to by one of the distributees of Thomas J. Flack. A hearing was had before the orphans' court, and in April, 1892, the exception was sustained, and the register of wills was directed to state another account, omitting that charge altogether. This was done in June following. The new seventh account was sworn to by James W. Flack, and he was shown to stand indebted to the estate in the sum of $13,425.84. The new administrators had in the mean time stated an account, distributing the proceeds of a sale made by them of certain leasehold property belonging to the estate of Thomas J. Flack, but retained in their hands the sum of $2,851.79, the amount distributable to James W. Flack. Subsequently they filed a petition, and the orphans' court passed an order thereon fixing a day for making distribution of this sum, and ordered notice to be given. On the day appointed some of the distributees filed a petition, praying that the above-named sum should be distributed to them, and insisting that no part of it should be paid over to James W. Flack, or to any person claiming under him. Mr. Gosnell appeared and answered, and claimed that the share of James W. Flack in his father's estate, and amounting, as above stated, to $2,851.79, was payable to him, the trustee, under the deed of trust, and was not liable to be applied in reducing the alleged indebtedness of the former administrator to the estate. Evidence was adduced, and, after a hearing, the orphans' court of Baltimore city passed an order dated July 19, 1892, directing the administrators, to credit upon James W. Flack's indebtedness of $13,425.84, due to his father's estate, the sum of $2,851.79, which would otherwise have been payable to him or his trustee, and to distribute the latter sum among the other distributees. From this order Mr. Gosnell, the trustee of James W. Flack, has appealed.

It will be seen from this outline of the previous and the pending litigation between these parties that the question now involved, and upon which we are required to pass, is whether, under the circumstances stated, the distributive share of James W. Flack in his father's estate, and now in the hands of the new administrators of that estate, is liable to be set out by them against the alleged debt due by him to his father's estate; or whether Mr. Gosnell, as his trustee, is entitled to receive that share. The right of an administrator to retain from the share of a distributee the amount due by the latter to the intestate out of whose estate he is entitled to a share is undeniably clear. Smith v. Donnell, 9 Gill, 84; Manning v. Thruston, 59 Md. 218. And we think it equally clear that this right exists where the debt has been incurred to the estate itself by the distributee as administrator after the decedent's death. 2 Woerner, Administrators, § 564. The first proposition has been the settled law of Maryland for many years, and the second may be said to be a necessary consequence of the other. There is nothing in the recent cases of Devries v. Hiss, 72 Md. 560, and Flack v. Gosnell (Md.) 24 Atl. Rep. 414, (not yet officially reported,) at all in conflict with these conclusions. Indeed, the principle which underlies those cases has no application to this. They hold that a legal estate owned or acquired by a trustee is not liable to be intercepted by a court of equity to make good trust funds misappropriated by the trustee. But it does not follow from this doctrine that a distributee who is himself a debtor to the estate can claim and receive his distributive share, and at the same time escape the payment of the debt he owes. If this were permissible he would, as stated in Devries v. Hiss, receive not only his full share, but that share augmented by the amount of his indebtedness. It would be contrary to the plainest principles of justice to allow an administrator who is also a distributee, and who is indebted to the decedent, or who by reason of a subsequent defalcation becomes indebted to the estate, to escape the payment of his indebtedness if he happened to be insolvent, and besides that to receive his full, unabated, distributive share. In such a case there is no question of impounding or intercepting a legal estate to satisfy in equity a delinquent trustee's malversations. It is merely an application of the doctrine of set-off. A court of equity could not, and much more certainly could not the orphans' court limited as its powers are, seize of a debtor's legal estate, not under its control and not subject to its jurisdiction, and impound that legal estate to satisfy a debt due to the trust estate being administered by either tribunal. That principle is widely different from the one which must be applied here. Here no legal estate had vested in the distributee in the first instance so indefeasibly as to exclude the administrator's right of set-off. The right to a distributive share is subordinate from the beginning to the distributee's indebtedness to the estate. If he is charged with the indebtedness, as he should be, he can only receive in the way of a distributive share what remains after deducting that indebtedness. In other words, his right to claim any portion of the estate is limited to that portion, if any, which is in excess of what he owes to that estate. This view is fully supported by the adjudged cases to which we have referred. Mr. Gosnell, the trustee of James W. Flack, stands in the latter's place, and is entitled to no greater or other rights than his grantor could himself have asserted had the deed of trust not been made.

The only remaining inquiry is, Was James W. Flack indebted to his father's estate in an amount equal to his distributive share? This can be briefly answered. When the administrator's seventh account was excepted to, one of the objections was that he had improperly charged the estate with $13,494.06, for expenses on the Canton property and for excess of interest. This exception was sustained, and the charge was disallowed by an order of the orphans' court dated April 7, 1892, whereby James W. Flack was brought in debt to the estate to that amount, and a new seventh account was directed to be stated upon this basis. No appeal was taken from that order, and on the 7th of June following the new seventh account was stated and sworn to by James W. Flack, whereby he showed his indebtedness to the estate to be $13,425.84. No appeal, as has just been stated, was ever taken from the order of April 7th, and the adjudication thus made, after a full hearing, has never been reversed.

But, beyond this, it appears with clearness that the title to the Canton property stood in the name of James W. Flack after the conveyance to him in 1877. He was the ostensible owner, and, so far as the records disclosed, the actual and sole owner, of the property. Upon the faith of that apparent ownership, he obtained credit, and his creditors have, under our former decision, a right to be paid their claims out of the proceeds of its sale. Its present value depends in a large measure upon the fact that the property was kept in repair, and it was kept in repair by the expenditure upon it of the money of Thomas J. Flack's estate. Those expenditures were made chiefly by James W. Flack, the then administrator. He thus improved his own property by expending thereon part of the assets of his father's estate. He is therefore obviously bound to refund to that estate the amount thus applied. In the face of these facts, and with the decision of the orphans' court on the same subject unappealed from and unreversed, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that he is a debtor to his father's estate. Entertaining these views, we must affirm the order appealed from.

Order affirmed, with costs.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

Jennie McHugh BROWN, Respt.,

v.

1. A change of grade of a street which will make the property of an abutting owner less valuable to sell or rent although to make it conform to that established by ordinance before such owner acquired the property and although a portion of the property does not abut directly on the street but on an alley opening into it, is within a constitutional provision that no private property shall be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation having been first made or paid into court for the owner.
2. An injunction against the change of grade of a street without making compensation for the damage required by a Constitution which prohibits private property to be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation having been first made or paid into court, may be granted in favor of an abutting owner where the change will seriously reduce both the rental and selling value of his property.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for King county in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin the grading of a certain street until the damages which would be thereby caused to plaintiff by injury to her property had been paid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. H. Piles, Charles F. Munday, George Donworth, and James B. Howe, for appellants:

The article of our Constitution in question does not rescue from the category of damnum absque injuria mere consequential injuries to the owner resulting from discomfort, inconvenience, loss of business and the like.

McMahon v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 827; Loris v. North Chicago City R. Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 270; 3 Suth. Damages, pp. 453, 454, note 2, 455, 458; Rude v. St. Louis, 12 West. Rep. 238, 93 Mo. 403.

At common law and independent of the constitutional provisions plaintiff would not be entitled to recover for any damages to her property by reason of the improvement contemplated.

Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 93-97; Smith v. Washington, 61 U. S. 20 How. 185, 15 L. ed. 858; Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 336; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 685, 4th ed. §§ 989, 990.

The abutting owner, as against the city, has no right to lateral support of the soil of the street, and can acquire none through prescription or lapse of time.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 991, and notes; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 101; Loris v. North Chicago City R. Co. supra.

Had Jefferson street been condemned instead of dedicated the following rule laid down in the case of Dearborn v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 24 N. H. 179, and referred to in Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 565, would have been of controlling force, viz.: "The damages awarded by the commissioners must be regarded as a full compensation for all the injury which the landowner may sustain, then or at any future time, from any cause which the commissioners were bound, or had a right, to consider; so that it can never afterwards be made a question whether, in fact, the commissioners have or have not considered any particular cause of damage legitimate for their consideration."

The city would acquire the same rights with reference to the street when the street is dedicated as when it is condemned.

That changes might be required must be presumed to have been contemplated when the land was taken and devoted to the purpose of a street, as incident to the enjoyment of the easement which was then acquired.

Henderson v. Minneapolis, 32 Minn. 819.

The dedicator must be presumed to have known that at some time it would become necessary to establish a grade on Jefferson street and to open said street for travel and in so doing to cut below or fill above the natural surface of the ground.

He was willing to dedicate the street to the public and suffer the inconvenience of a cut or fill and to receive as compensation therefor the increased benefit to his remaining property by having the convenience of a public highway.

Fellows v. New Haven, 44 Conn. 240, 26 Am. Rep. 447; Montgomery v. Townsend, 80 Ala. 489, 60 Am. Rep. 116.

Changes in the natural surface of the ground,—excavations and embankments necessary to render the street safe and convenient,—are the natural and probable consequences of the uses and purposes for which the land was originally taken, and the compensation then awarded, or in case of dedication for which the owner received compensation in the resultant advantages.

Montgomery v. Townsend, supra; Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 118, 2 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 465; Lancashire & Y. R. Co. v. Evans, 15 Beav. 322; Laurence v. Great Northern R. Co. 16 Q. B. 648; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 995a.

Benefits arising from the grading of a street are to be offset against any damages, consequential or otherwise, accruing to the abutting property owner, regardless of its assessment to pay for the improvement.

Messrs. Burke, Shepard & Woods, with Mr. Thomas R. Shepard, for appellee:

The earlier constitutions of the several states of the Union contain, with one or two exceptions, a provision that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation."

NOTE.—For note on injury to abutter's easements of light, air and access by vacating street, changing grade, etc., see Selden v. Jacksonville (Fla.) 14 L. R. A. 370.

It became the fixed judicial construction of these constitutional provisions that they would apply only to cases where there was an actual taking or physical invasion of the tangible subject of the property—the thing itself.

Sedgwick Stat. & Const. L. 2d ed. pp. 456–458, 462, 463; Cushman v. Smith, 84 Me. 247; Selden v. Jacksonville, 14 L. R. A. 370, and note, 28 Fla. 558.

This was the mischief for which a further remedy was to be sought. In 1870 the state of Illinois, in its revised Constitution then adopted, led off in a movement to provide a new remedy for the old mischief still remaining. Its Constitution of 1870, art. 2, § 13, provided that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation."

Other states adopted the same provision.

Where a constitutional or statutory enactment has been borrowed by one of our states from another after it had received judicial interpretation in that other, it should be treated in the state adopting it as bearing the meaning which that interpretation elsewhere had applied to it.

Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 530; Atty. Gen. v. Brunst, 8 Wis. 787; Com. v. Hartnett, 8 Gray, 450; Poertner v. Russell, 33 Wis. 193.

The courts in the other states adopting this later form of the constitutional guaranty have uniformly viewed the new words "or damaged" (or their equivalent) as broadening the right of compensation so as to include other cases than that of an actual taking or physical invasion of the subject of the property; and while the courts have not in terms formulated and generalized the new rule, there has been a growing tendency to hold, in effect, that it subjects the public and the agencies of the public to the same rule of liability as would rest upon a private individual for damage done to another's property when not acting under statutory authority.

The public are bound to compensate for impairment of the access to abutting property, or of the use of the street in connection with abutting property, by a change of grade in a street or by other change made in the street or in the use thereof.

Pekin v. Brereton, 67 Ill. 477, 16 Am. Rep. 629; Elgin v. Eaton, 83 Ill. 535, 25 Am. Rep. 412; Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64; Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Chicago, 26 Fed. Rep. 415; Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638; New Brighton v. United Presby. Church, 96 Pa. 331; Pusey v. Allegheny, 98 Pa. 522; Chambers v. South Chester, 140 Pa. 510, 4 Am. R. R. & Corp. Rep. 273; Montgomery v. Maddox, 89 Ala. 181, overruling Montgomery v. Townsend, 80 Ala. 489; McElroy v. Kansas City, 21 Fed. Rep. 257; Werth v. Springfield, 78 Mo. 107; Householder v. Kansas City, 88 Mo. 488; Rear-don v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 56 Am. Rep. 109; Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 221–227; 25 Am. L. Rev. 924.

The modern and progressive view adopted in these judicial interpretations of the later form of the constitutional mandate has affected the course of judicial decision to some extent 18 L. R. A.

even in a state where a provision requiring compensation only in case of a taking still remains unaltered.

All these decisions both those in the states that have revised their constitutions and in the state of New York, hold that the owner of land abutting on a public way has certain rights in the enjoyment of that way in connection with his property which are incidental to his land and thus are specially his own, distinct from the general right of the public to the enjoyment of the use of the public way. The right of access to and from the street is the chief, and indeed the basis, of the peculiar rights incidental to the private estate.

Stiles, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to enjoin to city of Seattle from grading down that part of Jefferson street, in that city, lying between Eighth street and the alley, between and parallel with Seventh and Eighth streets, until just compensation to the plaintiff for the injury to result from such grading to her abutting real property should have been first ascertained and made or paid into court for her benefit. E. T. Smart, with whom the city had made a contract to do the grading in question, was joined as a defendant. The court below, after trial, found in respondent's favor, and granted the injunction sought. The respondent's property consists of three lots, each 80×120 feet in size, Nos. 2, 3, 4, block 59. Terry's first addition to Seattle. Lots 2 and 3 fronted on Eighth street, and lot 2 fronts on Jefferson street. Lot 4 fronts on Seventh street, 60 feet from Jefferson. Each of the lots has the alley in its rear. The streets named are each 66 feet in width, and the alley is 16 feet in width. In 1869 the plat of the addition was filed for record, and the streets and alleys were thereby dedicated to the public use. The respondent derives title to her lots from the maker of the plat, from whom she bought them in 1874, while they were unimproved, with the exception that there was a small house on lot 4. In 1863 the city, by ordinance No. 484, established the grade elevation of Jefferson street at heights above the city datum line as follows: At the intersection with Sixth street, 175½ feet; at Seventh street, 261 feet; at Eighth street, 304 feet. For the cross streets the ordinance required that there should be a uniform and continuous rate of grade between each two adjacent street intersections, provided that no grade line was established between Sixth and Seventh streets. In 1887 the grade line at Seventh street was changed to 265 feet. In 1888 and 1889 respondent erected, on her lots 2 and 3, three cottages fronting on Eighth street, to which there is access from Eighth street at their front, and from Jefferson street, by way of the alley, at their rear. She also erected a double house fronting on Jefferson street, between Eighth street and the alley, its front standing within 6 feet of Jefferson street, and its west side within 4 feet of the alley; and also a house facing on the alley, occupying a part of the rear end of lot 8. For these houses she had been receiving a total rental of $287 per month. Seventh street was graded down in 1887-88, so that the access to the house located on lot 4 is by an ascent of thirty-two steps. The alley has heretofore been used as the most convenient means of access to all the property for delivering heavy supplies. On April 14, 1890, the common council, acting under section 8 of the city charter of 1886, (Stat. 1885-86, p. 241,) without petition from property owners, ordered that Jefferson street be graded from Third street to Broadway, (which is beyond Eighth street,) by unanimous vote. The natural level of Jefferson street at Seventh street is 267 6-10 feet; at the alley, 292 6-100 feet; and at Eighth street, 312 38-100 feet. The grade proposed would leave a street with an ascending grade from Seventh to Eighth street of about 15 25-100 per cent, which is not greatly different from the general ascent of the natural surface; but, owing to the elevations at which Seventh and Eighth streets have been fixed, it will become necessary, in order to make the new grade continuous and uniform between the two streets, to excavate the width of the street to a depth which at Eighth street would be, according to the established grade, 8 38-100 feet, and at the alley something like 17 feet. This arrangement would, of course, leave the respondent's lots just that much above the street when the improvement is completed, and the alley would be no longer available for any of its natural purposes until further improvements had been made upon it. The city, however, claims that under its modified proposition the cut at Eighth street will be reduced to 2 38-100 feet, and at the alley to something over 14 feet. Terrace street, on the opposite side of the block from Jefferson street, has already been graded down, so that the alley at that end terminated in a drop of 5 or 6 feet. From Third street to Seventh street, the change in elevation is just 200 feet, being within a fraction of 20 per cent. A large proportion of this elevation, however, occurs between Sixth and Seventh streets, where the difference in elevation is 85 5-10 feet, or more than 33 per cent. It is conceded that this fact makes it impracticable to use Jefferson street between Sixth and Seventh for any ordinary street purposes excepting foot passage. It is also conceded that between Seventh and Eighth streets Jefferson street was impassable in its natural condition for teams, excepting a portion of the distance westward from Eighth street. It also appears that the proposed grade between Seventh and Eighth streets will be no steeper than that of several other streets which are traveled by teams in the city of Seattle.

Evidence was taken by both parties upon the question whether or not the plaintiff's property would be injured by the proposed cutting down of the street. The result of that evidence, we think, shows a preponderance that she will be injured beyond any benefits which she will receive by the grading of the street, and that her property will be less valuable when the grade is completed than when it is begun. But the main question is, admitting the fact of injury, would the respondent be entitled to compensation from the city? Previous to the adoption of the Constitution, she would have been without remedy excepting for such injury as might have occurred to her land alone, arising from the withdrawal of support, and its consequent actual falling in, or from the negligence of the city in doing the work. Parke v. Seattle (Wash.) 81 Pac. Rep. 310; Gilmore v. Driscoll, 123 Mass. 199, 23 Am. Rep. 812; Smith v. Washington, 61 U. S. 20 How. 185, 15 L. ed. 858. But the Constitution of this state (art. 1, § 16) provides that no private property shall be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation having been first made or paid into court for the owner, and it is upon this prohibition that the respondent bases her right to an injunction. The earlier constitutions of the several states in the Union contained, with but few exceptions, a provision that private property should not be taken for public use without just compensation. The Constitution of the United States contains substantially the same provision which was applicable to the territory. Under these provisions, however, owing to the interpretation put upon the word "taken" by the courts of the several states, with the exception of the courts of Ohio, great and manifest injury was constantly done by the states, counties, and cities to the private citizen without any legal means of reimbursement. The theory was that wherever the state, through its legislative Acts, authorized any of its agents to make public improvements, so long as these agents carried on their work within the scope of their authority, and without negligence, they were liable to no one, whatever damage might accrue. A citizen was thus left without protection in all that large class of cases where, through some act done for the public benefit, or for a use, public or quasi public, although no part of his tangible property was physically taken, the use or value of his property was palpably impaired, or was stripped of incidents comprised within the conception of complete property rights which brought to those rights quite as much value as the mere possession of the property.

In 1870 the state of Illinois, in revising its Constitution, inserted therein the provisions which we have quoted from our own. Its action in that matter has since been followed by West Virginia, Alabama, Missouri, Nebraska, Arkansas, Texas, Georgia, California, Colorado, Kentucky, Montana, and the Dakotas. Some of the Constitutions mentioned differ slightly from our own in their phraseology, but their substance is exactly the same, with the exception that in a few cases the damage is not required to be first paid. Under these constitutional provisions, many such cases have arisen, and the courts have been uniform in their holdings that damages are now recoverable by the owners of land abutting upon streets and highways, for any permanent injury inflicted upon such abutting lands, by any material change of grade or obstruction to the abutter's access where the damages thus inflicted exceed the benefits derived from the grading or other improvement. Out of the dozens of cases which might be cited, we cite the following: Pekin v. Brereton, 87 Ill. 477, 16 Am. Rep. 629; Elgin v. Eaton, 88 Ill. 585, 25 Am. Rep. 412; Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64; New Brighton v. United Presbyterian Church, 96 Pa. 381; Householder v. Kansas City, 83 Mo. 488; Atlanta v. Green, 67 Ga. 386; Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 56 Am. Rep. 109; Montgomery v. Townsend, 80 Ala. 489, 84 Ala. 478; Montgomery v. Maddox, 89 Ala. 181; McElroy v. Kansas City, 21 Fed. Rep. 257; Harmon v. Omaha, 17 Neb. 548, 52 Am. Rep. 420; Hammond v. Harvard, 81 Neb. 685.

Question was made in all these cases, as it has been made in this one, whether the addition of the word "damaged" should be taken to mean anything further than was formerly covered by the word "taken," but it is manifest that no such construction could be sustained. "Damaged" does not mean the same thing as "taken," in ordinary phraseology. The makers of the Illinois Constitution used the word in that instrument for some purpose. Other states changed their constitutions for substantially the same purpose. They took the new phrase subject to the general rule of construction, that the adoption of constitutional or statutory language by one state from another adopts to some extent, at least, the construction put upon the borrowed language by the courts of the state from which it came. After almost twenty years of discussion and decision in Illinois and other states, we put the words "taken or damaged" into our Constitution, and they must have their effect. In Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 81 L. ed. 638, the court said: "The use of the word 'damaged' in the clause providing for compensation to owners of private property, appropriated to public use, could have been with no other intention than that expressed by the state court. Such a change in the organic law of the state was not meaningless. But it would be meaningless if it should be adjudged that the Constitution of 1870 gave no additional or greater security to private property sought to be appropriated to public use than was guaranteed by the former Constitution." It is now too late to urge this argument against the recovery of such damages as are threatened to be caused by the action of the city of Seattle here in question. Every court in which the point has been raised has decided in favor of the private citizen, but, were it now presented to us for the first time in the history of the phrase, we should not be disposed to view it in any way different from that expressed in the cases we have cited. If private property is damaged for the public benefit, the public should make good the loss to the individual. Such always was the equity of the case, and the Constitution makes the hitherto disregarded equity now the law of it.

In the matter of street grades, however, counsel for the city urge that a dedication should carry with it the right to raise or lower the surface of a street to any extent deemed proper by the municipal authorities, and that to subject the cities to the constitutional rule of damage would hinder, delay, and prevent street improvements, and cause heavy burdens for this class of expenses to be laid upon the public. It is said that, when the owner of land lays it off into lots, blocks, streets, and alleys, he, by his act of dedication of the public places, consents that they may be used in any way consistent with the purpose of the dedication, as the owner of two adjacent lots who sells one of them consents that his grantee may use his purchase as he sees fit from the center of the earth to the sky. But, in order to sustain the appellants' claim, it would be necessary to overlook the fact that a street is laid out for the benefit of abutting lots as well as for public passage, the land in the lots retaining the easement of access over the land in the street, and this easement being the principal motive and consideration for the dedication. The only obligation which a city assumes by its acceptance of a street is to maintain thereon a reasonable roadway, according to the circumstances. It cannot be compelled to fill up chasms or dig down hills to make the most perfect way for travel of every kind. Its duty is done, when, under all the circumstances, it has made provision for travel of the kind suited to the locality. It cannot be compelled to grade, or otherwise improve, a street, and it loses none of its rights by nonuser. For the construction of whatever improvements it does make, it is now quite the custom to assess the entire cost to the abutting land. A harsh application of the old rule would put the dedicator in the position of consenting to all that the municipality might arbitrarily do, even to the destruction of values in his abutting land. But, in fact, the contemplation of no such unreasonable thing as a grade, which would actually reduce the value of his abutting land, can be imputed to him, since it is not in the nature of men to do things which are patently contrary to their self-interests. On the other hand, to enable the city to perform its duty, it must derive from the dedication the right to build a reasonable roadway according to the peculiarities of the locality, and having due regard to the convenience of the abutting property, and that of the public, as well as to its own liability for the flowage of surface water, and the like. Such a street may be said to be fairly contemplated by every dedicator. To go beyond the strict requirements of this case, and perhaps to invite the charge of promulgating mere dicta, a dedication should always be taken as a consent that the natural surface of the street at its center line might be the grade to which the roadway should be leveled from either side, since a reasonable roadway could not be made across a slope of much pitch. Along its middle course the street ought to follow the general contour of the land, without slavish adherence to every inequality, the disregard of which can injure no one or make property less valuable. If no street practicable for the public use can be made without making cuts or fills which will damage abutting land so as to reduce its value below that which it possessed before the street was begun, none should be undertaken at all unless abutting owners waive damages, or until public necessity shall justify paying the cost of a lower or higher grade.

Under the circumstances of this case, we think the court was justified in interposing its injunction, as by the proofs a strong probability, amounting almost to a certainty, was established that the grading of Jefferson street as proposed would seriously reduce both the rental and selling value of respondent's property. A cut of from 14 to 17 feet at the alley would have greatly affected her access to her double house, and would have practically destroyed the use of the alley in connection with all her property. Under the Constitution, she had a right to have this damage ascertained by a jury, and paid to her before the work was done, if the damage thus sustained would leave her property less valuable to sell or rent than it was before; the jury being the judges of the reasonableness of the grade under the dedication, and of the fact and extent of the injury.

Objection is made by counsel to the allowance of the injunction, because it is said that the respondent should be left to her action for damages, as it could not be considered that it was intended by the Constitution that the cities and towns of the state should be stopped in the progress of the work of improving streets by frequent injunctions on the part of property owners. A case has been brought to our notice which is exactly in point in its rulings, viz., Moore v. Atlanta, 70 Ga. 612. The Constitution of Georgia provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged without just and equitable compensation being first paid. The city of Atlanta was proceeding to grade a street in front of Moore's property, and he applied for an injunction to restrain the prosecution of the work until his damages should be assessed and paid. The writ was refused, and on appeal the supreme court affirmed the judgment. The decision of this case, as the reading of the opinion shows, was based upon the argument that it was better that one man should be left to recover his damage by ordinary suit at law than the city authorities be hindered in grading a street; or, in other words, the damage to one man was balanced against the possible inconvenience of many, which is not a recognized basis of legal decision. The embarrassments of the constitutional provisions were pointed out, but it seems to us the plain letter of that instrument was disregarded. Justification for the decision was sought in the case of Sletson v. Chicago &

E. R. Co., 75 Ill. 74; but the fact seems to have been entirely overlooked that the Constitution of Illinois does not require that compensation be first made in any such case. We can foresee many difficulties, and perhaps much litigation, likely to ensue from the faithful enforcement of our constitutional requirement that damages be first paid; but we have no choice in the matter, and these difficulties, as well as many others, must be met and dealt with as they arise. It will not be every case in which the property owner deems himself likely to be injured that will justify an injunction, and the courts of the state will undoubtedly do their duty in this particular, and grant no preliminary restraining order or injunction until it is made to appear, with legal probability or certainty, that damages will be incurred by the grading of streets.

Anders, Ch. J., and Dunbar, J., concur.

Hoyt, J., dissenting (Filed Jan. 14, 1893):

I think the judgment of the court below should be reversed. When those under whom the plaintiff claims dedicated the street to public use, it is conceded that they in substance said: "Take this street and use it." I think it equally clear that they in effect further said, "Improve this street so as to adapt it for use as such." Such adaptation would, of course, include such change in the surface thereof, as was necessary to best adapt it to the purposes for which it was designed.

If such was the effect of the dedication, it seems clear that the dedicators could not claim damages against the public for doing that which they had said it should do; and as the plaintiff could get no better right than those under whom she holds, it follows that for the injuries set out in the complaint there could be no recovery.

In the case of Parke v. Seattle, just decided, I have at some length given my reasons for holding that for such injuries no action will lie. I shall not repeat them here.

Something is said in the opinion of the majority of the court as to the proper construction of that provision in our Constitution which provides that no property shall be taken or damaged for public use without compensation. I am unable to agree with what is thus said, and if in my opinion a construction of such clause was necessary to the decision of this case, I should feel it my duty at some length to express my dissent from the views thus expressed. But under my view of the effect of the dedication as above stated, the decision of the case does not call for such construction; hence I shall not now discuss it.

Rehearing denied.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

MEMPHIS & CHARLESTON R. CO., Appt.,
 BIRMINGHAM, SHEFFIELD & TENN-ESSEE RIVER R. CO.

(.....Ala.....)

1. The crossing or intersecting of the road of one railway company by that of another is the taking of property within the meaning of constitutional provisions requiring compensation to be made.
2. The provision of Const., art. 14, § 21, that "every railroad company shall have the right with its road to intersect, connect with, or cross any other railroad, and shall receive and transport each the other's freight, passengers, and cars loaded or empty without delay or discrimination," does not give a railroad company the right to cross another road without compensation.
3. The constitutional right of appeal under Const., art. 14, § 7, from any preliminary assessment of damages by viewers or otherwise in condemnation proceedings is violated by Code 1886, § 1582, which merely provides for the appointment by a probate judge of three arbitrators and the recording of their award without any provisions for appeal, as the general statutes provide for an appeal only from a final judgment, order, or decree of the judges of probate.

(November 7, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for Colbert County dismissing a writ of certiorari which sought to review an order of the Probate Court refusing to dismiss a petition, under Code, § 1582, for arbitrators to determine the conditions upon which plaintiff could cross the tracks of defendant's road. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Humes, Sheffey & Speake for appellant.

Messrs. Simpson & Jones for appellee.

Thorington, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question raised by this appeal involves the constitutionality of section 1582 of the Code of 1886. This section prescribes the mode by which one railroad company may acquire the right to cross or intersect the road of another, and appellant insists the statute is unconstitutional for the following reasons: (1)

It fails to require notice of the filing of the petition, and hence fails to provide an opportunity to controvert its allegations; (2) it fails to provide for an appeal or a trial by jury; (3) it does not provide for the assessment or payment of just compensation to the injured party.

While the authorities are not altogether uniform or harmonious in regard to the necessity of notice of the initiatory steps in proceedings of this class, it cannot be doubted that under constitutional provisions, such as exist in this state, no statute authorizing the taking of property for a public use by corporations or individuals invested with the exercise of the right of eminent domain is a valid enactment, which fails to secure to the owner of property so taken the right of an appeal from any preliminary assessment of damages by viewers or otherwise, by which a trial by jury may be had according to the course of common law, or which fails to provide that just compensation shall first be made to the party injured; and in considering the question we shall confine the inquiry to the last two grounds urged by appellant against the validity of the Act. The constitutional provisions by which the question under consideration is to be tested are as follows: Article 1, § 24: "That the exercise of the right of eminent domain shall never be abridged, nor so construed as to prevent the General Assembly from taking the property and franchises of incorporated companies, and subjecting them to public use, the same as individuals. But private property shall not be taken or applied for public use, unless just compensation be first made therefor: . . . provided, however, that the General Assembly may, by law, secure to persons or corporations the right of way over the lands of other persons or corporations, and by general laws provide for and regulate the exercise by persons and corporations of the rights herein reserved; but just compensation shall, in all cases, be first made to the owner," etc. Article 14, § 7: "Municipal and other corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for the property taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of its works, highways, or improvements, which compensation shall be paid before such taking, injury, or destruction. The General Assembly is hereby prohibited from depriving any person of an appeal from any preliminary assessment of damages against any such corporations or individuals, made by

NOTE—The "taking of property" by eminent domain.

On the question what constitutes a "taking of property" within the meaning of a constitutional provision as to compensation, it may be said that modern decisions strongly tend to the doctrine that a destruction of property rights is a taking of property although there may be no dispossession of any physical object in the class of either real or personal property.

The doctrine that easements such as those of light, air, and access to streets constitute property 18 L. R. A.

for which compensation must be given when the easements are destroyed or impaired has effectually displaced the earlier theory that there must be a physical possession in order to constitute a taking of property. Egerer v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 14 L. R. A. 381, and note, 128 N. Y. 157; Reining v. York, L. & W. R. Co. 14 L. R. A. 133, 128 N. Y. 157; Selden v. Jacksonville, 14 L. R. A. 370, and note, 28 Fla. 558; Abendroth v. Manhattan R. Co. 11 L. R. A. 635, 122 N. Y. 1; Somers v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 14 L. R. A. 344, 129 N. Y. 573.

viewers or otherwise; and the amount of such damages, in all cases of appeal, shall, on demand of either party, be determined by a jury according to law." Article 14, § 21: "All railroads and canals shall be public highways. . . . Every railroad company shall have the right, with its road, to intersect, connect with, or cross any other railroad, and shall receive and transport, each, the other's freight, passengers, and cars, loaded or empty, without delay or discrimination."

In the absence of constitutional restraints, the power of the state to take private property for the public use reaches every species of property within its jurisdiction, even when acquired by grant from the state. It is a power inhering in sovereignty, and it has been declared that it is impliedly reserved in every grant, and that the franchise of a corporation is not exempt. It may be taken in whole or in part, and, with the other property of the corporation, devoted to other or similar public uses. And in this state it is extended by express constitutional provisions to the property and franchises of corporations, "the same as individuals." Article 1, § 24; Anniston & C. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, G. & A. R. Co. 82 Ala. 297. The only restrictions as to the manner of the exercise of this power by the state are to be found in the Constitution, "for nothing of less authority than the organic and fundamental law which lays out the very frame of government could impose them." 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 512, 521. It is clear from the provisions of the Constitution of this state, quoted above, that two restrictions are in express terms imposed by the organic law upon the right of the state to invest individuals and corporations with the exercise of this power, viz.: That just compensation shall first be made to the owner in all cases; and that in cases where private property is taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of the works, highways, or improvements, or individuals, municipal or other corporations invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, the right of appeal from the preliminary assessment of damages made by viewers or otherwise shall be secured, upon this appeal, on the demand of either party, and the damages shall be determined by a jury according to law. In Smith v. Inge, 80 Ala. 283, it is said: "The state itself cannot, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, take private property for public uses without a regular judgment of condemnation in a proper judicial proceeding, first making payment of just compensation to the owner."

If, therefore, the crossing or intersecting of the road of one railway company by the road of another is taking, injuring, or destroying private property, by the construction or enlargement of the works, highways, or improvements of such company, within the meaning of the Constitution, then the constitutional restrictions or limitations, to which we have referred, are applicable; and the exercise of such right can only be sustained when it is claimed under a valid legislative enactment by which the rights contemplated by these constitutional restrictions are secured to the owner of the property so taken, injured, or destroyed. There is abundant authority in the text-books and adjudicated cases for the proposition that the crossing or intersecting of the road of one railway company by that of another is the taking of property, within the meaning of constitutional provisions requiring compensation to be made. That to constitute a taking of property it is not necessary there should have been an actual disseisin of the owner, but that it is a "taking" to invade his property by superinduced additions of water, sand, earth, or other material, or by having any artificial structure placed upon it so as effectually to destroy or impair its usefulness. 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 542. And in the case of Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co., 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557, it is said that a serious interruption to the common and necessary use of property may amount to a taking, within the meaning of constitutional provisions, and entitle the owner to compensation. In the case of Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Springfield & N. W. R. Co., 67 Ill. 147, it was held, in a case of the construction of one railroad across the track of another, that the company whose track is crossed is entitled to recover, not only just compensation for the land taken, but also for such incidental loss, inconvenience, and damage as might reasonably be expected to result from the construction and use of the crossing in a legal and proper manner. The same principle is recognized in the following cases: Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Peoria & F. R. Co. 105 Ill. 110, 10 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 129; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Vincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. 80 Ohio St. 604.

So, also, under an Act which allowed damages when lands were "injuriously affected," it was held that the test applied to determine the proper meaning of the words "injuriously affected," as giving a right to compensation, was whether the act done in carrying out the works in question was an act which would have given a right of action if the works had not been authorized by the statute. In other words, if the act affecting the land had been done by an individual, he would be liable for damages. Delaplane v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 42 Wis. 214, 24 Am. Rep. 886. And in McCarthy v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 8 C. P. 209, it is said: "The act, therefore, injuriously affecting, must be that which would be wrongful but for the statute. It is enough . . . that it might be prevented by injunction." The question can scarcely be regarded as an open one in this court. While there is no case, so far as we have discovered, which in express terms decides that the crossing or intersecting of one railroad by another is the taking of property, within the meaning of the Constitution, there are cases in which the principle is recognized. In the case of Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Alabama M. R. Co. 87 Ala. 508, it is said: "The statutes above referred to confer all the authority to take private property, whether of persons or corporations, that exists in railroad companies organized under the general laws. Authority to take the franchise, or any part, of another corporation, is not given in express terms, except so far as necessary to cross or intersect another railroad, and, if not necessarily implied, it does not exist." In the above quotation we have italicized the language bearing on this particular question. And in the case of Highland Ave. & B. R. Co. v. Birmingham Union R. Co., 98 Ala. 505, there was a controversy between two corporations as to their respective rights growing out of the crossing of their several tracks on a certain street; the complainant company seeking to enjoin the other from building its track across the former's without making compensation. The court held that it was not a proper case for the interposition of a court of equity, but that the parties should be remitted to their remedies at law.

We cannot yield assent to the argument of appellee's counsel that article 14, § 21, of the Constitution, invests railroad companies with the right to cross and intersect the tracks, the one of the other, without compensation. The argument is that "the crossing of one railroad track by another is not the taking of the property of another, because the Constitution gives to every railroad a right of way to cross any other one, and when one road acquires a right of way it is subject to the right of every other to cross it, and there remains no right of property to adjudicate, but only to determine the terms of the crossing." There would be force in the argument if this section stood alone in the Constitution, and if there was nothing else in the section itself to indicate a contrary intent. But this section is to be construed in connection with section 24 of article 1, and section 7 of article 14, and with all other provisions of the Constitution touching the subject of eminent domain. The language of section 24, art. 1, is that "compensation shall, in all cases, be first made to the owner." The language of section 7, art. 14, is: "Shall make just compensation for the property taken, injured, or destroyed." If the provisions of the two sections last referred to had been embodied in section 21, art. 14, upon which appellee's argument is based, it could not be questioned that, construing the section as a whole, the right to cross and intersect other roads was subject to just compensation first to be made. That those provisions are in separate sections cannot change the rule of construction; they are to be construed together, and operative effect given to each. Appellee's contention, however, is repelled by the language of the section itself. That part of it material to the question is as follows: "Every railroad company shall have the right with its road to intersect, connect with, or cross any other railroad, and shall receive and transport, each, the other's freight, passengers, and cars, loaded or empty, without delay or discrimination."

The utmost latitude of construction would not authorize the conclusion that railroad companies are required by this section to receive and transport, each, the other's freight, passengers, and cars, without compensation; yet this result would inevitably follow if the argument of appellee is sound, for it is equally as applicable to this requirement in the section as to that relating to the crossing and intersecting of roads. We entertain no doubt that the intention of the framers of the Constitution was that each of the burdens contemplated by this section as being imposed by one railroad company upon the property or franchises of another should be subject to the other constitutional provisions securing the prepayment of just compensation, and such is the legal operation and effect of the various constitutional provisions when construed together as a whole. The rights contemplated by section 21, art. 14, of the Constitution, and attempted to be conferred by section 1582 of the Code, involve, therefore, the taking or injuring of property, and any statute designed to provide for the exercise or enforcement thereof must, as we have said, secure to the owner of the property so taken or injured just compensation, which shall be paid before the property is taken or injured, and the right of appeal to a court in which, if demanded, the damages may be determined by a jury "according to law;" that is, by the decisions of this court and according to the course of the common law, a jury of twelve men. Alabama M. R. Co. v. Newton (Ala.) 10 So. Rep. 89; Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 92 Ala. 831; Woodward Iron Co. v. Cabanis, 87 Ala. 828.

It is entirely obvious, from an inspection of the section itself, (Code, § 1582), that it contains no provision for such an appeal. Unless, therefore, the right is secured under some other or general statute relating to appeals, it is fatally open to the objection. The case of Montgomery S. R. Co. v. Sayre, 73 Ala. 443, was an ad quod damnum proceeding under a statute which provided for an appeal, but failed to designate the court to which the appeal should be taken, the language being: "The same proceedings shall be had as in ordinary cases of appeal from the probate court to the higher courts of the state." It was held that the circuit court of the county was the only "higher court" having a jury as a constituent, and that the statute by implication gave the right of appeal to that court. The case of Woodward Iron Co. v. Cabanis, supra, grew out of an ad quod damnum proceeding under a statute (Code, § 8210) which gave no appeal to a court of which a jury was a constituent part. It was held that under the general statute regulating appeals from the probate court, (Code, § 8640), construed in connection with the constitutional provision relating to appeals and a jury trial in such cases, an appeal would lie from the probate to the circuit court, and that a jury of twelve men could there be impaneled to assess the damages.

We have referred to these decisions for the purpose of showing that the constitutional right of appeal and trial by jury in this class of cases has been jealously guarded by this court, and also for the purpose of showing that they afford no support to the statute we now have under consideration. The case of Montgomery S. R. Co. v. Sayre furnishes neither authority nor analogy for the decision of this case, for the reason that there is no provision whatever in section 1582 of the Code touching the right of appeal, and hence nothing to which we can apply the liberal implication indulged by the court in that case in favor of the constitutionality of the statute there considered. Under the statutes considered in Woodward Iron Co. v. Cabanis, supra (Code 1886, § 3207 et seq., as amended by Acts 1888-89, p. 112), a trial is had before the judge of probate and a jury, a verdict is rendered under the charge of the court, and a judgment of condemnation is entered by the court upon the verdict. By section §640 of the Code of 1886, it is provided that "an appeal lies to the circuit or supreme court from any final judgment, order, or decree of the judge of probate;" and the court held that this section, giving a general right of appeal, applied to the case, and that the Constitution was so far self-executing as to entitle the appellant to demand a trial by jury in the circuit court.

It is important to observe that the general statute relating to appeals from the probate court, referred to (Code, § 8640), only authorizes an appeal from any final judgment, order, or decree of the judges of probate. Now, by the section we have under consideration (Code 1886, § 1582), it is not required or contemplated that the judge of probate shall render any "final judgment, order, or decree." Nothing is required of him but to appoint three arbitrators on the application of the party who is the actor, and to record the written award of the arbitrators. The most latitudinarian principles of construction could not justify us in holding that either of these acts performed under the statute by the judge of probate is a final judgment, order, or decree, within the meaning of section 8640 of the Code; nor have we been referred to, or able to discover, any other statute which supplies the omission from section 1582 of all provision for the constitutional right of appeal. This view of the case being conclusive of the invalidity of the statute, it is unnecessary to consider the third ground urged by appellant against its constitutionality, further than to say it is very questionable if the language in the statute, "must determine the terms and conditions upon which such crossing or intersection shall be made," necessarily imports a compensation in money, which is the only kind of compensation meant by the Constitution.

Looking into the history of this section (Code, § 1582), we find it was originally part of an Act entitled "An Act to authorize the incorporation of railroad companies in this state," approved March 8, 1876 (Acts 1875-76, p. 249), being section 15 of that Act. The language there, so far as it is material to this inquiry, is: "They shall also have the right to cross and intersect any railroad in this state, and, in case the terms of said crossing or intersection cannot be mutually agreed upon by the railroad companies in interest, the same shall be fixed and determined by a commission of award, as heretofore arranged for in this Act." By preceding sections of the Act, provision is made for the appointment of such commission of award, who are required to possess the qualifications of jurors, to act under oath, empowered to examine witnesses, and by unanimous verdict to assess the compensation to be made. There is also provision made for an appeal, which, as construed by this court, meant an appeal to the circuit court, where a jury could be demanded. The original Act above referred to was carried into the Code of 1876, and constitutes article 2 of chapter 1 of that Code (Code 1876, §§ 1821-1859), of which section 1842 was section 15 in the original Act. In that section (1842) the language is the same as above quoted, down to and including the words, "by a commission of award," when the following words are used: "As hereinbefore provided," the preceding provisions being the same as in the original Act, and which we have shown secured an assessment of compensation in money and an appeal affording a jury trial. Section 1842 of the Code of 1876 is carried forward into the Code of 1886 as sections 1581 and 1582 of the latter Code. Under the arrangement of this last-mentioned Code, section 1582 is entirely dissociated from the original sections with which it stood related, and the qualifying reference therein, "as hereinbefore provided," is omitted from the section, and the Code of 1886 was adopted with these changes. The result is the section (1582) as it is now found in the Code of 1886 stands alone, as a distinct and separate statute, embracing all the legislation of the state relating to the crossing and intersecting of one railroad by another. The condemnation proceedings, by section 3207 et seq. of the present Code, have no application to the proceedings contemplated by section 1582, for the reason that there is no provision in the latter section or elsewhere making them applicable; and the rule is that the general statutes regulating the taking of private property for public use do not confer the right to so take or subject the property or franchises of a corporation.

In Anniston & C. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, G. & A. R. Co., 82 Ala. 297, it is said: "Lands once taken for a public use, pursuant to law, under the right of eminent domain, cannot, under general laws, and without special authority from the Legislature, be appropriated by proceedings in invitum to a different public use. . . . It would require an express Act of legislation to accomplish it, and then only on the prepayment of damages." By reason, therefore, of the dissociation, by the arrangement of the present Code, of this section from the original sections with which it was enacted, and related by express reference therein, and the omission of the express words of reference, and the failure to supply the place of the same with other appropriate words of reference to the other sections of the original Act as they are now contained in the Code, and the adoption of the Code in that shape, the invalidity of the statute (1582) inevitably results. If the conflict between the statute and Constitution were not clear, it would be our duty to uphold it, and we would lean in favor of any reasonable construction, "although it might not at first view seem most obvious and natural," which would effectuate the legislative intent, and make the statute conform to the Constitution. But we are constrained, for the reasons given, to hold that section 1582 of the Code is not a valid, constitutional enactment. It results that the judgment of the circuit court dismissing appellant's petition was erroneous, and it is accordingly reversed. Judgment will be here rendered quashing the proceedings before the probate judge of Colbert county, as prayed in the petition.

Reversed and rendered.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Thomas, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

John H. LEWIS & Wife.

(.....Va.....)

1. A valid gift causa mortis including the valuables in the depository is effected where a man sick in bed on the day of his death sends for securities and the keys to the depository containing other securities all belonging to him, and with the remark, "I am a sick man and don't know what may happen to me," picks up the securities and hands them to the donee, saying, "I give you these," and taking the keys describes in a general way the contents of the depository and handing the keys to the donee says, "These keys I now give you" are where the valuable papers are; "whatever you find you can have—it is yours," and then directs the donee to place the securities and keys in her trunk and lock it, which the donee does.

2. Evidence of statements by a lawyer who went to the bedside of a dying man with an offer to prepare his will that the man made an appointment to meet the lawyer at a future time for the purpose of having his will drawn, before which time he died, is not admissible to defeat an alleged donatio causa mortis where the lawyer is employed in the case and refuses to testify as to what took place at the interview between himself and decedent.

3. Evidence of declarations by the donee and her companion as to the fact of the gift, made on the day of the donor's death, is admissible in support of an alleged donatio causa mortis both as part of the res gestae and to rebut the inference flowing from testimony that in a conversation three days after the donor's death the donee made no mention of the gift.

4. Evidence of failure to mention an alleged donatio causa mortis at an interview three days after the donor's death at which the affairs of the estate were under consideration, and that the donee said that "as there was no will she supposed all she would have" was certain other property mentioned and not including the gift, does not furnish a sufficient basis for even a reasonable conjecture against the gift where the donee had not then consulted a lawyer and had been informed by the family physician that the gift was invalid; especially where the witness giving the testimony contra-

NOTE*—Sufficiency of constructive delivery to sustain gift causa mortis.

The above case is an extraordinary one in respect to the magnitude of the gift resting on the testimony of a single witness as well as on the sufficiency of a constructive delivery by transfer of keys.

The question of the sufficiency of such a constructive delivery is one about which there is some conflict but the main case is fairly well supported by the prior decisions.

In an early English case, Jones v. Selby, Prec. in Ch. 800, the delivery of the key to a trunk was regarded as a sufficient delivery of the contents to sustain a gift causa mortis, and the question whether a tally upon the government for £500 was given therewith was held to depend on its presence in the trunk at the time of the gift. This decision seems fairly to represent the law to-day.

In Jones v. Brown, 84 N. H. 439, where a gift causa mortis by a married woman was held invalid without her husband's consent, it was held on the question of the sufficiency of the delivery of things in a chest that a delivery of the key was sufficient.

And in Sheegog v. Perkins, 4 Baxt. 273, it is said: "As to the manner of the gift by delivering the key it has been several times held that this would be a sufficient delivery."

In Coleman v. Parker, 114 Mass. 80, it was held that a key placed in the hands of another person by the donor who relinquished all dominion over it was a sufficient delivery of the contents of a trunk to which the key belonged, but that it was otherwise where the donor after having called for the key and opened the trunk directed the key to be replaced where it was found and it was left there until after his death.

In Cooper v. Burr, 45 Barb. 9, a sufficient delivery of personal property in trunks, bureaux, etc., was held to be made for the purpose of a gift causa mortis by a delivery of the keys.

In Phipard v. Phipard, 55 Hun. 433, a delivery to one of the donees of a key to a box in a safe-deposit vault with an order to the custodian for its delivery was held sufficient as to a gift of an insurance policy in such box although there were other papers of the donor therein, where with the 18 L. R. A.

policy there was a paper signed by the insured with attesting witnesses stating that the insurance was for the benefit of the donees in the event of the donor's death before the maturity of the policy. The principal ground of the decision in this case, however, was that a trust was created for the donees.

In Stephenson v. King, 81 Ky. 425, 50 Am. Rep. 173, negotiable notes and bonds transferable by delivery are held to be sufficiently delivered for the purpose of a gift causa mortis by actual delivery of a letter from an agent acknowledging possession of them with a statement of their amounts and by delivery also of a key to a small writing desk in which the letter was kept.

In Devol v. Dye, 7 L. R. A. 439, 123 Ind. 321, where a donor having a private box in a bank vault instructed a person who had the keys to count from the box a certain amount of money and label it as the property of the donee and deliver it to him with another such package in the event of the donor's death, and when informed that the packages are prepared gives approval and never again takes possession of the keys, it was held that a sufficient delivery was made.

But there are cases somewhat inconsistent with those above cited.

In Powell v. Hellicar, 26 Beav. 351, it was held that there was not a good delivery of the contents of a dressing case and boxes for a gift causa mortis by the delivery to a person of the keys thereof with directions to keep them and deliver the contents of the dressing case and box to the donee after the donor's death.

And in Hatch v. Atkins, 56 Me. 324, 96 Am. Dec. 464, the delivery to a person of the key of a trunk kept in a closet of the donor's own room with directions to keep it for the donee was held not a sufficient delivery of certain contents of the trunk to make a valid gift causa mortis where the donor had other papers in the trunk and this remained under his immediate observation. In this case there was also a lack of evidence of the alleged gift.

In Gano v. Fisk, 43 Ohio St. 462, 54 Am. Rep. 819, it was held there was no delivery of the contents of a box on a bureau in the donor's room where he dicted himself on material points and had always acted adversely to the claimant.

5. One competent, credible witness is sufficient to establish a gift causa mortis.

6. A gift causa mortis may extend to the whole of the donor's personal estate, however large.

7. The mere existence for precaution against loss or accident in the hands of a third person of a duplicate set of keys to the receptacle where valuable papers are kept, will not impair the validity of a gift of the papers causa mortis by delivery of the keys in the donor's possession.

8. That the donor of valuables causa mortis in transferring them to the donee used the expression "to be yours in case of my death," will not convert the transaction into a testamentary disposition so as to prevent its taking effect as a donatio causa mortis.

9. A donatio causa mortis is not within the provisions of Code, § 8414, providing that no gift shall be valid unless actual possession come to and remain in the donee, and that "if donor and donee reside together at the time of the gift possession at the place of their residence shall not be sufficient possession" within the meaning of the section.

10. Delivery of possession of a bank pass-book in consummation of a gift-causa mortis is not sufficient to transfer the bank deposit.

(Lacy, J., dissents.)

(June 16, 1892.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court of Richmond in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to establish a gift causa mortis. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Guy & Gilliam, Staples & Munford, Green & Miller, Peatross & Harris, William J. Robertson, and G. W. Hansbrough for appellant.

Messrs. Edmund Waddill, Jr., Christian & Christian, Edgar Allen, W. W. Gordon, and E. C. Burks for appellees.

Fauntleroy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition of Leigh R. Page, administrator of William A. Thomas, deceased, represents that, on the 4th of January, 1889, the said William A. Thomas died intestate, leaving an estate valued at some $225,000, of which some $20,000 was realty, $18,000 on deposit in the Planters' National Bank of Richmond, and the balance, represented by bonds, stocks, choses in action, and gold coin, deposited in a rented box in the vaults of the old one child in the presence of others that he wanted her to take the box and divide the contents between them equally and to go and get the key, which she did and after finding by trial that it fitted the lock gave it to her husband to keep, but no division or delivery of the contents of the box was made during the donor's life.

In Keddel v. Dobree, 10 Sim. 244, a delivery to a donee of a locked cash box with the key, but with directions to get the key after the donor's death from his son, and with the injunction that the box should be returned to the donor every three months while he lived, was held not sufficient for a gift causa mortis as the donor retained control of the property.

The frequently quoted test of delivery that it shall be as good as can be made under the circumstances may serve to explain in some degree the lack of agreement in the above decisions as in several of those in which the delivery is held insufficient the property was at hand and of such kind that it could have been delivered as easily as the key.

In Bunn v. Markham, 7 Taunt. 224, a direction that keys should be delivered after the donor's decease was held insufficient as a constructive delivery, but here there was not even a constructive delivery during the donor's life.

Gift of savings bank deposit.

The authorities prior to the main case were well settled in accordance with the minority view of Fauntleroy, J., in that case, that a gift causa mortis of money in a savings bank may be made by delivery of the savings bank book. Ridden v. Thrall, 11 L. R. A. 684, 125 N. Y. 572; Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 426, 37 Am. Rep. 871; Walsh v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 15 Daly, 406, 406; Glynn v. Seaman's Fund Sav. Bank, 9 N. Y. S. R. 498; Camp's App., 38 Conn. 88, 4 Am. Rep. 89.

And a fortiori a delivery of the book together with an assignment is sufficient for such a gift. Sheedy v. Roach, 124 Mass. 472, 26 Am. Rep. 690.

But a sufficient delivery of such a book is not 18 L. R. A.

made for a gift causa mortis by mere words of gift without actually delivering the book although it was at the time in a trunk to which the donee, who was the donor's husband, had access and in which he also kept his papers. Dean v. Dean, 48 Vt. 387.

Other instances.

A delivery of receipts for the consideration money of the purchase of annuities was held in an early case not a sufficient delivery for a gift causa mortis of such annuities. Ward v. Turner, 3 Ves. Sr. 431.

But the delivery of an absolute assignment in writing of shares of stock in a corporation is sufficient for a gift causa mortis although the certificates of stock are not delivered and the transfer is not completed on the books of the corporation. Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 830.

And the delivery of an attorney's receipt for a bond in suit and which was filed among the papers in the case is a sufficient delivery of the bond for the purpose of a gift causa mortis, this being the best possible delivery. Eiam v. Keen, 4 Leigh, 833, 26 Am. Dec. 822.

In Ellis v. Secor, 81 Mich. 185, 18 Am. Rep. 178, a valid gift causa mortis of securities in a valise was held to be made by writing on a slate by the bedside of the donor stating that she wanted the donee to take possession of all her property and directing him to look in the valise, while in the valise with the securities was an envelope directed to him containing a writing which authorized him to take possession of the effects and do with them as he saw fit. This decision touches another question not entered upon in this note, as to the necessity of any delivery to sustain a gift causa mortis. That question will be taken up in a subsequent note.

said bank. That on the 14th day of January, 1889, the county court of Henrico county, on the motion of the heirs-at-law of the said decedent, appointed William R. Quarles and Mann S. Quarles curators of the said estate, who immediately qualified as such, by giving bond in the penalty of $300,000, and entered upon the discharge of their duties. That on the 29th day of January, 1889, said Bettie Lewis, along with her husband, filed her bill in the chancery court of the city of Richmond, against the aforesaid curators, in which she asserted that said William A. Thomas, deceased, during his last illness, by gift causa mortis, gave her the keys to the tin box in the vault of the Planters' National Bank, above described, and with them all the property contained therein. That he gave her the pass-book showing the status of his account with said Planters' Bank for money placed on deposit therein, and with it gave to her the balance on deposit to his credit in said bank, amounting, as aforesaid, to some $18,000; and that he also gave to her several negotiable notes, aggregating less than $1,000, which he had with him at his residence at the time of his last illness. That, to this bill, the curators filed their joint demurrer and answer, denying the claim asserted by said Bettie Lewis; denying that said Thomas had attempted during his last illness to make a gift to the plaintiff of said property; and insisting that actual possession of the several subjects of this pretended donation had never come to or remained with the plaintiff; and that no possession, either actual or constructive, by her, at the joint residence of the donor and donee, could render valid the alleged gift, the same not being evidenced by deed or will. That on the 19th day of February, 1889, petitioner, Leigh R. Page, was appointed administrator of the estate of said William A. Thomas, deceased, by the county court of Henrico county, and, as such, he filed his answer to the bill of said Bettie Lewis. Before the assets in the hands of the curators aforesaid could be turned over to petitioner, the chancery court of the city of Richmond, on the motion of Bettie Lewis, appointed N. W. Bowe and I. A. Coke receivers, to take charge of and hold of all the aforesaid assets, pending a decision of the questions raised by the suit aforesaid. After the appointment of the aforesaid receivers, depositions were taken by both plaintiff and defendants, and the case made ready for a hearing at the June term, 1890, of the chancery court. The cause was argued, elaborately and exhaustively, before the Honorable E. H. Fitzhugh, the judge of the said court. No decree was, however, rendered by him, he having unexpectedly and suddenly died before the next term of his court. The Honorable W. J. Leake having been appointed his successor, the cause was again argued, at great length, before him; and on the 8th day of January, 1891, a decree was pronounced by him, sustaining the claim of the said Bettie Lewis (as preferred in her bill) to all the personal estate of the said William A. Thomas, deceased, except the sum of $18,000, money on deposit in the Planters' National Bank, which was awarded to petitioner, as administrator aforesaid. From this decree the case is here on appeal.

The question raised in the controversy, and to be decided by this court, is, What constitutes a valid gift causa mortis? and whether the evidence adduced by the complainant comes up to the law's requirements to establish such a gift by the decedent, William A. Thomas, to the complainant Bettie Thomas Lewis, by and through the facts and circumstances detailed in the bill and attested by the proofs. It is essential to a correct and just estimate of the facts of the case, as disclosed by the record, that they be viewed in the light of the history and relations of the parties to the controversy, the congruities of the case, and the legal weight of the testimony.

Bettie Thomas Lewis, who, before her marriage, was Bettie Thomas, is the only living child of the late William A. Thomas, a wealthy retired merchant, who, at the age of 70 years and enfeebled by long sickness, departed this life, intestate, on the 4th day of January, 1889, at his residence, in or near to the city of Richmond, possessed of a large estate of both real and personal property, but principally personalty. He never married, but cohabited with a woman of half white blood, formerly his slave, in the county of Pittsylvania, Va., by whom he was the father of two daughters, Bettie, and an older sister, Fannie, who married and died, soon after the late civil war, without issue. Bettie, 85 years of age when her father died, and Fannie were always recognized and acknowledged by William A. Thomas as his children; they called him father; and he called them and cherished and lived with them as his children. The death of Fannie was a great grief to him; and after that event, his whole and devoted affection was centered upon Bettie, as the "daughter of his heart and house," whom he loved "passing well," and from whom he was never thereafter separated, except for the two years that he sent her to a boarding school. Soon after the termination of the late war, he removed to Richmond to engage in business, and he purchased a small farm just outside the city limits for a home for himself and Bettie; and there they lived together for more than twenty years; she presiding at his table and over his household affairs, and administering to him in sickness and in health, nursing and caring for him with the constant assiduities of a devoted and dutiful daughter, and he providing for her comfort and pleasure, in every conceivable form that lavish parental love and large means could suggest. He built the house in which they lived for her; and, according to her directions he planned and furnished it. He occupied a room intercommunicating with Bettie's; and, during his long and languishing age, enfeebled by sickness and suffering, he preferred and tolerated no ministry but hers to his wants and his weariness. He provided for her an intelligent, agreeable female living-companion in his house until her marriage to John H. Lewis; and, for many years previous and up to his death, Fannie Coles, an educated, intellectual woman,—the natural and recognized daughter of the late John S. Coles, of Albemarle county,—was her household companion, friend, and roommate. He urged Bettie to make a trip to Europe with him; and for eight or ten summers, next before his death, he visited Saratoga Springs, taking with him Bettie and Fannie Coles; and there, as at his own home, sitting and eating with them at the same table. For Bettie's mother he provided a home, where, for a time, she lived, but this he sold; and, at the time of his death, she lived at his house with Bettie, though the proof in the record is that he did not, of late years of his life, cohabit with her. William A. Thomas is represented, by the witnesses of the appellant, as a man honest, just, close to his interest, unusually prudent, and of fine business capacity, simple and frugal in his habits. He is described by the witness Dr. H. McGuire, who was his attending physician, chosen friend, and adviser, as "a peculiar character, anyhow. I think, too, he had some little superstition about making his will. I think it was a dislike, that belongs to a great many men, to provide for death in any way." This "peculiar character, anyhow," cut off from society by the kind and circumstance of his household affinities, lived, isolated in his own home, almost absolutely without social recognition or intercourse. He had a few business friends, and no enemies. He had no relations of legal blood, except some collateral kindred, who had never visited him, in health or in sickness, and whom he knew of only by the importunity of occasional begging letters; of which he complained as an annoyance, saying: "Here is a begging letter. The only use my relatives have for me is to get all out of me they can; but if they expect to get what I have when I die they will be mistaken." Dr. McGuire says: "From some things he said to me, I don't know what, I had an idea that he did not like his relatives; for I sometimes used these facts in urging him to make his will."

Mr. A. Judson Watkins, an adverse witness (whose acts and animus, bearing upon this contest over William A. Thomas' dying dispositions, will be the subject of analysis further on in this opinion), says: "I had a conversation with him [Mr. Thomas] on Wednesday evening (he died on Friday), which was the last I had of about an hour's duration. I had frequently talked with and persuaded him, with all the power that was in me, not to neglect further providing for Bettie, if he so intended. . . . He did refer to Mr. Haxall's will, and I think he said, in course of conversation that he was very feeble, and that he wanted to see me especially in regard to making some moneyed arrangement. And, furthermore, I think I remarked to him: 'If you were to die without a will, the lawyers and others [what others?] will get the most you have.' He followed me to the door, and said to me, 'I am going to make everything all right.'" He did die, 48 hours after that interview without a will; and, whatever may be the ultimate issue of the contest made by "the others" over William A. Thomas' large estate, the event will fully verify the other branch of Mr. Watkins' warning prediction. Mrs. Sarah Phillips, a neighbor who lived the length of two city squares and for twenty-one or twenty-two years near Mr. Thomas, and who had been employed by him to teach his daughter Bettie, 18 L. R. A.

and who says that she saw a great deal of both of them, often and intimately, says: "I never heard him refer to his relations but once. He said that he had lately gotten a letter from one of them; that he knew from the style it was written in, what he wanted, and that was money; that he never answered that letter, but rather shoved it off in the wastebasket; that he (Thomas) had had to look out for himself since he was very young, and that others might do the same." Mrs. Mary F. Boyd, a near neighbor and intimate of Mr. Thomas and his family for fifteen years before his death, whose husband, as a merchant, had business and personal relations with him, says: "I heard Mr. Thomas say, conversing with my husband about the property, 'Oh, William, I have bought all my relatives off.'" Mr. Stephen B. Hughes, the most intimate and trusted friend of Mr. Thomas, says: "I have known Mr. Thomas since 1850. We lived together, in the same store, for many years, occupied the same room together, and were partners in business for about three years. And these friendly relations continued up to the time of his death." This witness, with very much other testimony equally important in its bearing upon the relations and affection existing between Mr. Thomas and his daughter Bettie, says they were "of the most affectionate nature, that of father and daughter. I have been present when Mr. Thomas was sick, and I have seen for myself. When Thomas was sick, he usually sent for me. I was, several years ago, sent for to see Mr. Thomas. I found Thomas, as I thought, quite sick, and I asked Thomas to allow me to send him a trained nurse; and he said, 'No,' that he preferred Bettie to anybody else. It was during that sickness that Thomas first told me that Bettie was his daughter. It was during that spell of sickness that Thomas told me, at his death Bettie Lewis would be amply provided for. Some three or four summers ago, when Mr. Thomas was making his arrangements to go to Saratoga, I told him that I did not think he ought to venture so far from home, as feeble as he was, without having some one to care for him that he could rely on; and he told me that he was going to take Bettie with him; that he would rely on her sooner than any one else. During his last spell of sickness Mr. Thomas frequently told me of her kindness and attention, and believed but for her he would not have lived to have gotten back from Saratoga. Mr. Thomas told me that he was very feeble; his appetite was poor; and he would rather be there with Bettie, because she knew better how to care for him than any one else. He got me to go and buy a trunk for her, and had her name marked on it." After stating that he had heard Mr. Thomas speak, more than once, of his intention to provide amply for Bettie at his death, he said: "She was the only one I ever heard him say he was going to make provision for. Thomas used to get his mail at our store; and I have heard Thomas remark, 'Here's a begging letter,' or 'Another begging letter,' and the only use his relations had for him was to get all out of him they could; but, if they expected to get what he had when he died that they would be mistaken."

panion of his daughter Bettie and an inmate of his home and confidence for many years previous and up to his death, says that she never knew any of his relatives to be at his house but did remember his handing to Bettie a begging letter, which he thought he had put in the wastebasket at Drewry's, but afterwards found a part of it in his pocket. She also remembered another begging letter (Exhibit A.) as to which she says: "I have heard Mr. Thomas tell Bettie about this letter, and he took it and gave it to her, and told her he had nothing to send them, and that he had given them all he expected to give them, long years ago; and she said, 'Don't be so hard on the poor thing;' and he said to her, 'Bettie if I left you alone you and I would both go to the poorhouse together, because there is no end to your giving, and I am not going to give them a cent.'"

There is in the record very much more testimony, equally strong, explicit, unimpeached, and uncontradicted, attesting the life-long, avowed and unwavering solicitude and purpose of this isolated old man to nourish tenderly while he lived, and to provide for amply at his death, his devoted and faithful daughter Bettie, the only light of his long life, and the only love which quickened the emotions of his introverted and self-centered soul. There is no particle of evidence—and none could be adduced by the appellant, aided by the direction of able, accomplished, and assiduous counsel, and prompted by the large stake of the controversy—to prove that William A. Thomas ever declared or intimated an intention to provide for any of his collateral kindred at all, much less to allow them to take and enjoy the acquisitions of his long life of industry, thrift, frugality and self-denial. But while we are asked to deny judicial credence to the clearest, the most consistent and convincing testimony that this dying and devoted father did give, with all due and legal solemnities, the larger portion—not all—of his property to his only child and darling daughter, we are deliberately invoked to infer (without the slightest evidence to warrant the deduction, and in disregard of full, incontrovertible proof to the contrary) that it was William A. Thomas' dying design to leave his beloved only child in destitution and disappointed helplessness; and to devolve, by the Statute of Distributions, his whole estate upon collateral kindred, with whom he had no intercourse, and for whom he cared nothing,—strangers, absolutely, to his heart and his home. And the only inducement urged for this illogical and unwarranted inference is the circumstance that Mr. Thomas had the portrait of B. F. Gravely, who had married Mr. Thomas' cousin; and that in a letter of condolence, dated March 2, 1882, in reply to a letter announcing the death of B. F. Gravely, he expressed kindly regard, and asked Mr. Gravely's son, "Can I do anything for the family?" The inference is that he did, then, give them aid; and to this be, doubtless, had reference when he declared (as detailed in the evidence of Stephen B. Hughes, Fannie Coles, Mrs. Boyd and sundry others) that he had given to them, long years ago, all he intended ever to give them.

We have given this unavoidably long narrative of the relations, circumstances, congruities and situation of the parties to this cause to show that the avowed and constant object of Mr. Thomas' life, labor and love was solicitude and provision for his daughter Bettie; and that there is not one scintilla of proof in the record that, through all the years of his life, and in all the references he ever made to his intended disposition of his property, he ever had in his heart or mind a purpose to provide particularly for any other than his cherished child, to whom he was bound by the strongest ties of nature and affection; to whom he owed the undivided obligation of a father; and whose whole tenor of life, as shown by the record in this case, from her birth to the moment of his death, was an unvarying demonstration of dutiful devotion and filial confidence and affection. During the long years of his declining health and "cold gradations of decay," there was no planning or plotting after property in her heavy heart; but reposing in child-like confidence and disinterested trust in the love of her father, Dr. McGuire says that, when repeatedly warned and advised by him (as often he had urged upon her father, on all the occasions of his critical illness), that, if he should die without a will, the law would deprive her of everything, "she always seemed rather indifferent about it, and was always more concerned about his health than his money."

The factum of the gift depends mainly upon the testimony of Fanny Coles, detailing the circumstances, actions, and accompanying statements of Mr. Thomas during the period of impending dissolution; and, if that testimony be credible, consistent, uncontradicted and corroborated by concomitant circumstance, it establishes, by legal and sufficient evidence, the gift, as a valid donation mortis causa, by William A. Thomas to the claimant, his daughter Bettie Lewis. Her testimony is very voluminous, and we will state only so much of it as is necessary to the conclusion. She was subjected to the ordeal of 433 searching questions and answers, and to a cross-examination of many days, by a powerful array of practiced, skillful, able and accomplished counsel for the contestant,—a fiery furnace of trial and a labyrinth of entanglement, through which she (nor any other human intelligence) could not have passed successfully without the panoply of conscious truth and the thread of absolute consistency. Bettie Lewis went upon the witness stand and offered to undergo the same process; but the appellant peremptorily refused to let her testify, when well he and his astute counsel knew that, if (argued and insisted now) there was a collusion of untruth and fraud between Fanny Coles and her, all that was necessary to catch and convict them was to let them both testify. On Thursday, the 8d day of January, 1889, William A. Thomas was taken seriously ill, and he died in the early part of the night of Friday,—the next day. It was during that illness that he made to his daughter Bettie the gift which is the subject of controversy in this case, and to which the chancery court of the city of Richmond, upon the evidence adduced, has solemnly adjudged she is entitled by law.

The witness Fannie Coles says: "Mr. Thomas called Bettie to his bedside, and said, 'Bettie, I am a very sick man, I do not know what may happen;' and he said, 'Bettie look into my pants' pocket, and bring me my keys, my penknives, my two purses, and look in the inside of my vest pocket, and bring me a package of papers tied with a red string.' She brought them to his bed to him, and he said, 'Bettie, I am going to give you these things as yours.' He gave her the keys to his top bureau drawer, and told her that in that drawer she would find two notes in a white envelope; to get these notes out of the drawer,—that they were hers. Then he opened a small black purse and took out a small package of white tissue paper. Out of this paper he took some keys, and he said, 'Bettie, here are the keys to my safe at Drewry & Co's, and to the box I have in the vault of the bank.' He says, 'At Drewry & Co's, in the safe, you will not find anything of any great value but whatever you find in that safe you can have. Now, Bettie, these keys that I now give you that belong to the box in the vault at the bank is where all my valuables are. Whatever you find in that box, you can have as yours; and, Bettie, whatever you do, don't let any one get these keys away from you on any pretense. Swing on to them as you would your life.' Then he took up his pocketbook, and gave it to her, and told her it had no great amount in the pocketbook, but that it was her's. Then he took up the package of papers that was tied with a red string, and he said, 'Bettie, in this package you will find my bank book, showing you how much I have in bank. Whatever it calls for, you can have as yours, and in this package also you will find some notes. They will be money for you; you can have them also. Bettie, I wish you to take these papers, my purses, and my knives,—I give you these knives also,—and put them in your trunk. I don't want you to put them in my bureau, but put them between your clothes, for safe-keeping; for, Bettie, you will have to take care of these things now. I have been taking care of them all these years for you.'"

As to what occurred on the afternoon of Friday, the next day, after Mr. Gilliam left, the witness further testified: "I went up stairs after seeing the gentleman (Mr. Gilliam) out, that Dr. McGuire sent up and knocked at Mr. Thomas' door. Mr. Thomas spoke, and said: 'Come in, Fannie,' and said, 'Take a seat.' I said, 'No, sir; I thank you. I don't care about sitting down.' He said, 'Fannie, take that chair there by the table.' I said, 'No, sir; I don't care about sitting down.' He said, 'Take that seat;' and I sat down. In a minute or so a servant knocked at the door, and said, 'Miss Bettie, I have everything all ready for you now.' Bettie said to him, 'Father, won't you have some lunch now? It is time you were eating something, as the doctor said you must eat all you can.' She turned to me and said, 'Fannie, go down stairs, and bring something nice up here for father's lunch.' He turned to me and said, 'Fannie, keep your seat until I tell you to go,' and he said to Bettie, 'I have something more important to do than to eat now.' Then he said to Bettie, 'Where are those things I gave you last night?' and he said, 'I hope you have got them where

I told you to put them, safe under lock and key. Bettie told him, 'Yes, sir; she had; they were safe.' And he asked, 'Where were they?' and she told him they were safe. And he told her to go and get them, and bring them to him. She turned to get them, and instead of putting them in her trunk, where he had told her the night before, she had dropped them in his bureau drawer. And he got very angry with her for putting them in his bureau drawer, and said to her, 'Look here, now, Bettie, you had better do as I tell you about these things I have given you, for your very life hangs on them, and the bread you eat.' Bettie brought the things, and laid them on the table in front of him, and he turned to her, and he said, 'Bettie, where is that white envelope with those two notes in it; get it out of the drawer, and hand that here also.' Then he asked her and said, 'Bettie, where is your trunk at?' She said, 'In my room behind the door.' He said, 'Now, Bettie, I want you to do for once in your life just as I tell you about these things.' Then he took the package of papers with the red string round, untied it, and he said, 'Bettie, I want to show these to you, and show you the importance of taking care of them.' He untied the envelope, and took out his bank book, and he says, 'Bettie, here is my bank book, which shows you exactly how much I have in bank. I give you this book, and whatever it calls for you will find in the bank, and you can have the money.' Then he laid the bank book on the table, and took the notes out of the large envelope, and he says, 'Bettie, here's some notes which will be money for you also.' Then he picked up that white envelope, and said, 'There two notes in here which will be money for you also. I give these also.' Then he laid his hands on them, and said, 'Bettie, these are yours, and you will have to take care of them.' Then he picked up a red pocketbook, and he said, 'Bettie, here's my pocketbook. You will find a little change in it. Here, take it, keep it, and take good care of it,'—and laid it with the rest of his papers. Then he picked up his little black purse, and he says, 'Bettie, what I am going to give you now is of great importance and very valuable.' And he undid this little black purse, and took out the keys, and said, 'Bettie, these keys belong to the safe at Drewry & Co's, and these which I hold in my hand,' he says, 'belong to the box which I have in the vault in the bank where all my valuables are.' He says, 'These keys open the safe at Drewry & Co's. You won't find anything of any great value in this safe, but what you find in there you can have,—it is yours.' He then handed her the keys of the safe, and says, 'Now, Bettie, these keys I now give you are where all my bonds, deeds, and valuable papers are.' He said, 'Bettie, these keys I want you to swing on to as you would your life. Don't let anybody get them away from you on any pretense. In that box, Bettie, in the vault you will find everything valuable I possess in this world. Whatever you find, Bettie, you can have,—it is yours.' Then he handed her those keys, and handed her the purse, and told her to be very careful to wrap those keys up in tissue paper as she found them. Then he gave her his penknives, and said that he set great store by them, and told her not to give them away to anybody, and to be careful not to let anybody steal them from her. Then he turned and tied these papers all together. He took the two purses, and slipped them together between the red string, and handed them to Bettie; and I was sitting by the table, as I first told you, and he said to her, 'Bettie, I have given you everything I possessed in the world.' Then he said to me, 'Fannie, you see me give Bettie these things?' I said, 'Yes, sir.' Then he said to her, 'Bettie, you will have these things to take care of.' He said, 'Bettie, I am a sick man, and I don't know what may happen to me, and I have been taking care of these things all my life; and, Bettie, you know how careful I am about my papers and keys; now you will have to do the same.' He said, 'Now, Bettie, I want you to take this package in your room, and put it in your own trunk, raise your underclothes up, and place them between your clothes. Lock the trunk, and bring me the key here. Bettie, I want to see if your trunk key is a good one.' He took the two keys to the trunk, and looked at them, and said, 'Yes, Bettie, they will do;' and he asked her had she strapped the trunk. She told him, 'No, she locked it;' and he said to her, 'Bettie, are you crazy?' She said 'No,' that she thought locking the trunk was sufficient; and he told her it was not sufficient, and to go back and strap it up; that he had given her all that he had in the world, and that if she didn't take care of it she would wind up in the poorhouse. Then he turned to me, and asked me again, and said, 'Now, Fannie, you have seen me give Bettie everything I possess in the world.' Then he turned to me, and told me that I could go,—that he was through with me. And Bettie said to me, 'Fannie, go down stairs to the storeroom, and get a bottle of that liquid bread, and take the cork out, and bring me a glassful up here for father.' I got the liquid bread, and carried it up stairs, and handed it to Bettie. She handed it to her father. He took a sip of it, and turned to me, and said again to me, 'Fannie, you see me give Bettie everything I possess in this world, didn't you?' I said, 'Yes, sir; I did.' And he turned to me and said, 'Fannie, remember that now.' And I said, 'Yes, sir.' And he told her to take special care of the trunk keys; and, whatever she did, not to leave the trunk open, and let any one steal those things out of there that he had given her; and if she did, she would go to the poorhouse; and to keep her trunk keys on her person day and night."

After the conversation last detailed by the witness, Thomas became much worse late on Friday evening, and Dr. McGuire was again sent for. He arrived at eight o'clock that night, and left a little after eight. Thomas grew rapidly worse after the doctor left, and the witness Fannie Coles testifies "that Thomas called Bettie and said to her, 'Oh, Bettie, I am a mighty sick man,—sicker than you have any idea about;' and he says, 'Bettie, where are those things I have given you?' She says, 'In my trunk, safe.' And he says, 'Bettie, where are your trunk keys?' And she said to him, 'I have got them in my bosom, here.' And he said, 'That is right, Bettie; keep your keys on your person.' And he says, 'Bettie, make sure of it again; I have given you everything I possess in this world.' He says, 'Fannie, you hear me give them to Bettie again, don't you?' I said, 'Yes, sir.' He says, 'Now, Fannie, remember.' And he said, 'Bettie, I am sicker than ever I was in my life.' And Bettie says, 'I shall send for the doctor.' He says, 'Oh, Bettie, I don't think he can do much good.' Then he turned to her, and he says, 'Oh, Bettie, remember, now, I have given you everything;' and he turned over and complained of a severe pain in his side, and in a few minutes he was dead."

It is vehemently charged that the testimony of Fannie Coles, as to the factum of the gift, is false; that it is the result of a conspiracy with Bettie Lewis to defraud the legal distributees of William A. Thomas; that no such gift as she testifies to was ever made. The charge is easily asserted; but law, logic, and a decent respect for human nature all require clear and indubitable proof to induce judicial credence to such an atrocity. Why should this witness not be believed? Why should a court of justice, in the teeth of her clear, consistent, convincing and uncontradicted testimony, gratuitously brand her as a perjured conspirator with Bettie Thomas Lewis, without a particle of evidence, of either an uncontradicted or credible witness or a circumstance, simply because William A. Thomas, a dying father, with many years' infallible knowledge of her intelligence and integrity had called upon her, with his expiring breath, to witness and attest the consummation of the life-long solicitude of his heart, and his constantly declared purpose to provide amply, at his death, for his cherished child, and in a legal method, with parental piety, shed his parting benediction and blessing on "a duteous daughter's head?" Her statements in evidence are consistent throughout; they are natural, reasonable, and most probable, in themselves; while they are corroborated by the evidence of Dr. McGuire, Stephen B. Hughes, the dying declaration of William A. Thomas himself, and by all the concomitant circumstances of the res gestæ. She is wholly unimpeached in any of the ways known to the law, and her character for truth is as fair as that of any other witness in the cause. She is the daughter of a wealthy farmer of Albemarle county, and her mother was a colored woman of mixed blood. She resided with her father in his house, where he employed white persons to teach her, till she was sent, at the age of thirteen years, to the normal high school in Richmond for several years, when she became a teacher in the public schools of Virginia for five years or more, until, her health failing, she became the chosen companion of Bettie Lewis in her father's house for many years previous and up to his death. She was thirty years old when she testified, and had lived in Virginia all her life; and she was subjected to a protracted and pertinacious cross-examination, which reviewed, with microscopic and relentless scrutiny, her whole life, and which disclosed no single circumstance affecting her moral character or discrediting her triple armor of truth. No material statement of fact, made by her in her testimony, is contradicted by any other witness. It is strenuously asserted that she is contradicted by Dr. McGuire; but this is neither just nor true in fact. She says that, when she went to Dr. McGuire's office on Friday morning to let him know (as he had instructed the night before should be done) the condition of Mr. Thomas, the doctor inquired of her whether Mr. Thomas had made any will; that she told him he had not; that Mr. Thomas had given Bettie everything the night before; and that Dr. McGuire replied, "It was not worth a cent." Dr. McGuire does not remember Fannie's then telling him about Thomas' having given his property to Bettie the night before; but he says, "The conversation between Fannie and myself took place while a good many patients were waiting to see me. She may have stated it, though I am entirely unable to recall it. My memory is not very perfect about such things." The statement of Fannie Coles is positive as to what was said; while Dr. McGuire merely says he does not recall it, though he admits that, for the very sufficient reasons he gives, her statement may be true. But it is made obviously and undoubtedly true by what Dr. McGuire then immediately did and said. Soon after Fannie Coles left his office, he went to see Mr. Thomas, and he says: "Bettie told me, after I got in the house, that her father had given her the keys, his bank book, and papers, as far as I can recollect. I think she told me she had put them in the top bureau drawer. She told me he had given them to her. They were to be hers. I told her they were not worth a cent; that unless he made a will the law would give her nothing." Dr. McGuire had never conceived of a gift mortis causa, and therefore, in his oft-expressed solicitude for Mr. Thomas to provide for Bettie by will, he told Bettie, as he had told Fannie Coles in his office but an hour or two before, that the gift to Bettie was "not worth a cent, and that unless her father made a will the law would give her nothing."

Fannie Coles testified before Dr. McGuire did, and she is corroborated by both the language and substance of Dr. McGuire's statement; and even if this were not so, it would be Dr. McGuire's mere failure of recollection, which happens daily in judicial investigations without giving rise to a suspicion of untruthfulness in the witness. Fannie Coles' testimony in minute detail of the making of this dying gift of his property by William A. Thomas to his daughter Bettie is corroborated by Dr. McGuire's statement of what passed between him and Mr. Thomas in the chamber of death within an hour of his last breath. Dr. McGuire had in his mid-day visit to Mr. Thomas, on Friday, told him of his extreme illness, and for the last time of often-repeated admonitions to him, of the urgency and duty of his making his will to provide against his leaving his daughter penniless, and to the tender mercies of his uncared-for collateral kindred; and he asked Mr. Thomas' consent to his sending to him a lawyer to write his will. Accordingly, he had sent Mr. M. M. Gilliam out in the early afternoon of that day. Mr. Gilliam stayed only a few minutes—8 or 10—at most, and left the premises. Mr. Thomas became rapidly and alarmingly worse, and Dr. McGuire was summoned, and arrived upon the scene at about 8 o'clock that night, and left a few minutes thereafter, leaving directions as to what was to be done for Mr. Thomas that night. He states: "After that was finished, I said to him, 'Has Mr. Gilliam been here?' 'Yes,' he answered, 'that's all right, doctor,' with a waive of his hand, as if the matter was settled, and looked to me as if he expected me to approve of what he had said. I said to him, 'I am glad you have done it. You have only done justice.' He then said, 'You will be very well satisfied, or perfectly satisfied, with what I have done.'" What had this dying, devoted father "done," to repair his failure to convey the valuable city lots to Dr. McGuire as trustee for his daughter, and to build costly houses thereon, and to provide for her by will, when, with his expiring breath, he calmly and coolly assures Dr. McGuire's iterated, and over and over again reiterated, anxiety about provision for his daughter Bettie,—"That's all right, doctor. You will be very well satisfied, or perfectly satisfied, with what I have done." He meant, and could only mean, that he "had done" that ample provision for his daughter that he always assured Dr. McGuire he intended to make,—not by will, but by giving and delivering to her, on his deathbed, the bulk of his personal property, which was just as effectual, and just as legal, as a will.

It is argued that Mr. Thomas did not make the gift mortis causa of his property to his child Bettie, as distinctly and incontrovertibly proved, because of his oft and emphatic statement of intention to provide for her by will; and time and time again, it is argued that, in the eight or ten minutes of Mr. Gilliam's presence, with him alone, in the death chamber, only a brief time on Friday afternoon before he expired, he made an appointment with Mr. Gilliam to go to Mr. Gilliam's office the next day to have his will written. Aside from the utter improbability, not to say impossibility, of an enfeebled and dying old man, in the country, beyond the limits of the city of Richmond, making an engagement at 4 o'clock P. M. to arise from what proved to be his deathbed early that night, and to come into the city and to a lawyer's office the next day, there is no evidence in the record of any such purpose or possibility. What passed between Mr. Thomas and Mr. Gilliam, in those eight or ten minutes, we can never judicially know. Thomas is dead; and Mr. Gilliam, one of the counsel for appellant, has declined to testify in this case. The appellant, by his cross-examination, elicited from Dr. McGuire: "I think Mr. Gilliam told me a short time afterwards that Mr. Thomas, in his interview with him, said there were some papers that he wanted to get hold of, then out of reach, and that he had postponed the making of his will until the next day. I think he had an appointment with Mr. Gilliam for the next day. I think Mr. Gilliam said this." Both this question and answer were objected to by the plaintiffs as illegal. Mr. Gilliam's attitude, of the Sphinx, cannot be operated, as hearsay evidence in this case, by any Cedipus, however respectable; and, howsoever important or interesting Mr. Gilliam's pregnancy of what occurred in that brief interview with the dying man may be, he cannot be delivered by the process of obstetrics, unknown to the science of the law. If, too, the field of conjecture be open, it is the most reasonable supposition that if Mr. Thomas did, in fact, want his will written the next day, it was only for the purpose of devising to his daughter, in addition to the personal property he had given her, his valuable real estate, which he knew could not be given except by deed or will. While no witness testifies that Thomas ever said that he intended to give his whole estate to his daughter, yet he frequently declared his purpose to provide for her liberally, and no one ever heard him say that he intended to give anything to any one else; and the plain and positive proof is that he did not intend (but emphatically asserted to the contrary) that his collateral kindred should have any part of "what he had at his death." To whom, then, but his daughter, must he have intended his property to go at his death? If he had left her his whole estate by a will, instead of the larger part, only, by donatio mortis causa, all just-minded persons would have said, as Dr. McGuire's last utterance to him, "You have only done justice."

Mr. Stephen B. Hughes testifies: "I was at Thomas' house the night of his death. I asked Bettie Lewis where Mr. Thomas' keys were. She said that she had them; that her father had given them to her, and told her to lock them up; that they were hers, and not to give them to anybody. I heard Fannie Coles say that she was present when Mr. Thomas gave Bettie Lewis the keys, and told her to lock them up and not to give them to anybody,—that they were hers (Bettie Lewis', I mean), and took me into the back chamber, and showed me the trunk that they were locked up in." And this witness says that this fact, together with what Mr. Thomas had previously told him were his intentions towards Bettie, were his reasons for offering to deliver to Bettie the duplicate set of keys which he held. When Bettie Lewis told Dr. McGuire, as she unquestionably did tell him, on Friday, before he had seen Mr. Thomas, and just as he was about to enter Mr. Thomas' room, that her father had made the gift to her, she might reasonably have known that he would mention it to her father, as he was urging him to make a will; and it is impossible to believe, without contradicting all human experience, that she would ever have made this statement to Dr. McGuire, at the time and under the circumstances, if it had been false and fabricated, as alleged. Those declarations of Bettie Lewis and Fannie Coles, as well as the declaration of Bettie Lewis to Mr. Hughes, are competent evidence, on both of two grounds,—as part of the res gesta, and as the declaration of a party in possession, and to rebut and repel the inference sought to be drawn from the testimony of the witness for the appellants, Watkins, as to the silence of Bettie Lewis in respect to her claim, in her interview with him on Monday night next after Thomas died. It is insisted that her silence on that occasion as to any gift made to her by her father was equivalent to an admission that none had been made; that she had no claim, and pretended to none. Shall it be, in a court of justice, that she may not repel this inference by the testimony of Dr. McGuire and Stephen B. Hughes that she had, to them, on prior occasions, asserted her claim? If the silence of Bettie Lewis as to the gift, in her conversation with Watkins on Monday night, is a circumstance prejudicial to her claim, what is the significance of the assertion of her claim on Friday night before—the night that Thomas died—to Mr. Hughes, and to Dr. McGuire on Friday morning, while Mr. Thomas was yet living? What she said to Mr. Hughes was only in reply to his direct inquiry about the keys; and Watkins did not in that conversation, on Monday night, ask her anything about the keys; and she did not make any statement to Watkins then about the gift, because (it may have been) of intuitive distrust, or because Dr. McGuire had told her, as he had told Fannie Coles, that the gift "was not worth a cent." Dr. McGuire as before stated, had never heard of such a thing, in law, as a gift mortis causa; and she relying on Dr. McGuire's opinion, and not then having consulted any lawyer about the matter, there was no occasion for her to mention the gift in that conversation with Watkins.

Mr. Thomas was buried on Sunday. On the night of Monday, the next day, Watkins called to see Bettie, and he says that she did not then say to him that her father had given her his money, his bank book, or other securities, or the key to his box in the bank or his safe at Drewry & Co's, and that she did then say, "as there was no will, she supposed that all she would have was the property held by me as trustee, and that she wished I would see Mr. Gilliam in her behalf." This statement, if true, has already been explained by what Dr. McGuire and others had so impressively told Bettie Lewis would be her condition if her father died without a will; but is it not manifestly impossible for Bettie Lewis to have affirmed positively, as a fact in her knowledge, on Monday night, that Mr. Thomas had left "no will, and she knew it," when then there had been no opening or examination of Mr. Thomas' papers or places of safe deposit? Dr. McGuire says: "Bettie Lewis certainly did not know that before the old man's death; for she and Fannie both told me that they didn't know whether the old man had made a will or not, when Mr. Gilliam was there."

Bettie Lewis has been prepotently denied the privilege of testifying in this case, notwithstanding the great concern she has at stake, and simple justice demands that the statements of this witness, Watkins, for the appellant, should be tested by all the touchstones of truth,—probability and consistency, which are the fixed standards of evidence. Out of the mouth of this witness himself the records show that he involves himself in flat and flagrant self contradictions; but, first, his attitude and animus in the case are manifested by his interview with Bettie Lewis on Thursday night, next following. He says: "I told Bettie Lewis that I had been to see Mr. Gilliam for her, and stated the case to him the best I could; and he said it was impossible to make a case of it, and that he was sorry he could not do something for her. She said it made no difference, that she had employed other counsel, viz., Judge Waddill, Judge Christian, and Edgar Allen. She then said she was very much obliged to me for seeing Mr. Gilliam for her. I said to her, I had nothing but her interest at stake, and that I would be glad to know exactly what Mr. Thomas said to her in his last moments. Fannie Coles, who was sitting near by, said: 'Bettie, Judge Christian told you not to talk to any one on the subject.' I said, 'If such are your instructions, I certainly don't want to hear anything about it.'" By this, Mr. Watkins' own version, it appears that, after Bettie Lewis had told him she had confided her case to the counsel of her choice he, adroitly and artfully prefacing his question with the professing of his disinterested solitude for her interest at stake, asked her to tell him "exactly what Mr. Thomas said to her in his last moments." The object of this attempt is obvious enough; but by the significance of Mr. Watkins' attitude in this case, as disclosed by the record, it is made perspicuously plain. Fannie Coles' account of this interview, in response to the 287th cross-question, shows that Mr. Watkins used importunity and expostulation in his endeavor to induce Bettie Lewis to let him "know exactly what Mr. Thomas said to her in his last moments," and that it was not until he had been repeatedly denied and thwarted in his attempt that he said, (if indeed, he said it at all,) "If such are your instructions, I certainly don't want to hear anything about it." Fannie Coles says: "Mr. Watkins came out there one night, and asked Bettie about her father giving her the keys. Her reply was to him: 'Mr. Watkins, I do not care to talk on that subject at all.' Mr. Watkins turned to me, and said: 'Fannie, don't you think Bettie ought to tell me all about the keys, for I am just the same to her as her father?' I said: 'Mr. Watkins, I don't know anything about that. She has her lawyers, and she ought to do as they told her to do.' And Mr. Watkins said: 'Now, Fannie, you know there is nothing in the world that I would not do for Bettie.' I said: 'You and Bettie can suit yourselves about the matter. I have no more to say.' Mr. Watkins again asked her. She said: 'Mr. Watkins, I do not care to talk on that subject to-night.' And I remember now, as you mention the subject, that Mr. Watkins said to her: 'Bettie, I only came out here to-night to find out all about those keys.'" The record shows that this witness, who professed that he had nothing but Bettie Lewis' interest in view, and who had promised Mr. Thomas (as he says) on the 16th day of February, 1878, "I will do the very best for her as long as I live," and who undertook to see Mr. Gilliam for the purpose of stating "her case" to him, and of seeing whether he "could make a case of it," was, a day or two after, if not at the very time, he was inviting Bettie Lewis' confidence on the ground of his fatherly interest in and for her, actually conferring with Mr. Thomas' next of kin, and entertaining a proposition to be appointed one of the curators, which only failed because Mr. Pace (Page) objected to going his security, and that, although he averred his intimate knowledge of Mr. Thomas' affairs, yet he refused to tell what he knew when requested so to do by Bettie Lewis' counsel. And this witness, (except a Mr. Gravely, who knows nothing) is the only witness who has been found to defeat the fully attested claim of Bettie Lewis to her father's bounty. He fixes Monday night, next after Mr. Thomas' death, as the date he was out at Mr. Thomas' house, by the fact that he went there to see an insurance policy; and he was certain he saw the policy there that night, and he swears that he is certain that he saw Clay Thomas there that same evening. Yet he swears that it was on Thursday night that he went to see, and did see and examine, the policy, and that it was on Thursday night that he first saw Clay Thomas there. This is the unenviable attitude of this, the only witness to support the contest of Mr. Thomas' collateral kindred, and to defeat his dying disposition of the bulk of his personal property.

The testimony and the circumstances relied on by the appellant to show that no such gift was made by Mr. Thomas as sworn to by Fannie Coles, and attested by corroborating facts, do not, we think, furnish a sufficient basis for even reasonable conjecture; much less to assure the guarded discretion of a court of justice. The circumstance that there is but one direct witness to the gift, competent to testify, (the appellant declining to allow the donee as a witness when offered,) does not affect the validity of the gift. One witness, if credible, is sufficient. The law does not require more than one; and especially, as in this case, when that one is not only unimpeached, but corroborated. Nor does the magnitude of the gift affect its validity. It may extend to the whole of the donor's personal estate. The law fixes no limit. In the case of Duffield v. Elwes, 1 Bligh, N. S. 497, the gift causa mortis was of the value of $165,000. In Hatch v. Atkinson, 56 Me. 327, 96 Am. Dec. 464; the court says: "The common law does not require the gift to be executed in the presence of any stated number of witnesses; nor does it limit the amount of the property that may thus be disposed of." Ward v. Turner, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 2, p. 1251, note; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. 132-136.

The factum of the gift in this case being clearly and conclusively proved, as we think it indisputably has been, it only remains to state the law, and apply it to the facts proved. They show all the essential attributes or constituent elements of a donatio mortis causa, as defined by the law and established by the course of adjudication. The gift was made in periculo mortis, under the apprehension of death as imminent; and it was of personal property, such as, under the law, may be the subject of a gift mortis causa. Possession of delivery was made at the time of the gift; and the donor died of that illness in a few hours after the making of the gift. Thus the gift, inchoate, conditional, and defeasible when made, became absolute at the donor's death. Delivery is essential. It may be either actual, by manual tradition of the subject of the gift, or constructive, by delivery of the means of obtaining possession. Constructive delivery is always sufficient when actual, manual delivery is either impracticable or inconvenient. The contents of a warehouse, trunk, box, or other depository may be sufficiently delivered by delivery of the key of the receptacle. Jones v. Selby, Prec. in Ch. 300; Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 431; 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 1205; Jones v. Brown, 34 N. H. 445; Cooper v. Burr, 45 Barb. 10; Penfield

v. Thayer, 2 E. D. Smith, 805; Westerlo v. Dewitt, 86 N. Y. 841, 98 Am. Dec. 517; Ellis v. Secor, 81 Mich. 185, 18 Am. Rep. 178; Hillebrand v. Brewer, 6 Tex. 45, 55 Am. Dec. 757; Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh, 838, 26 Am. Dec. 322; Stephenson v. King, 81 Ky. 425, 50 Am. Rep. 178; Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. 182.

Many cases were cited by the appellant. In some of them it did not appear that there was any intention to give, while in others the delivery of possession was not complete; the donor intentionally retaining control or dominion. In the cases of Miller v. Jeffress, 4 Gratt. 472; Lewis v. Mason, 84 Va. 781; Yancey v. Field, 85 Va. 756; Rowe v. Marchant, 86 Va. 177,—there was no delivery whatever, either actual or constructive. The delivery of the keys to Bettie Lewis, with words of gift, by her father upon his deathbed, invested her with the same means of obtaining possession that Thomas had, and made her the owner, with title defeasible only by recovery or revocation of the donor, or by a deficiency of assets to pay creditors; and the mere existence in Stephen B. Hughes' hands of a duplicate set of keys, for precaution against loss or accident, which he had no right or authority to use, did not impair the validity of the gift which he did make to his daughter in his last moments, in the most unqualified manner; and being thus invested with lawful ownership, the law, in case of refusal by the officers of the bank, would open the doors to her. It is contended that the gift was testamentary, because of the words in the affidavits of Bettie Lewis and Fannie Coles,—“were hers in case of his death;” “to be hers in case of his death.” The affidavits were prepared by counsel and certified by the notary as a predication for the appointment of receivers, and they were not intended, and could not be regarded, as evidence; and they do not purport to give the language of the affiants, nor to state the language and actions, in detail, of Mr. Thomas in making the gift. But even if Mr. Thomas had used the very words, “to be hers in case of his death,” it would have been but expressing in terms the very definition, substance, and form of a gift mortis causa, as given by all the law-writers and adjudged cases,—that it is conditional, defeasible, not to be absolute and irrevocable unless and until the death of the donor from the impending peril, under the apprehension of which the gift was made. Bouvier, Law Dict. “Donatio mortis causa,” 1 Abbott, Law Dict. 402; 2 Jacobs, Law Dict. 807; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1146; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. 2d ed. chap. 5, § 185; Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. 198, 25 Am. Dec. 878; Grover v. Grover, 24 Pick. 261, 35 Am. Dec. 319; Gano v. Flak, 43 Ohio St. 462, 54 Am. Rep. 819; Taylor v. Henry, 48 Md. 550, 80 Am. Rep. 486.

The cases in which gifts made in similar and identical language by dying donors have been held to be valid donations mortis causa are numerous; the principle being that the expression, “In case of my death it is yours,” or like words, do not of themselves make a testamentary disposition, but merely express the condition which the law annexes to every donation mortis causa. Snellgrove v. Baily, 3 Atk. 214; English notes to Ward v. Turner, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 1222; Ashbrook v.

Ryon, 3 Bush, 228, 93 Am. Dec. 481; Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 318.

In the case of Sterling v. Wilkinson, 83 Va. 791, the gift was made more than three years before the donor died, and was not made in view of death impending; and the donor actually did retain and exercise control over the subject of the gift by disposing of so many of the bonds as were necessary to indemnify his indorsers. In the case of Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500, the decision turned alone on the construction and legal effect of the indorsement upon the certificate by the donor: “Pay to Martin Basket; . . . no one else; then not until my death.” This was held to be a testamentary disposition; but in the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Matthews says: “The certificate was payable on demand; and it is unquestionable that a delivery of it to the donee with an indorsement in blank, or a special indorsement to the donee, or without indorsement, would have transferred the whole title and interest of the donor in the fund represented by it, and might have been valid as a donatio mortis causa.”

It is contended that the gift by Thomas, in this case, was invalid because it comprised the bulk of his estate. The jus disponendi is the essential value and element of property, and the exercise of that right is commended in the beatitude, “It is more blessed to give than to receive.” By the law of Virginia a person may make a dying disposition of all of his personal property, donatio mortis causa; and there is no limit as to the extent of the gift,—whatever of the whole or of the part,—inter vivos or donatio mortis causa. Such limitation can only be by express legislation, and the courts are invested with no such function. The Roman or civil law of donationes mortis causa did recognize the limitation or restriction; but the common law does not limit the amount, absolute or comparative, of the personal estate which may thus be disposed of. Michener v. Dale, 23 Pa. 59; Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 481; Hatch v. Atkinson, 56 Me. 327, 96 Am. Dec. 464; White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 2, p. 1251; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. 182-186.

It is contended that the gift in this case comes within the operation of section 2414 of the Code of Virginia; and as the donor and donee resided together at the time of the gift, possession by the donee at the common place of residence was not sufficient, and for that reason the gift must fail. The section is: “No gift of any goods or chattels shall be valid unless by deed or will, or unless actual possession shall have come to and remained with the donee, or some person claiming under him. If the donor and donee reside together at the time of the gift, possession at the place of their residence shall not be a sufficient possession, within the meaning of this section.” In the construction of statutes the general rule is that the words used in the statute are to be construed according to their natural and ordinary, popular and accepted, use and meaning, unless it plainly appear that it was intended by the Legislature to give to them a different, special, and extraordinary meaning. All the law-writers use the simple term “gift,” when used without qualification, to express the "ordinary gift" or "simple gift" which transfers an absolute and irrevocable title to the donee, as contradistinguished from the extraordinary and technical gift mortis causa, which is made under the apprehension of impending death, and transfers only a conditional, defeasible, and revocable interest. The peculiar gift mortis causa is always designated by its special, technical name; and it is never understood or intended to be embraced or expressed by the term "gift," merely. A gift mortis causa is a very different thing from a "gift," in many essential particulars. 2 Kent, Com. lecture 88; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. 2d ed. § 64. The policy of the section (2414) originated in 1757, and again in 1758 and in 1787, in the Revised Code of 1819, in the Code of 1849 and in the Code of 1887; and in none of these enactments is the special, peculiar, and distinctive technical descriptive phrase, "gifts mortis causa," to be found. The mischief intended to be guarded against in the policy of the statute was as to gifts inter vivos; and until 1849 it was applicable only to gifts of slaves. Then it was made to embrace all "goods and chattels;" but it would violate both reason and analogy to hold that in its new, any more than in its ancient, form, it would embrace gifts mortis causa. It is an established rule of construction that the existing law is not intended to be changed unless such intention plainly appear; and the inference is irresistible that the Legislature did not intend to abrogate the common law of donatio mortis causa, without having expressly, and by proper descriptive legal language, said so. Paramore v. Taylor, 11 Gratt. 242, 243; Wenonah S. B. Owners v. Bragdon, 21 Gratt. 695; Durham v. Dunk'y, 6 Rand. (Va.) 189. The disposition of personal property by donatio mortis causa has been a principle and practice of the common law, both in England and in the states of this Union, for centuries past; and although, since the day of Lord Hardwicke, there have been extrajudicial utterances in deprecation of it, it is to-day a fixed principle of enlightened jurisprudence in all civilized countries. It is the imperative function of the courts to interpret and operate the law as it is, not as they may think it ought to be.

In the able and elaborate opinion of Judge Leake, filed with the record in this case, he decided (saying "but certainly not without doubts," "the question to my mind is a very doubtful one") that the gift by Mr. Thomas of his bank book, showing the amount of his deposits in the Planters' National Bank, was ineffectual in law as a donatio mortis causa of the money to his credit in the said bank; and he decreed accordingly. In this, I am of the opinion the decree under review is erroneous, and that it should be, under the rule, in this particular, corrected in favor of the appellees, and in all other respects affirmed, but the majority of the court think the decree is wholly right, and that it must be affirmed as it is. Every species of personal property—in its largest sense—capable of delivery, actual or constructive, may be the subject of a valid gift mortis causa, including money, bank notes, stocks, bonds, notes, due bills, certificates of deposit, and any other written evidence of debt. Lee v. Book, 11 Gratt. 182, and cases there cited; Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh, 838, 26 Am. Dec. 822; 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 1205; Duffield v. Elwes, 1 Bligh, N. S. 497; Grover v. Grover, 24 Pick. 265, 85 Am. Dec. 819. In the case of Coleman v. Parker, 114 Mass. 83, it is said: "This term 'delivery' is not to be taken in such a narrow sense as to import that the chattel or property is to go literally into the hands of the recipient, and to be carried away. There are many articles which might be made the subjects of a donation mortis causa, in which a manual delivery of that kind might be inconvenient or impracticable. We have no doubt that a trunk, with its contents, might be effectually given and delivered in such a case by a delivery of the key." In the case of Cooper v. Burr, 45 Barb. 9, it is said: "The situation, relation, and circumstances of the parties, and of the subject of the gift, may be taken into consideration in determining the intent to give, and the fact as to delivery. A total exclusion of the power or means of resuming possession by the donor is not necessary." In Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh, 835, 26 Am. Dec. 822, Judge Carr said: "There are many things of which actual, manual tradition cannot be made, either from their nature or their situation at the time. It is not the intention of the law to take from the owner the power of giving these. It merely requires that he shall do what under the circumstances will in reason be considered equivalent to an actual delivery." In Hatch v. Atkinson, 56 Me. 824, 96 Am. Dec. 464, the court said that delivery must be as complete "as the nature of the property would admit of." See Wing v. Merchant, 57 Me. 883; Dole v. Lincoln, 81 Me. 422; Hillebrand v. Brewer, 6 Tex. 45, 55 Am. Dec. 757; Noble v. Smith, 2 Johns. 52, 8 Am. Dec. 899; Jones v. Brown, 34 N. H. 445; Marsh v. Fuller, 18 N. H. 360. In Stephenson v. King, 81 Ky. 425, 50 Am. Rep. 173, the court, referring to the case of Aslibrook v. Ryon, as to the bank book, says: "What evidence the pass-book contains of the deposit in that case does not appear. If an ordinary pass-book, (and it must be so inferred,) it was an acknowledgment by the bank that the donor had to his credit in the bank that much money; and when actually delivered, we cannot see why it did not pass the right." Suppose Mr. Thomas, instead of having certificates of deposits made and entered by the bank in his bank book, had taken a separate receipt or certificate of deposit for each deposit at the time it was made. Would not the delivery, with words of gift of each one, of such receipts or certificates of deposit have been as effectual in law to pass the title to his money in bank as the delivery of the letter in Stephenson v. King, or the attorney's receipt for claims in his hands for collection in Elam v. Keen? Mr. Thomas' bank book had just been written up or balanced by the bank and it showed on its face the balance due to him by the bank. It was the bank's acknowledgment of indebtedness to Thomas, and the only voucher or evidence which he had, upon which the law implies a promise to pay; and it was transferable by delivery without writing, like any other chose in action. It passed the equitable title, and that is sufficient. The "beneficial owner" of any chose in action may sue upon it in his own name. Va. Code 1887, § 2860. There is a difference between a savings bank pass-book and an ordinary bank book, in that by a special method and agreement, on the mere presentation of the savings bank pass-book, the bank will pay, but this is the mere special mode of dealing agreed on by the parties in that case; and, though the bank would have the right to require evidence to satisfy it that Mr. Thomas had duly delivered, with words of gift sufficient in law to transfer his title to his money in the bank to his donee, Bettie Lewis, his daughter, yet that would not, any more than in the case of the keys, affect her title and right to demand the money, which the law would enforce.

This case was first argued before Chancellor Fitzhugh, and submitted for his decision; but he died in a few days, leaving nothing to show what conclusion he would have reached upon the facts. He had (as it appears by what is stated in the petition for appeal) noted down a few platitudes or propositions of law, which (no more than if he had copied the Decalogue) do not afford the slightest clue as to what he would have decreed upon the facts under the law.

We have given to this case elaborate consideration and the closest scrutiny; and upon the law and the facts, our judgment is to affirm the decree of the Chancery Court of the city of Richmond.

Lewis, P.:

I concur in the opinion that the decree of the chancery court ought to be affirmed, and add a few words to what has been said by the court, only because of the reliance for the appellant upon the case of Yancey v. Field, 85 Va. 756. It has been asserted that that was a case of a gift mortis causa, which this court refused to sustain, because of its want of compliance with the statute, now carried into section 2414 of the Code. In other words, that this court, in that case, construed that statute as applying to gifts mortis causa. There is no warrant whatever of such a proposition. In the first place, it was not claimed that the alleged gift in that case was a gift of that description. On the contrary, it was distinctly claimed as a gift inter vivos. The petition filed in the lower court, after stating that Judge Field died indebted to Yancey, further averred as follows: "Your petitioners further represent that the said James P. Yancey, a short time before his death, gave to your petitioner, Edmonia, the indebtedness to him by the said R. H. Field, she, the said Edmonia, being a niece of the said Jas. P. Yancey; that the bonds evidencing said indebtedness could not be delivered, as they had been filed with the commissioner in the said suit of Yancey v. Field. And your petitioners insist that they are, by virtue of the said gift, entitled to the said indebtedness, and to have the said debts indorsed for their benefit." The same counsel who prepared this petition argued the case for the appellees in this court, and both in his oral and printed arguments he insisted that the alleged gift was valid as a completed gift inter vivos. In his brief, filed with the record, he said: "The testimony proves not only the gift, but that it was a completed gift inter vivos."

18 L. R. A.

And, again: "In the case at bar there is no claim, by virtue of a nuncupative will or other testamentary act. From the very first the gift was claimed as an act inter vivos." It will thus be seen that the case was presented to the lower court and to this court as a gift inter vivos and as such it was dealt with. As the appellees themselves admitted that there had been no delivery of the subject-matter, that, as the court said, was decisive of the case, whether viewed as an intended gift inter vivos or mortis causa; and this was all that was necessary to the decision of the case. Reference, however, was made in the opinion to some of the general principles of the common law relating to gifts, and to the difference between the two classes of gifts, attention being especially called to the necessity of a delivery in all cases. And as illustrative merely, or rather to call attention to the fact that the common-law requirement of delivery in case of a verbal gift had been incorporated in our statute law, the statute was referred to. The court, however, did not say the statute was intended to apply to gifts mortis causa, for no such question, as we have seen, was before the court; and, therefore, the expression of any opinion on that subject would have been purely obiter. This, indeed, is so obvious from the opinion itself, that I ought, perhaps, to beg pardon for adding anything to what has been said in the opinion of the court in this case.

Lacy, J., dissenting:

As appears from the opinion of the majority of the court, this is a suit to enforce against the administrator of a dead man's estate an alleged gift of the whole estate, amounting to over $200,000, which alleged gift is claimed to have been made by the decedent in disregard of all of his heirs and distributees,—his next of kin,—a few minutes before his death, to a colored woman living in his house, who claims to be the result of illicit intercourse with a colored slave woman. It also appears from the opinion of the majority that the alleged gift consisted of goods and chattels in the house and goods and chattels out of the house, where the alleged donor and donee resided together. The claim is that the goods and chattels in question were, as to certain keys, pocketbook, and two pocket-knives, actually delivered into the donee's possession. That money, etc., in a bank vault, and money, etc., in an iron safe, and money on deposit in bank subject to check, were symbolically delivered by the delivery of the keys and the pass-book of the bank, in which deposits were entered. It is not pretended that there was any further delivery than such as I have mentioned, either as to the thing delivered or the manner of its delivery. So that, if everything was done in manner and form as this woman Lewis alleges, then the gift was made by the donor to the donee, at their common residence, with delivery of possession of keys as to the great bulk of the property given, and not actual delivery. Let us consider first whether the goods and chattels in question could pass from the donor to the donee in this way, and become the property of the donee. Our statute laws provide general rules as to the creation and limitation of estates, and their qualities, and the manner of making valid gifts is regulated by the law from the earliest times of which we have any account. The law has, to a greater or less degree, thrown some protection around the estates of dying men, and provided safeguards against the perjuries and frauds employed by the designing to obtain the possession of the estates of the deceased person. Of those I will speak briefly hereafter.

It is profitable to consider first what are the regulations to be found in the Virginia law, prescribing general rules as to the creation of estates. It is provided by law in this state that "no gift of any goods and chattels shall be valid unless by deed or will, or unless actual possession shall have come to and remained with the donee or some person claiming under him. If the donor and donee reside together at the time of the gift, possession at the place of their residence shall not be sufficient possession within the meaning of this section." Va. Code, § 2414, chap. 107, p. 591. It must be admitted—it cannot be denied—that Thomas and Bettie Lewis were domiciled together. It is also distinctly proved that they did reside together at the time of the alleged gift. It is equally true that no actual possession ever came to Bettie Lewis of any important part of the large estate said to have been given to her, and that there was no possession of any sort except such as may be construed to pass with the key to the bank vault box and iron safe, of which another person had a duplicate key, and with the pass-book of the bank. The pocketknives and some notes were actually delivered into Bettie Lewis' hand, but even this was at their common domicile, where they resided together. This statute is conclusive of the case, unless in some way it can be avoided. This is attempted to be done by the assertion that this statute does not apply to this kind of gift; that this statute was made to protect creditors, and to prevent fraudulent acts, by way of gifts falsely alleged to be made, from defrauding creditors of their just debts, and that a gift of this sort does not affect creditors. But there is no language of this sort to be found in this section nor in this entire chapter. It does not treat of the rights of creditors as against the claims of fraudulent alienees. Chapter 109 of the Code treats "of acts valid between the parties, but void as to creditors and purchasers." This chapter, as its title declares, prescribes general rules as to the creation and termination of estates and their qualities. Section 2414 enacts a general rule as to all gifts, and prescribes what shall be necessary in order to create an estate in goods and chattels by a valid gift, and declares all gifts not so made invalid. No gift of any goods or chattels shall be valid unless, etc. This is an alleged gift, alleged to have been made by a donor to a donee, when donor and donee resided together at the time of the alleged gift. The word "gift" is not limited, but is used in its full signification. If this term does not include this kind of gift, what word could be used to describe it? If the statute was intended to apply to gifts inter vivos only, why is the word "will" in the statute? Gifts inter vivos are not given by will; a will takes effect at the death of the testator. A gift inter vivos is not—cannot be—bestowed by will. It may be by deed or by actual and complete delivery of possession, so as to cut off and determine the possession, control, and dominion of the former owner; otherwise it is incomplete, and, being without consideration, cannot be enforced. A will is the appropriate method to give gifts to take effect after the death of the testator or donor; bequests and legacies are allowed and enforced against the executor, or persons entitled without a will. If a will is not made, then there is allowed, by the law, a gift, which has certain characteristics and attributes appropriately signified by the words "mortis causa." Among other things, it is revocable by the recovery of the sick man from the impending peril which threatened him. But it is well settled that, like all other gifts, and as a gift, it must be completely given, and actual possession consummated, so as to cut off the possession, control, and dominion of the donor; interrupt his possession just as completely as is necessary in all gifts. In other words, the same sort of delivery of possession is necessary in the one case as in the other. In this respect there is no difference between gifts, whether inter vivos or mortis causa. And when the kind of possession is prescribed by statute, that sort must be given, or there is no gift; the attempt is abortive, and the gift is invalid. I do not see any reason in construing this statute to limit the meaning of the word "gift" to one kind of gift only; the word applies to both kinds,—the reason of the law applies, as we well know, to the one as well as to the other. The statute has never been otherwise construed, but has been often construed in this state, and always in the same way, and I will cite the cases, and there are none per contra until this.

There is only one other state in the Union which embodies this statute in its Code of laws,—the state of West Virginia,—and there this statute has been construed, and construed in accordance with the Virginia decisions. Dirkeschied v. Exchange Bank, 28 W. Va. 340. It is there considered that the principal object which the Legislature had in view in the passage of the law as it stood in the Code of 1849 was to protect the estates of decedents from the rapacity of unscrupulous attendants residing with and constantly with and constantly surrounding them, and to prevent them from appropriating to their own use the slaves or other personal property belonging to the alleged donor. And just in proportion as his personal property was valuable and of a character to be readily appropriated was it the more necessary that, when claiming as a gift, the actual possession of the property should be required to come to and remain in good faith with the alleged donee. Where the donee resides with the donor, so many opportunities of unfair dealing may be found, and so many temptations to commit perjury may exist, the Legislature determined to render the same impossible by declaring that "no gift of goods or chattels should be valid unless actual possession shall have come to and remain with the donee, or some person claiming under him. And if the donor and donee reside together at the time of the gift, possession at the place of their residence shall not be sufficient possession within the meaning of this section." The delivery of everything which is claimed to have been delivered in this case is invalid under this statute. The money, stocks, bonds, etc., were never delivered at all, actually or otherwise. But it is said that the keys were actually delivered, and that the stocks, bonds, etc., were given and were not at the place of the common residence of the donor and donee, and so were not affected by the statute. The answer to this is that delivery is necessary, and here there is no delivery. If the delivery of the keys symbolized the valuables, the symbolical delivery was incomplete and invalid, and, if the keys and pocketknives were not validly given, then there was no gift, for nothing else is alleged to have been given. One of the learned counsel who argued this case here by brief insists that "it would be absurd to suggest that a delivery of keys and a pocketbook as representative or symbolical of the gifts would be valid gifts of chattels; and that the chattels themselves, if delivered as the symbols were, would be invalid and ineffectual." That would defeat the object and destroy the spirit of the statute. That would make the shadow more potent than the substance. Just here let us consider what becomes of the symbol itself in such a delivery of possession, for the symbol in this case was a key, a chattel, and that was the thing delivered, if anything was, at "the place of their residence." I think it is clear that the reason as well as the letter of the law applies equally to every species of property alleged to be the subject of the gift. This section first came into our law in the Code of 1849, where sections 2418 and 2414 of the present Code were embodied in section 1 of chapter 116. And the words, "if the donor and donee reside together at the time of the gift, possession at the place of their residence shall not be sufficient possession within the meaning of this section," first then appeared in our law. The Code of 1849 was not, like its predecessors, a compilation of revised statutes, but an Act of assembly, one of the chief objects of which, as expressed in the preamble to the Act, was to arrange the subjects under appropriate titles; and the title of chapter 107 of the present Code is a copy of the title of chapter 116 of that Code; so the Legislature there declared that this section prescribed prerequisites to a valid gift, and declared that to be the object of its enactment; and the revisers have provided the same language in the preamble to the present Code, to arrange them in appropriate titles, etc. The learned lawyers who revised and codified our laws appended to this section a note referring to the decisions construing this section (most of the marginal references being to decisions found in the Code of 1849, and decided, therefore, before the enactment of the law in question). The note is as follows: "Donatio mortis causa. Miller v. Jeffress, 4 Gratt. 472; Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. 182; Morrison v. Grubb, 23 Gratt. 842; Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500."

The first case referred to by the learned lawyers who composed the board of revisers as appropriate to this section, as to what is necessary to render valid a donatio mortis causa, is the case of Miller v. Jeffress, supra. That was a controversy over an alleged gift to the donee of bonds which the alleged donor held against him. The court rejected the claim of the donee. In that case Judge Allen said: "As the witnesses examined to prove the alleged donation vary somewhat as to the precise words used by the decedent, the certificate written and signed at the time, and referred to and recognized by the witnesses when giving their testimony, can be more safely relied on as showing what did actually occur than the recollection of the witnesses after so great an interval." The certificates and the depositions vary in this case, as I will hereafter show. Judge Allen said further: "The words themselves import a future benefit; . . . imply not a present donation, but a future enjoyment. The words were that his friend Jeffress should have all the bonds of his, in his possession. Viewing the words as clearly testamentary, that they were so intended, and not as importing any present gift or parting with dominion over the thing, I am of the opinion [says Judge Allen] the appellee is not entitled to claim the bonds as a donation causa mortis." In the same case Judge Baldwin said, in delivering the opinion of the court: "The court is of the opinion that the appellee, Jeffress, has shown no right to the bonds assigned to and placed in the hands of Jeffress & Co. [of which firm he was partner] by Paschal Folkes, deceased; the subsequent parol gift to said Jeffress under which he claims having never been perfected by delivery, which was not the less essential to its validity because the gift was in the donor's last sickness and in contemplation of approaching death. A donatio mortis causa is of a mixed character, being partly testamentary and partly donative. From an indulgence to the nature of the emergency, the law dispenses with the solemnities of a testament, and for that very reason requires the essentials of a gift." I will pause here to ask, What are the essentials of a gift in this state? My answer is: They are prescribed in section 2414 of the Code, supra,—by deed or will, or by actual possession delivered to the donee, and, if the donor and donee reside together, possession at the place of their residence is not sufficient. Judge Baldwin says further: "A delivery is indispensable to the validity of a donatio mortis causa. It must be an actual delivery of the thing itself, as of a watch or a ring, or of the means of getting the possession and enjoyment of the thing, as of a key of a trunk or a warehouse in which the thing is deposited; or, if the thing be in action, of the instrument, by using which the chose is to be reduced into possession, as a bond or a receipt, or the like. . . . It is the naked case of an abortive nuncupative will which the disappointed legatee is now seeking to convert into a donatio mortis causa."

In the case of Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. 185, Judge Moncre said: "Whether the donation was valid or not depends upon whether there was a sufficient delivery of possession to perfect the gift. All gifts, except by will, must be attended by delivery of possession to make them valid. Until such delivery, they are inchoate and revocable; indeed, mere nullities. The donation in this case, as found by the jury, was a donatio mortis causa. But there is no difference, in this respect, between donations mortis causa and inter vivos. The same kind of delivery of possession which is necessary to make good the one is necessary to make good the other." And in the case of Morrison v. Grubb, 28 Gratt. 350, Judge Anderson, delivering the opinion of the court, when speaking of the delivery of possession of a gift, says: "And it matters not whether it was a gift causa mortis or inter vivos." In a recent case in this court (Yancey v. Field, 85 Va. 756), the statute concerning gifts, which I have been considering, came up for consideration. The case was an alleged donatio causa mortis. The circuit court had sustained the gift, but this court, for want of compliance with the requirements of the statute (Va. Code, § 2414) as to delivery, reversed the trial court and refused to sustain the gift with reluctance, it being stated in the opinion: "This conclusion, however, has been reached not without reluctance. Had we the authority to execute the alleged gift, or, in other words, to give effect to the manifest intention of the decedent to aid this worthy lady, the court without hesitation would affirm the decree; but we have no such authority. Our province is not to make the law, but to administer it; and we must therefore decide this case according to the settled law as it is written, and not permit a hard case to make bad law." Blackstone says: "A true and proper gift is always accompanied with delivery of possession, and takes effect immediately." 2 Com. 441, citing Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 481; and, quoting from and citing Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500, says: "Indeed, we have a statute which expressly enacts that no gift of any goods or chattels shall be valid unless by deed or will, or unless accompanied by actual possession, and that, if the donor and donee reside together, possession at their residence will not suffice." Code, § 2414. It is, however, now decided in this case that this statute, so expressly quoted, and held by the unanimous opinion of this court in Yancey v. Field to render a gift mortis causa invalid, has no application to such an alleged gift. I am of opinion that the words of the statute clearly and unequivocally apply to all gifts. "No gift . . . shall be valid unless," is equivalent to "every gift shall be invalid unless;" and, as there was no delivery of possession, actual or otherwise, claimed except at the common residence of the alleged donor and donee, this supposed gift is invalid. So the law is written. The decision here must rest upon the assertion that a gift mortis causa is not a gift; that is, that the word "gift" does not apply to a gift with a particular motive. The words of the statute are general, and include all gifts, and they have been so distinctly held in this court up to this case. A gift is the voluntary transfer of a thing without consideration,—a transfer of the title to property to one who receives it without paying for it.

This case was first considered in the chancery court of Richmond by the late chancellor, Edward H. Fitzhugh, who died before decree in the cause, but not before he had partially written his opinion, and such was his eminence in his profession that his opinions have upon appeal here been several times adopted by this court in full, as the best exposition of his opinion that could be made of the law of the subject, and recorded as the opinion of the appellate court; and I have turned to his opinion to see what was his construction of the particular question upon which I think this case should be determined,—the delivery of possession set forth in the testimony. Judge Fitzhugh says, among other things: "The question in this case is whether the gift set up in the plaintiff's bill has been maintained as a valid gift causa mortis, under the law and the evidence, so as to confer a title to the property,—the subject of the gift,—to the donee. As was justly observed by one of the counsel in argument, the Statute of Descents and Distribution has long been held as a wise and just and natural disposition of a man's property if he chooses to die intestate. If he thinks proper to make a different disposition of his property than that prescribed by law in case of intestacy, he is at liberty to make a will. Our Statute of Wills can fully guard him against imposition in his dying hours. A man may make a gift causa mortis, but for obvious reasons the courts are extremely guarded and cautious in the establishment of such gifts. Every reason which the wisdom of the law deems to be necessary to establish a will applies with equal if not greater force to the establishment of a gift causa mortis; and because of the opening which this mode of transfer affords to fraud, the law watches it with jealousy and does not permit it, with its attendant uncertainties, to take the place of a will. It is apparent, if these remarks are sound, that the court should require the clearest proof of the donor's intention to make the gift, and of every requisite necessary to make a valid donation causa mortis. One of these requisites is delivery." And the learned chancellor, after quoting extensively from the case of Yancey v. Field, supra, recently decided here, says: "This, I think, is a sound exposition of the law. It conforms to the policy of the law, which watches this mode of transfer of property with so much caution and jealousy; and, moreover, it seems to be the view which our supreme court of appeals has taken of it, and which is therefore binding on this court" (chancery court of Richmond city). In view of these extracts, it cannot be doubted what his decision was to be in this case.

Mr. Minor, in his third volume, speaking of the mode of perfecting the gift of a chattel between donor and donee (referring to a separate head,—the mode of perfecting a gift of chattels as to third parties), after referring to actual delivery, or its equivalent when the thing was incapable of actual delivery, as a prerequisite to a valid gift, says: "The donor must part not only with the possession, but with the dominion of the property." Says further, at page 81: "Much embarrassment having arisen, when the donor and donee lived together (as, for example, in the case of father and child), in respect to what should be a sufficient delivery of the possession, it has been judicially enacted that 'if the donor and donee reside together at the time of the gift, possession at the place of their residence shall not be sufficient possession within the meaning of this section.'"

It was decided in this court in Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. (Va.) 764, that a parol gift of a slave to a son by his father, when they resided together, was void as between the donor and donee for want of actual possession. See also Hunter v. Jones, 6 Rand. (Va.) 541; Slaughter v. Tutt, 12 Leigh, 147; Tutt v. Slaughter, 5 Gratt. 334. This is a controversy as to the validity of a gift between the parties which is not valid as between them; that is, is no gift unless delivered in the mode prescribed by law.

I think this is conclusive of this case, but the learned chancellor who rendered the opinion appealed from has sustained the alleged gifts as to all except the alleged gift of the bank deposit by delivering the pass-book. As to this pass-book, I think he was right; as to all else, wrong. There was no valid gift, under the law, of anything. I do not consider it necessary to review the evidence, therefore, to sustain my view, as, admitting all that is claimed to be true, the gift was invalid for want of delivery; but I do not mean to concede that all that is testified to appears to me to be credible. It is an alleged gift of everything the donor possessed. This is the claim. Who was the donor? An infirm, sick man, advanced in years. At his bedside was the alleged donee, a colored married woman, acknowledged to be his child by the donor, no longer young. At her elbow another colored woman, which latter is the sole witness to prove the gift of this large estate, who, with much detail, recites the circumstances of the gift. No other person was present, no other witness was called in, although others were in the house. The gift is not of a trifle, or a competency merely, but of everything the donor had in the world. What are the circumstances that tended to discredit this sweeping gift of everything the donor had in the world?

First. The donor had an intimate friend who had been chosen by him (the donor) to hold certain property for the alleged donee, and to whom he had conveyed certain lots in Richmond in trust for the alleged donee, and to whom, in a long intimacy, he had often spoken concerning this woman, and to whom he had said that a large bequest to the donee in her situation would do her no good. When the trustee called, after the donor's death, the donee said Thomas had made no will. She supposed she would get nothing except what he held in trust for her. When the story of the keys, etc., was noised abroad, he called to inquire about it, and asked the donee about it, and expressed his interest in her. The single witness, who was again at her elbow, cautioned her to say nothing on the subject, alleging that this was the advice of her counsel.

Secondly. It is also shown that Thomas, the donor, was negotiating with another gentleman and had procured his consent to act as trustee,—to hold other property for the donee,—about the time of his death; so that he appears to have considered a trustee necessary to hold and protect such property as he should give her.

Thirdly. It is also shown that at the time of his death he had consulted with a lawyer about making his will, and had an engagement to attend at the lawyer's office the next day after his death, to make his will. This lawyer was spoken to by the trustee of the donee to attend to her interest to establish this gift, or concerning it, but declined upon the ground that she had no case.

Fourthly. Although Thomas, the donor, as the evidence shows, was in the habit of talking a good deal about his property and his disposition of it, yet there is no person to whom he ever, before his gift, mentioned such an intention as giving all of his property to this woman, while Mr. Watkins, a witness, says he expressed a contrary purpose.

Fifthly. He had relatives with whom he was on good terms, and one of whom he was especially fond of, whose portrait hung over,—always over,—the mantel in the room where he slept; and a letter from him is exhibited by a relative, written by Thomas to inquire the full names of certain relatives of the deceased.

These circumstances stand not conclusively disproving the evidence of the single witness, but they do not render it any more probable. Moreover, the affidavit filed at the commencement and first assertion of the claim set up a gift testamentary in character, to be effected only after the death of the donor, (Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 614, 27 L. ed. 500; Sterling v. Wilkinson, 88 Va. 791,) whereas, in her deposition, she, the single witness, leaves out all that indicates a postponement of the effectual delivery of the gift to the death of the decedent. The case alleged in her deposition is an absolute gift of everything the donor had, completely given, and the whole detail gone over more than once. If the law does not favor such gifts, (as it does not,) then, in strictness, this gift is not established by the testimony of one inconsistent witness.

I forbear comment upon the policy of the law which permits such gifts at all on the dying bed, but will refer to the remarks of Mr. Schouler in his treatise on the Law of Personal Property (vol. 2, pp. 182, 183, 184,) and the cases there cited, especially the views of Lord Eldon in Duffield v. Elwes, 1 Bligh, N. S. 538. In Virginia, I have heretofore thought that the character of delivery required by our statute would sufficiently protect the dying man, but, if there is no statute concerning the kind of delivery necessary to pass a dying man's estate on his deathbed by gift, then our Statute of Wills appears to be useless. This question is of no importance, so far as creditors are concerned; such gifts do not affect them or their debts; but the next of kin and distributees, near in blood or remote, are all concerned. One child against another, or one child against grandchildren, all may rest at the mercy of attendants. It opens wide the door for fraud and perjury, and I think Lord Eldon was right when he said: "Improvements in the law, or somethings which have been considered improvements, have been lately proposed; and if, among those things called 'improvements,' this donation mortis causa were struck out of our law altogether, it would be quite as well." "And at the present day, [says a learned author above mentioned,] when the effort to carry out the giver's intention has resulted in encouragement to a giver to leave his deliberate intention in lasting doubt, when legal consistency seems to require reluctant courts to uphold a nurse in sole attendance upon some foolish person in carrying off stock, bonds, and promissory notes with little more ado than floor sweepings, or waste paper, utterly regardless of the claims of kindred, it is no wonder that we find the reports full of judicial regrets that the gift causa mortis was ever admitted to our law at all." Schouler, Pers. Prop. 184; Wolsh v. Sexton, 55 Barb. 251; Tillinghast v. Wheaton, 8 R. I. 586, 94 Am. Dec.

126. "It is far better that a gift of this kind occasionally fall, than that the rules of law be so relaxed as to encourage fraud and perjury." Hatch v. Atkinson, 56 Me. 824, 96 Am. Dec. 464.

I feel constrained to dissent from the opinion of the other judges for the foregoing reasons.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Mary C. CROMPTON, Admx., etc., of George Crompton, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

George BEACH.

(.....Conn.....)

1. The exercise of an option by the vendor in a conditional sale to enforce payment of a note given for the purchase price defeats his right under the contract to re-take the property upon default although he is unable fully to collect the note because of the purchaser's insolvency.

2. On the passing of title under a conditional sale by the vendor's election no lien or incumbrance inures to his benefit for any unpaid portion of the purchase money.

3. There can be no contract which shall give to one party all the benefits and to the other as well as the public all the burdens of both a conditional sale and a chattel mortgage.

(April 1, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain machinery which was alleged to be unlawfully withheld from plaintiff by defendant. Affirmed.

During the lifetime of George Crompton he entered into a contract with the Home Woolen Mills Company, of which the following is a copy:

"This memorandum of an agreement made this third (3d) day of March A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-six, between George Crompton, of the city of Worcester, state of Massachusetts, of the first part, and the Home Woolen Company, Charles M. Beach, Treasurer, of Beacon Falls, County of New Haven, state of Connecticut, of the second part.

"That whereas the said George Crompton of the first part agrees to deliver to the said party of the second part, certain articles of machinery, to wit:

"Thirty (30) Broad Compton '1888' Fancy Looms (twenty-eight of which are single-beam looms, and two are double-beam looms) and fixtures thereto belonging, amounting to twelve thousand four hundred and fifty-six dollars and sixty-nine cents, and the party of the second part agrees to give the party of the first part their promissory note, dated the average shipping date of the looms, and payable eight (8) months from its date, for $12,456.69.

"It is hereby agreed by the said parties, that the party of the second part shall be permitted to take the said property into their possession, and the same to take to and set up in the mill occupied by them in Beacon Falls, Conn., agreeing to keep the same in good order, and also to keep the same insured for the full cost of the same, for the benefit of the party of the first part, and to hold the said machinery, as the property of the party of the first part, until the above note or renewals thereof have been fully paid, according to the tenor thereof, when the machinery above named shall be sold to, and become the property of, the party of the second part.

"And the party of the first part is hereby bound to sell and relinquish his claim to said property, upon payment of the said note or renewals thereof, and does agree to consider the same as sold and delivered, when said note or renewals thereof are paid.

"And it is further agreed, that upon default of the payment of said note, or renewals thereof, when the same shall become due, as also in default of said machinery being kept in good order, and insured as above provided, the party of the first part shall have the right at any time to resume possession of the machinery, and to enter the premises and remove the same as his own property. And if any portion of said note, or renewals thereof, shall remain unpaid, when possession shall be so taken by the party of the first part, or his authorized agent, then the amount which may have been paid shall be for the use of the said machinery while in possession of the party of the second part, and said notes shall then be canceled and given up.

"Witness the hand and seal of the parties aforesaid.

newed note matured the Home Woolen Mills Company ceased to do business and when the note matured made default of payment. Suit was brought upon the note and an attachment issued. An assignment for benefit of creditors having been subsequently made the amount of the note was presented as a claim against the insolvent estate and the claim was allowed and a 25 per cent dividend paid thereon. Subsequently this action was brought to recover the machinery for which the note was given.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Chamberlin, White & Mills, for appellant:

Until payment of the judgment on the note given for the property the other remedy was not barred.

Drake v. Mitchell, 8 East, 251; Lord v. Bigelow, 124 Mass. 185; Vanuzem v. Burr, 151 Mass. 886.

Messrs. Robinson & Robinson, for appellee:

Appellant under the contract had the option, upon default of payment, to take possession of the looms or to sue the note for their purchase price.

See Butler v. Hildreth, 46 Mass. 49; Bailey v. Hervey, 185 Mass. 172; Beach's Appeal, 58 Conn. 464.

These two remedies, one of which involves a rescission the other an affirmation of the sale, are inconsistent.

If a party has the option to affirm or disaffirm a sale, he must either affirm or disaffirm it altogether.

2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 1838.

The assertion of one or two inconsistent remedies is a renunciation of the other.

Benjamin, Sales, § 489; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 1872, 1877 et seq.; Connahan v. Thompson, 111 Mass. 272.

The appellant elected her remedy when she brought suit, and attached property of the Home Woolen Mills Company amply sufficient to secure her claim.

See Butler v. Hildreth, supra; Smith v. Field, 5 T. R. 408; Bukley v. Morgan, 46 Conn. 898; Terry v. Munger, 8 L. R. A. 216, 121 N. Y. 161; Lehman v. Van Winkle, 92 A. 443.

The fact that she recovered only a part of her claim for the purchase price does not resurrect the remedy of repossession, which died by her own election.

See Bailey v. Hervey, and Smith v. Field, supra; 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. of Law, 250, note 3.

Is this contract of conditional sale an absolute sale with a mortgage back?

Some contracts possessing other and peculiar features have been held to be such in effect.

A conditional sale is not a mortgage.

Bailey v. Hervey, supra.

Fenn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The present contention grows out of the same contract which was considered by the court in Beach's Appeal, 58 Conn. 464, and the facts therein stated are applicable to this 18 L. R. A.

case, but need not be repeated here. Under the authority of that decision the plaintiff, as administratrix of George Crompton, having secured a dividend of 25 per cent from the insolvent estate of the Home Woolen Mills Company, brought the present action of replevin for the property against the defendant, who is the trustee in insolvency of said company; and the sole question for our decision is the one considered, but not determined, by the court in the former case, whether the vendor, having elected to enforce the claim upon the note, could at the same time retain the right to retake the machinery if the note was not fully paid. The superior court held that such right could not be retained, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant for the return of the property, with damages for the replevin and detention, and the plaintiff appealed.

The contract appears in full in the former case (58 Conn. 465), but we will repeat the closing paragraph, which is that, upon default, the vendor "shall have the right, at any time, to resume possession of the machinery, and to enter the premises and remove the same as his own property; and if any portion of said note, or renewals thereof, shall remain unpaid, when possession shall be so taken by the party of the first part or his authorized agent, then the amount which may have been paid shall be for the use of said machinery while in possession of the party of the second part, and said note shall then be canceled and given up." It is the present claim of the plaintiff that, although by reason of the express stipulation, after possession had been resumed, no further right to recover the purchase price would exist, yet, by resorting to her remedies in the order in fact taken, both the remedy by collection and that by resumption were open to her. The argument in favor of such claim appears to be threefold: First. That the default of the vendee did not operate as a rescission of the contract; that the rights of the vendor survived such default; and that the rights of the parties thereafter existing were to be determined, not alone by the ordinary methods furnished by the law, but by those and such other proceedings as were expressly provided in the agreement itself, namely, that, until the vendor exercised his right to resume possession, "the amount which might have been paid should be for the use of the machinery." Second. That in this case the remedies provided by the law and the agreement of the parties are cumulative and collateral, and that each, except as limited in their order by the contract, might be pursued independently, until full satisfaction resulted. Third. That the vendor had, under the contract, a lien upon the property, which was in effect a mortgage, and was entitled to the same relief as if the title had been transferred and reconveyed for security. We will consider each of these claims separately. In reference to the first, that the default of the vendee did not operate as a rescission of the contract, it is true, and constitutes the basis of the decision in the former case of Beach's Appeal. But it must be manifest to any one who examines that case that this court did not then attribute to such facts the consequences which the plaintiff now asserts. Indeed, it is very evident that, while leaving the question now at issue in form undecided, the minds of both the majority and minority of the court were strongly opposed to the plaintiff's present position. This the plaintiff concedes, and a considerable portion of the brief presented in her behalf, and of the oral arguments based thereon, was devoted to an effort to explain how this court was led into its "apparent error," which error is said to have consisted in "presuming that the case of Bailey v. Hervey," 185 Mass. 173, cited in 58 Conn. 480, "was based on a contract similar, in effect, to the one under consideration," and therefore, as Judge Loomis said in the former opinion, "directly in point." The plaintiff says that, in fact, the contract in Bailey v. Hervey differed from the one now under consideration, and was, in effect, the same as in Hins v. Roberts, 48 Conn. 267, 40 Am. Rep. 170, followed by Loomis v. Bragg, 50 Conn. 228, 47 Am. Rep. 688, in which the vendor's only remedy was held by this court to be the retaking of the property. To demonstrate this, since it does not appear in the reported case, the plaintiff's counsel have been at the exceptional pains of procuring what is stated to be an exact copy of the actual contract construed in Bailey v. Hervey, and have caused the same to be printed in full for our examination at the end of their brief. The argument is that such contract would not have been construed in Connecticut as it was in Massachusetts, as conferring an option upon the vendor; that the assumption on which the opinion is conditioned is directly negated by the law of this court as declared in Loomis v. Bragg, "a decision not then published, and doubtless unknown to Justice Allen;" and that, therefore, the case is erroneous, and should have been decided upon other and better grounds, by which the same result might have been reached, and should not have been recognized as an authority by this court. Conceding this, for argument's sake only, we fail to see how it in any wise affects what Judge Loomis declares to be "the clear and cogent reasoning contained in the opinion cited;" for the Massachusetts court having, whether correctly or otherwise, held that the contract was one which did vest an option in the vendor, and was therefore similar to that now before us, the correctness and force of the reasoning upon the premises assumed does not depend in the least upon the truth of the premises themselves. Nor is this court concerned to discover the fidelity to principle, in all its parts, of the case cited from another jurisdiction, but contents itself with so much of the logic of the case as applies clearly and with force to our own. The court there said, in discussing a contract which it at least considered and held to be similar in effect to what we have determined the one before us to be: "When the plaintiff discontinued his payments on account, what was the legal position of the defendants? If it be assumed that they might, at their option, either retain the goods as their own property, without any obligation to account for the proceeds or value to the plaintiff, or that they might collect the price in full, it is plain that they were not entitled to do both. They could not treat the transaction as a valid sale and an invalid one at the same time. If they reclaimed their property it must be on the ground that they elected to treat the transaction as no sale. If they brought an action for the price, they would thereby affirm it as a sale. Two inconsistent courses being open to them, they must elect which they would pursue, and electing one, they are debarred from the other. Reclaiming the goods would show an election to forego the right to recover the price. But, instead of reclaiming the goods in the first instance, they brought an action against Bailey for the price, made an attachment of his property by trustee process, and entered their action in court, and he was defaulted." As Judge Loomis has aptly said, "to accept this as good law would be to establish a principle which would, upon the facts found, preclude the appellee from hereafter reclaiming the machinery in question." We do so accept it, because it commends itself to our judgment, and so clearly does this appear that although, as Judge Loomis further adds, we "are aware that it may receive further support from other decisions to the same effect," we deem their citation uncalled for.

The plaintiff, however, says that she did not exercise any option until she resumed possession; that the provision of the contract, that the amount paid should be for the use of the machinery, applies equally whether such payment, prior to such resumption, was by the voluntary act of the vendee or was coerced by the legal action of the vendor. This claim is, we think, not only opposed to the reasoning which we have quoted and approved, but requires for its support a construction of the contract which must be based upon a presumed intention of the parties, which is neither found expressed in the language of the instrument, nor can it be conceived of as existing in the mind of its makers. The only thing which, in case of the vendee's default, the contract expressly provides for, is the right of the vendor to retake the property, which is to operate as a discharge of the note; and, although we have held that the vendor had the option to enforce payment instead, it cannot reasonably be supposed that the parties ever intended that the vendor, through the exercise of an option not expressly given, could by reversal of the order of procedure, instead of retaking the property and canceling the note, collect the note, and then retake the property. Cases cited by the plaintiff's counsel, which hold that, when the option is exercised by retaking, the amount already voluntarily paid may be retained, and cannot be recovered back by the vendee are not in point. These are payments made by the vendee in affirmance of a contract which it does not lie in his power to disaffirm; and while the contract remains in force, and when the vendor makes default, and it thereby becomes the right of the vendor to elect whether he will affirm or disaffirm, if he does the latter, under a contract similar to the present, the vendor is under no obligation to return to the vendee what he has paid in part performance of a contract which it was his fault that he did not perform altogether. But, while voluntary payments are made by the vendee in affirmance of the contract, involuntary ones can only be coerced after default, and import a like affirmance on the part of the vendor, because upon such default, it being the right of the vendor to elect whether he will affirm or disaffirm, though it may be true that he might defer such election for a considerable time, yet whenever he brings an action to recover the contract price, he does affirm it, just as much as he disaffirms it when he retakes the property. To say, therefore, that the vendor's option, in the case before us was not exercised until the retaking, is erroneous. It involves a double election,—to affirm the sale to get as much as possible out of the general assets of the insolvent estate, and then to rescind it to get as much more as possible out of the property specifically; which seems to us, it must be said, a fast and loose fingering of the contract. The plaintiff insists that there is no injustice in this, since she only seeks to obtain the amount of the purchase price of the property; and cannot get more; that, whenever the sum collected equals the debt, the property vests in the vendee; and whenever such sum, less than the debt, is enough to make the balance due below the value of the property, the vendee can obtain title by paying the remainder. There seems to be an inconsistency in this reasoning. If not only what is voluntarily paid, (in this case nothing was in fact so paid,) but what she collects may be held as rent, why is the plaintiff under any obligation to apply it as part payment upon the note? When she retakes the property it is her duty under the contract to cancel and give up the note. But the note being discharged, is she thereupon to return the property? If the sum received is rent merely, why does not the whole purchase price continue due? If, on the other hand, she is bound to apply it in part payment, why is it not because she has elected to treat the obligation as absolute, and not as conditional? We think the plaintiff is mistaken in her claim.

Coming, then, to the second point in the plaintiff's argument, that the law and the agreement, taken together, give to her cumulative remedies, which she is entitled to pursue separately until they result in satisfaction, the answer to this claim appears to be clearly embraced in what has already been said. This is not a question of remedy, but of right. The contract was conditional. The note should be paid or the property might be retaken. There was an option. True, this court has held that such option belonged to the vendor, and not to the vendee. The debt was absolute if the vendor elected to treat it as such. The plaintiff's intestate, or she as his administratrix, might therefore, upon the vendee's default, demand and enforce either payment or return. If the latter, that by the express terms of the instrument inured to discharge the note; if the former, that equally, though by operation of law, transferred and confirmed the title. Having elected, therefore, to enforce the note, the plaintiff is entitled to all the remedies which the law or the contract gives her for that purpose, but not for any other purpose. She could attach the property. She did in fact attach other property. Insolvency intervening, the claim was presented and the dividend received. What other remedy for the enforcement of the debt exists? Not now to retake the property as a means to that end. A contract of conditional sale imposes no lien upon property in favor of the vendor, for that or any other purpose. He does not sell and receive back a pledge. He retains the title until he elects to part with it, and when he does so elect the title passes from him; but nothing else thereby springs up in its place in the nature of a lien or incumbrance upon the property, inuring to his benefit.

And this brings us directly to the remaining claim of the plaintiff, that the contract in question is in the nature of a mortgage. It is not a mortgage. If it had been, it must, in order to be valid, have been executed with statutory formalities, which are lacking, and recorded. It would require foreclosure to perfect title, and it ought to have been considered by the commissioners on the insolvent estate as security for the plaintiff's claim upon the property of such estate, which was not done. It is not, therefore, claimed to be a mortgage, but that it was in the nature of a mortgage. We think, however, that it is just as far from the nature of a mortgage as any other conditional sale,—no more and no less; and that to hold that, between conditional sales, a class of contracts so often construed and so clearly defined in this state, and chattel mortgages proper, there is an intermediate and anomalous species of contracts, which the court will regard as importing in favor of a vendor all the benefits of both a mortgage and a conditional sale, and against the vendee, the trustee for the benefit of creditors of the vendee's insolvent estate, and the public generally, to whom such unrecorded and undisclosed conveyances operate too often disadvantageously, all the burdens of both, with none of the advantages of either, would be opposed to public policy, and cannot be and is not law.

There is no error in the judgment complained of.

The other Judges concurred.

for membership with payment of an initiation fee and an approval of the new member by the board of directors.

2. A court of chancery will not undertake to force a member upon a corporation which is not engaged in commercial business but merely furnishes to its members facilities for carrying on business, against the will of those whose duty it is to pass upon application for membership.

3. The illegality of the by-laws or contract of a stock exchange as being in restraint of trade cannot be invoked by a stranger as a ground of compelling the members of such exchange to disobey such rules as the law does not prohibit a contract in restraint of trade but merely declines after they are made to recognize their validity.

4. The fact that a livestock market owned by a private corporation is the largest in the world does not make the business therein of an incorporated stock exchange which has no corporate relation with the market company, a public business such that the exchange can be compelled to deal with all persons at that market without discrimination.

5. The mere fact that the business of a particular market has become the largest in the world does not give to the courts any power to declare the market public and impressed with a public use or to apply to it any rules of public policy peculiar to that class of markets, although the Legislature might be warranted in making such a declaration.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County, dismissing the bill in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from refusing to admit plaintiff to membership and also awarding damages sustained by reason of the suing out of a preliminary injunction. Affirmed.

Statement by Bailey, Ch. J.:

This was a bill in chancery brought by the American Live Stock Commission Company against the Chicago Live Stock Exchange and H. D. Rogers, for an injunction. A preliminary injunction having been issued, the Chicago Live Stock Exchange appeared and demurred to the bill, and, the demurrer being overruled, it filed an answer, and entered its motion to dissolve the injunction. - Said motion, being heard on bill, answer, and the affidavits filed by the respective parties, was sustained. The defendant then filed its suggestion of damages, and upon the evidence adduced the court awarded the defendant damages sustained by reason of suing out the injunction in the sum of $1,250, and rendered its decree therefor, and also entered a decree dismissing the bill at the complainant's costs, for want of equity. Both decrees have been affirmed by the appellate court on appeal, and the present appeal is from said judgment of affirmance.

The facts, as alleged in the bill, so far as they need be stated, are these: The Chicago Live Stock Exchange is a corporation organized under the laws of this state, March 13, 1884, by certain commission merchants engaged in the business of buying and selling livestock for others on commission, and was organized in the interest of commission merchants and dealers in livestock at the Union Stock Yards, a public livestock market in Cook county, Ill. Upon the organization of said exchange, the commission merchants and buyers of livestock at the Union Stock Yards became and are now members thereof, and the members of the exchange have combined and confederated in order to control the selling of the livestock which may arrive at said market, and, by reason of such combination, it has become impossible for one not a member of the exchange to sell livestock in said public market; for, while the rules of the exchange allow its members to buy from owners of livestock, the usage of owners not to accompany their stock, and their lack of acquaintance with purchasers and dealers, and of familiarity with the methods of dealing, render it necessary to employ a representative to sell their stock; and, by the rules of the exchange, such representative must be a member thereof, as purchasers will buy of no others than members or the owners of stock. In the year 1889 there were shipped to the Union Stock Yards, and sold in said market, 3,023,281 cattle, 123,968 calves, 5,998,526 hogs, 1,823,469 sheep, 79,928 horses, making a total of 11,117,170 head of livestock, said livestock having been raised and forwarded to the Union Stock Yards by the farmers of Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, and other states and territories, whereby the livestock market at said stock yards has become and now is the largest market of livestock in the world. Said exchange, shortly after its organization, adopted a body of rules and by-laws which, in 1889, were codified into a system. Of these rules, rule 8 fixed the qualifications and mode of admission of members, and rule 9 established certain minimum rates of commissions to be charged by members for selling livestock. The bill alleges that the rates of commission thus fixed are unjust and unreasonable to those engaged in raising livestock, and who are compelled by circumstances to ship the same to said market, that market having long since become a public market, the prices upon which to a great degree fix the value of livestock throughout the United States; that, under the alleged purposes for which said corporation was formed, its members have joined and confederated together to coerce persons sending stock to said stock yards to pay an unreasonable price to them for selling, or to prevent such stock from being sold until a member of the exchange should be employed to sell the same at unreasonable rates of commission; that a great proportion of the livestock shipped to said market is purchased by four persons or firms, at least to such an extent that their refusal to purchase from an individual or firm renders it impossible for such person or firm to sell stock in said market, and each of said buyers is a member of the exchange, and submits to and is bound by its rules and regulations, and will refuse to purchase from persons who are not in harmony with the exchange, and will refuse to trade with or purchase from persons or corporations when forbidden to do so by the exchange.

The bill further alleges that this condition of things existed on the 1st day of January, 1889, and had so existed for a number of years prior thereto, and that a large number of stock producers in the states and territories aforesaid, feeling the grievances to which they were and had been subjected, conferred together as to the best means of relief from the oppressions aforesaid, and determined to organize and form a corporation for the purpose of selling their own stock, by having their corporation become a member of the exchange, so as to handle and sell their own stock on said public market; and after selling such stock as might be consigned to it by its shareholders and others, and charging the regular commissions therefor, to relieve its shareholders of such excessive charges by returning to them, by way of dividends, all sums their corporation should receive in excess of the expense of such handling and selling; that in pursuance of such arrangements, and in the interest of said stock producers, the American Live Stock Commission Company was organized, under the laws of this state, March 2, 1889; that after its organization its board of directors appointed H. D. Rogers its manager at Chicago, and gave him authority to attend to its business, and see to receiving such livestock as might be consigned to it, and sell the same for said company, in accordance with the rules and by-laws of the exchange; that, in order to sell livestock at the stock-yards market, it was found to be necessary for the complainant corporation to become a member of the exchange, and for that purpose, and under that necessity, it caused its manager to purchase from the legal holder thereof a certificate of membership, and caused the same to be transferred to its manager, and for which it paid the sum of $100, and thereupon its manager signed an agreement to abide by the rules, regulations, and by-laws of the association; and all amendments that might in due form be made thereto, in conformity with the requirements of rule 8 of said exchange; and thereupon the exchange, at the complainant's request, took up said certificate so purchased and issued to Rogers, as such manager, to be held by him in trust for the complainant, a new certificate of membership, admitting him, under the description of "H. D. Rogers, Manager," to full and regular membership and according in the exchange.

It is further alleged that, by virtue of such membership, Rogers represented the complainant, as its manager, in the exchange, selling stock and doing other necessary business for it, until December 14, 1889, when the office of manager was abolished, whereupon Rogers resigned, and Eli Titus was appointed general manager of the complainant; that Rogers afterwards, and about January 5, 1890, having ceased to act for the complainant, assigned said certificate of membership in blank and delivered it to the complainant; that afterwards, and on or about January 18, 1890, without the knowledge or consent of the complainant, he surreptitiously and secretly abstracted said certificate from the complainant's desk, and now has the same, and refuses to surrender it to the complainant, and threatens to hold it and enjoy the privileges of membership in the exchange which it affords, as though he was the owner thereof; that the complainant has requested the exchange to issue to its general manager a duplicate certificate, and thereupon the exchange investigated the complainant's claim, and admitted that it was the owner of said certificate, but refused, and now refuses, to issue to the complainant such duplicate, or any other evidence of its right to membership in the exchange; that the exchange now threatens to deny the complainant the privileges of the exchange, and to notify its members to refuse to purchase livestock from the complainant, and to expel the complainant from membership, and has conspired with Rogers to have him withhold said certificate, and thus deprive the complainant of its rights therein.

The bill further alleges that the object of the complainant's organization was to enable its shareholders, all of whom are feeders of livestock and shippers of the same to said market, to procure the sale of such livestock at reasonable cost and under favorable circumstances, and, to the end that this might be done at the lowest cost, it has offered to and has sold on said market livestock for other producers, and has made the charges therefor in strict accordance with the rules of the exchange, and, after making such charges and collecting the same, at the end of the year it had earned, as the result of its services, after deducting all expenses, the sum of $40,498.83, and thereupon, in December, 1889, it proceeded to declare a dividend, and distribute its net earnings among its shareholders, in accordance with the purpose announced in its articles of incorporation, that is to say, 65 per cent of such net earnings to its shareholders in the ratio of the amount of livestock shipped by each respectively, and the remaining 35 per cent in proportion to the number of shares of stock owned by them; that such division of profits was not in conflict with any rule of the exchange, and was just and equitable, and injurious to no one, and that the complainant is obliged by law to so distribute its net earnings.

It is also alleged that the members of the exchange, further conspiring to reap unreasonable profits and to prevent the complainant's shareholders from obtaining the sale of their stock at small expense, on February 4, 1890, against the complainant's objection, amended its said rule 8, by adding thereto the two following paragraphs, viz.: (1) "No person shall be received for membership in this exchange who in any manner represents or acts for, either as an officer, agent, or broker, or commission merchant, any other livestock corporation or exchange, whose charter regu-tations, rules, or by-laws provide for discrimination in rates or charges or commissions between stockholders or other patrons or customers, whether under guise of dividends, drawbacks, or any other scheme or device whatever." (2) "If any member of this exchange shall hereafter act for, either as officer, agent, broker, or commission merchant, any other livestock corporation or exchange, whose charter, regulations, rules, or by-laws provide for discrimination in rates or charges or commissions between stockholders or other persons or customers, whether under the guise of dividends, drawbacks, or any other scheme or device whatever, he shall be liable to suspension for the first offense, and to expulsion for any subsequent offense." That at the same time the exchange amended its rule 9 by adding thereto the following: "Nobody in this exchange shall buy, or cause to be bought, at the Union Stock Yards, Chicago, Ill., from any agent, individual, firm, incorporation, or other livestock commission company, who are or may be regularly selling livestock for non-residents on commission, unless some one or more of the members of such firm or stockholders of such company are members in good standing of this exchange; provided, however, that any party or parties beginning a livestock commission business at said yards shall not be considered subject to this rule until thirty days from the date of their beginning such business; and provided, further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed as in any manner prohibiting any party from selling his own livestock on the market of such stock yards, or any member of this exchange from buying such stock of the owner." The bill prays for an injunction restraining Rogers from using or disposing of said certificate of membership, and restraining the exchange from issuing any certificate in place thereof to any other than the complainant or its authorized general manager; that said amendments to said rules and by-laws of the exchange be held to be null and void; that the exchange be enjoined from notifying its members, or any of them, not to purchase livestock in said general market or elsewhere from the complainant, and from in any manner endeavoring to prevent the complainant and its agents from selling livestock on the market of the Union Stock Yards, and from taking any steps to try the complainant for any supposed violation of said rule 9, or any of said amended by-laws; and that on final hearing said injunction be made perpetual, and said Rogers be required to surrender said certificate, and the exchange be required to issue said certificate to the complainant, and that the complainant be permitted to enjoy its privileges, unvexed by any unjust, unreasonable, or illegal restraints; and also a general prayer for relief.

The Chicago Live Stock Exchange answered, denying the equities of the bill, and particularly denying, among other things, that its members had confederated to control the selling of livestock at the Union Stock Yards by its own members or otherwise, or that it had interfered or attempted to interfere with the action of any other persons, not members of the exchange, in buying or selling at said yards, or that it was impossible for one not a member to sell livestock in said market, or that it was necessary for shippers of cattle to said yards to employ a representative to sell their stock. The answer alleged that the Union Stock Yards Company is a private corporation and is accustomed to forbid and prevent such persons or corporations as it saw fit from entering upon or doing business at its stock yards. The answer also alleges that it is a matter of no concern, except to the defendant and its members, whether the defendant has adopted a body of rules or by-laws, or has altered them, or as to what rules it has adopted; that the complainant is not a member of the defendant corporation, or interested in its rules, and has no right to inquire into them or call them in question; that it is no concern of the complainant, or any one else, as to what commissions are charged by commission merchants, or as to what rules or regulations the defendant may have made or shall make as to the rate of commissions, or as to what rules or regulations it shall make for the government of its affairs or that of its members. It denies that the rates of commission prescribed by the defendant's rules are unjust or unreasonable, but avers that they are low, minimum rates, and the lowest that any reputable or responsible merchant can afford to charge for handling stock. The answer further avers that the establishment by the members of the exchange of uniform rates of commission was essential to the correction and prevention of certain evils in their business of buying and selling livestock on commission at said stock yards; that, prior to the adoption of the rule establishing such uniform rates, great demoralization and abuses had grown up in said business, but that they had in a great measure been corrected by that rule. The defendant denies that the refusal of any four firms doing business at the stock yards to purchase of an individual renders it impossible for such individual to sell his stock at said stock yards; that the defendant does not know whether or not purchasers of livestock who are members of the exchange will refuse to purchase from persons who are not in harmony with the exchange, or whether they will refuse or decline to trade with or purchase from persons or corporations, or from agents, when forbidden to do so by the exchange. The answer charges that the promoters of the complainant corporation conspired to defeat and destroy the work and benefit of the exchange, and to injure the business of its members, and prevent equality among shippers in the matter of commissions, and to get discriminations in rates of transportation, and other undue advantages, and to control and raise the price of livestock, and that for these purposes that corporation was formed; that the complainant's shareholders confederated to control the livestock market of Chicago, and the market price of beef, and have conspired to injure the commission merchants at the stock yards and to avoid and defeat the restrictions and rules of exchange, and at the same time get to themselves the benefit of said exchange; and while said corporation nominally charges its shareholders, as well as others, the full rates of commission fixed by the rules of the exchange, it returns to its shareholders and distributes among them 65 per cent of its net earnings, in the ratio of the amount of livestock shipped by each; that said distribution of 65 per cent of its net earnings was an attempted evasion of rule 9 of the exchange, and, if such evasion were permitted, other members of the exchange, who are bound by said rule, would be put to a great disadvantage, and would be unable to meet said competition.

The answer avers that it is not, and has never been, necessary, in order to buy or sell stock on commission at the Union Stock Yards, that the person so attempting to do should become a member of the exchange, and that it was and is not necessary that the complainant should become a member of the exchange; that the defendant has never attempted to prevent any person or corporation from buying or selling livestock at said yards who was not a member of the exchange, and does not intend so to do; and that its members have not confederated together to prevent any person or corporation not a member from buying or selling livestock at said yards, or to interfere with them in their action in that behalf. It admits that, at the date alleged, Rogers presented to the defendant an application for and was admitted to membership, but the defendant denies that the complainant ever became a member, or that Rogers was admitted at its request; that defendant does not know who Rogers represented, but that his membership in the exchange was merely personal to himself; that, when he applied for membership, the fact that he was to act for a corporation, which was to divide its earnings as the complainant has done, was, at the instance of the complainant, and for the purpose of getting its agent into said exchange, concealed from the defendant. The answer admits that Rogers signed the blank assignment on the back of his certificate of membership, but denies, on information and belief, that he delivered it so indorsed to the complainant. It also denies that the complainant has requested the defendant to issue said certificate to Titus, or that the complainant or Titus has applied for membership, as provided by said rule 8, or that the defendant is refusing to issue to the complainant a certificate or other evidence of its rights in the exchange, or that the defendant has ever threatened to deny the complainant such rights, or threatened to notify any of the members of the exchange not to purchase livestock from the complainant, or to expel the complainant from its pretended membership, as those questions have not arisen for its consideration; but the defendant now denies that the complainant is a member of the exchange, or that it has a right to become a member thereof.

Both the bill and answer are verified by affidavits, and, in addition thereto, the parties produced and read at the hearing of the motion to dissolve the injunction a large number of affidavits of officers and members of the two corporations in question, and of shippers of livestock to the stock-yards market, and of dealers in that market, corroborative of the allegations of the bill and answer, respectively, and, upon the case thus made, an order was entered dissolving the injunction, and a further order was subsequently entered dismissing the bill for want of equity. Prior to the submission of the motion to dissolve the injunction, however, a hearing was had as to defendant Rogers, upon the bill taken pro confesso, and at that hearing the court found that the certificate of membership in the exchange held by Rogers was paid for with the complainant's funds, and was held by Rogers in trust for the complainant, and it was thereupon decreed that said certificate was the property of the complainant, and Rogers was ordered, within thirty days, to surrender and deliver the same to the complainant, and he was also perpetually enjoined from exercising any further privileges or rights under said certificate, as against the complainant.

The further facts necessary to a proper understanding of the case will be found sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William Brown for appellant.

Messrs. Miller, Starr & Leman, for appellee:

The bill does not sufficiently show that complainant is a member of the exchange.

It shows that complainant never complied with one of the requirements. It never itself applied for membership, and membership in this association is a personal privilege.

Barclay v. Smith, 107 Ill. 349, 47 Am. Rep. 437.

Whatever complainant's rights as against Rogers may have been, it got no rights of membership, as against the exchange, from the fact that the certificate was purchased with its money.

Weaver v. Fisher, 110 Ill. 146.

It would not be within complainant's corporate powers to become a member of another corporation either directly or through an agent.

People v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 8 L. R. A. 497, 130 Ill. 268.

Even if complainant were a member, it does not in its bill show such interference or danger of interference with its rights of membership as would justify the interference of a court of equity. Apprehension or mere threats of future injury do not constitute sufficient grounds.

Troy v. Doniphan County Comrs. 32 Kan. 507; Thomas v. Musical Mut. P. Union, 8 L. R. A. 175, 121 N. Y. 45.

There are no facts whatever alleged in the bill showing that the exchange had ever interfered in any way with any legal rights of complainant.

Bailey, Oh. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case, so far as it relates to defendant Rogers, having been disposed of in the complainant's favor by a decree from which no appeal has been taken, and of which no complaint is made, the only questions now presented are those which relate to the equities which the complainant is seeking to enforce as against the Chicago Live Stock Exchange. Said livestock exchange is a corporation, not for pecuniary profit, organized March 13, 1884, under the laws of this state, the objects for which it was organized, as declared by its articles of incorporation being: "To establish and maintain a commercial exchange; to promote uniformity in the customs and usages of our merchants; to provide for the speedy adjustment of all disputes between its members; to facilitate the receiving of livestock, as well as provide for good management and the inspection thereof, thereby guarding against the sale or use of unsound or unhealthy meats; to secure to members a corporation in furtherance of their legitimate purposes." Said corporation has no capital stock, and is itself engaged in no commercial business, but limits its corporate enterprise to furnishing to its members facilities for carrying on, each for himself, the business of buying, selling, and dealing in livestock, meats, and other like commodities, and to adopting and enforcing by-laws, rules, and regulations by which the business of its members shall be conducted and governed. The location of the exchange, and the place where its members carry on their business of dealing in livestock under and in subordination to its rules, is the Union Stock Yards, Chicago. The Union Stock Yards and Transit Company, to which the stock yards belong, is also a private corporation, not itself engaged in the business of buying, selling, or dealing in livestock, but merely owning and furnishing very extensive stock yards, to which livestock is shipped in great quantities, from all parts of the west, for sale, and where buyers and sellers of livestock, acting either for themselves or as the representatives of others, resort for the purpose of carrying on their business. The Union Stock Yards have thus become the place to which nearly all the livestock shipped to Chicago for sale is consigned, and where, as it is said, more livestock is annually bought and sold than in any other market in the world. No corporate relation exists between the stock yards and transit company and the Chicago Live Stock Exchange, the latter corporation being formed merely by an association of commission merchants engaged in selling livestock for others on commission, and parties engaged in the business of buying livestock for themselves, in said market. The evidence shows that the commission merchants and buyers representing much the largest portion of the business done at said market are members of the exchange, though many parties, both sellers and buyers, are not members.

The case sought to be made by the complainant is presented under two aspects: First, it is claimed that, either by itself or through its general manager, the complainant is, or is entitled to be, admitted a member of the exchange, and it accordingly prays for an injunction restraining the exchange from taking any steps to try the complainant for a violation of its rules, or to impose upon the complainant's privileges as a member any illegal or unreasonable restraints, and it also prays that the certificate of membership in Roger's hands be issued to the complainant; secondly, it claims that, if it is not a member and entitled to the privileges of membership, the exchange should be restrained from putting in force certain rules it has adopted for the government of its own members, and particularly its amendments to rules 8 and 9. We are unable to see upon what principle it can be justly claimed that the complainant is a member of the exchange, or entitled to the privileges of membership, or that it is in a position where it can insist upon being admitted to membership as a matter of right. Whatever may have been its rights while Rogers, its manager, was a member, those rights no longer exist, as, by its own admission, Rogers is no longer its manager, and is no longer a member of the exchange. Nor can there be any just pretense that the complainant itself is a member or has ever applied for membership. The exchange is a corporation having rules or by-laws determining the qualifications for membership, and prescribing the mode in which members may be admitted, and there is no pretense that the complainant has ever brought itself within the terms of said rules or by-laws, so as to be entitled to membership. Rule 8 of the exchange provides as follows: "On and after May 1, 1884, any person of good character and credit, and of legal age, whose interests are centered at the Union Stock Yards, on presenting a written application, indorsed by two members, and stating the name and business avocation of the applicant, after ten days' notice of such application shall have been posted on the bulletin of the exchange, may be admitted to membership in the association, upon approval by at least seven affirmative ballot votes of the board of directors, and upon payment of an initiation fee of $500, or on presentation of a certificate of unimpaired or forfeited membership, duly transferred, and by signing an agreement to abide by the rules, regulations, and by-laws of the association, and all amendments that may, in due form, be made thereto."

Said association had an undoubted right to adopt this rule, and as it prescribes the mode, and the only mode in which membership in the exchange can be obtained, no one can justly claim to be a member who has not been admitted in the mode thus prescribed. It may well be questioned whether, under this rule, a corporation, in its corporate character, can be admitted to membership in the exchange, as said rule seems to contemplate only the admission of natural persons. But, even if that were otherwise, there is no pretense that the complainant itself has ever made application for membership, or that any of the subsequent steps necessary to vest an applicant with the character and rights of membership have been taken, or that they have resulted favorably to the complainant. Nor is it pretended that since Rogers ceased to be the complainant's manager, and thereby ceased to be its representative on the exchange, any formal application for membership has been made by Titus, its general manager, or by any other person in its behalf; but the evidence, on the other hand, is clear and undisputed that no such application has been made. The fact alleged in the bill, if it be a fact, that the complainant has requested the exchange to issue the certificate of membership formerly held by Rogers to Titus, avails the complainant nothing, as the exchange is under no obligation to admit a member upon such request, but can, in conformity with its rules, admit to membership only upon formal application, duly presented and approved in the manner in said rules prescribed. The equitable, or even legal, ownership of the unimpaired or forfeited certificate of membership formerly issued to Rogers, and duly transferred to it, does not constitute it a member, or entitle it to any rights as such. The only way in which the complainant can avail itself of such certificate is by tendering it in lieu of the prescribed initiation fee, in case the complainant or its representative, on proper application, shall be admitted to membership, or, in case such application should not be granted, then by selling it for a consideration to some other person who may desire to become a member.

It may also be noticed, in immediate connection with the point now under consideration, that a court of chancery has no power to order the exchange to issue the certificate of membership, formerly held by Rogers, to the complainant or its general manager, so as to constitute it or him a member. Before an applicant can become a member, his application must, among other things, be indorsed by two members, and must receive the approval of at least seven members of the board of directors, voting by ballot. Members and directors of such corporations, in acting upon applications for membership, are necessarily entitled to a freedom which is not subject to judicial compulsion. No two members can be compelled to indorse an application, nor can any seven members of the board of directors be compelled to vote in its favor, but both are entitled to act upon their own judgment, and according to their own choice. In other words, a court of chancery will not undertake to force upon a corporation of this character a member, against the will of those whose duty it is to pass upon applications for membership.

The complainant, then, not being a member of said exchange, nor entitled, either directly or indirectly, to any of the rights arising from membership therein, the question is presented whether it can complain of any of the rules adopted by the exchange for the government of the conduct of its own members, or invoke the aid of a court of equity to restrain their enforcement. The complainant is a joint-stock corporation, organized May 8, 1880, under the laws of this state, with a capital stock of $100,000, divided into shares of $100 each, the shareholders consisting principally, if not exclusively, of persons and firms engaged in the business of shipping livestock to the Union Stock Yards at Chicago for sale. The principal office of said corporation is located at the stock yards, and the objects for which said corporation was formed, as declared by its articles of incorporation, are as follows: "To engage in the business of buying, selling, and handling livestock upon commission at the Union Stock Yards, state of Illinois, and at such other points throughout the United States as may be deemed advisable, and also to encourage the stockholders of said corporation to raise, improve, feed, and ship to market livestock; and, in order to better effectuate said latter object, it is hereby expressly stipulated and agreed, by and between the parties hereto, that the net earnings of said corporation shall be distributed among the stockholders thereof annually, in the following manner, to wit: Sixty-five per cent of said net earnings shall be distributed to said stockholders in the ratio of the number of stock shipped by each stockholder to the said corporation for sale during the current year for which said dividend shall be declared, and the remaining thirty-five per cent of said net earnings shall be distributed to the shareholders in said corporation in the ratio of the amount owned by each shareholder in said corporation. It is hereby further expressly agreed and stipulated that no one person shall have the right to subscribe for or own more than twenty-five shares of stock in said corporation at any time during the existence of said proposed corporation."

Said corporation, on being organized, appointed Rogers as its manager, and he applied for admission as a member of the exchange, and was admitted a member thereof, his initiation fee being paid by the presentation of an outstanding certificate of membership which had been purchased with the money of the complainant. The evidence shows—and upon this point there seems to be no dispute—that, when Rogers applied for membership, no disclosure was made by him as to the plan upon which the complainant corporation was organized, and particularly the obligation which it assumed by its articles of incorporation, to distribute annually among its shareholders 65 per cent of its net earnings in the proportion of the number of livestock shipped by each to said corporation for sale. Rogers was admitted to membership upon investigation by the exchange of his own personal character and credit, and in ignorance of this peculiar feature of the scheme upon which the corporation represented by him was organized. The complainant thereupon embarked in the business of receiving consignments of livestock, both from its shareholders and others, and in selling the same on commission at the stock yards, the rates of commission charged by it in all cases being in conformity to the schedule of rates established by the exchange. Said business was managed by Rogers, who, being a member of the exchange, was enabled to avail himself, in the management of said business, of all the privileges which such membership afforded.

In November, 1889, the complainant, having realized a considerable sum of money as the net profits of its business up to that time, distributed such net profits to its shareholders, as required by its articles of incorporation; and the exchange being informed of such distribution, and regarding it as a virtual evasion of its rules establishing minimum rates of commissions, instituted proceedings against the complainant and its manager for a violation of its rules. Rogers set up in defense of these charges, in substance, that the complainant was not a member of the exchange, nor subject to its jurisdiction; that, so far as his action as a member of the exchange was concerned, he had strictly conformed to said rules by charging and collecting the rates of commissions thereby established; and, having collected them, he had accounted for and paid the same over to his principal, the complainant, as it was his legal duty to do; and that he had no responsibility for the disposition which the complainant had subsequently seen fit to make of the same. These suggestions seem to have been acquiesced in by the exchange, as the proceedings against both the complainant and its manager appear to have been thereupon abandoned. The exchange, however, for the purpose, as may well be presumed, of protecting itself against similar evasions of its rules in the future, amended its eighth rule so as to provide, in substance, that no person should be received for membership in the exchange who, in any manner, acts for or represents any other livestock corporation whose charter, regulations, rules, or by-laws provide for discrimination in rates or charges for commissions between stockholders and other patrons or customers, whether under the guise of dividends, drawbacks, or any other scheme or device whatever, and that no member of the exchange should act, as agent or otherwise, for any livestock corporation whose charter, regulations, rules, or by-laws provide for such discrimination, and subjecting a member thus offending to suspension or expulsion. At the same time rule 9 was so amended as to prohibit all members of the exchange from buying any livestock, or causing the same to be bought, at the stock yards, from any corporation or livestock company which is or may be regularly selling livestock for nonresidents on commission, unless some one or more of the stockholders of such company are members of the exchange in good standing. It must be admitted that these amended rules, if enforced by the exchange and obeyed by its members, will have the effect of debarring the complainant, so long as it adheres to its present policy of distributing its net earnings among its shareholders, from becoming, either by itself or its officer or agent, a member of the exchange, or entitled to the privileges of membership, and also that the members of the exchange will refuse to purchase of it or its agents any of the livestock consigned to it for sale at said stock yards. The question, then, is whether these facts are sufficient to entitle the complainant to a decree declaring the invalidity or illegality of these rules, and to an injunction restraining their enforcement.

A voluntary association, whether incorporated or not, has, within certain well-defined limits, power to make and enforce by-laws for the government of its members. Such by-laws are ordinarily matters between the association and its members alone, and with which strangers have no concern. If the association, or a majority of its members, pass by-laws which are unreasonable, or contrary to law or public policy, and attempt to enforce them as against a dissenting or unwilling minority such minority may undoubtedly, in proper cases, appeal to the courts for relief against their enforcement. But mere strangers have ordinarily no right to interfere. As to them, such by-laws are matters of no concern. They do not apply to and are not binding upon them.

In the present case, no member of the exchange is making any complaint of these by-laws, nor is there any suggestion either in the pleadings or proofs, that these by-laws have been passed, or are likely to be enforced, against the objection of a minority of the members, or against the objection of any one member, of the exchange. So far, then, as this proceeding is concerned, it must be assumed that they were adopted with the assent and concurrence of all the members, and are therefore satisfactory to all alike. They are therefore to be regarded as analogous to or in the nature of a unanimous compact or agreement among the members of the exchange not to buy livestock of the corporations engaged in selling the same on commission, unless one or more of the shareholders thereof are members of the exchange, and excluding from membership the representatives of the complainant, so long as it persists in its present policy of practically cutting rates of commissions by distributing back a portion of its net earnings to shippers; or, more specifically stated, said by-laws may be viewed as in the nature of a unanimous compact among the members of the exchange not to deal with complainant or its agents so long as it persists in its said policy.

Two questions arise: (1) Whether such compact or agreement is illegal or contrary to public policy; and (2) if it is so, whether a court of equity will interpose in behalf of the complainant, and set it aside and enjoin its performance. Admitting the right of the complainant to embark in and prosecute the business for which it was organized freely and without improper obstruction, it does not follow that it has a right to deal with parties who are unwilling to so deal, or to compel those who do not choose to do so to purchase its property. Absolute freedom of commercial intercourse to which a party may be entitled is not interfered with by the refusal of another to deal with such party on any terms. The refusal of any or all of the members of the exchange to purchase livestock of the complainant is merely an exercise of their clear legal prerogative, and, if they have a right to so refuse, it is difficult to see how an agreement, as between themselves, to abstain from dealing with the complainant, is a matter in respect to which the complainant is entitled to any species of equitable relief.

If it be admitted that said by-laws are so far a restraint of trade as to be invalid for that reason, we are unable to see that the position of the complainant is in any respect improved. By-laws or contracts in restraint of trade are illegal only in the sense that the law will not enforce them. They are simply void. The law does not prohibit the making of contracts in restraint of trade. It merely declines, after they have been made, to recognize their validity. Mogul SS. Co. v. McGregor, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 598, 619. A party to such contract is not bound to perform it, but he may perform it if he sees fit, and his doing so exposes him to no legal animadversion. If the by-laws in question are invalid because of being in improper restraint of trade, they are merely void, and the members of the exchange, being under no obligation to obey them, may, perhaps, be entitled, at their own instance, to protection against such disciplinary consequences as the exchange may see fit to impose in case of disobedience. But such protection cannot be invoked in their behalf by a stranger, nor can they be required to disobey such rules except at their own volition. There is no suggestion in the record that they are seeking to disobey said rules, or desire to do so. The evidence fails to show that the exchange has taken or contemplates taking any steps for the enforcement of said rules, or that it will have any occasion so to do. These rules having been adopted, presumably, with the approval of the members of the exchange, there is no reason to suppose that they will not be voluntarily obeyed, and such voluntary obedience is a matter which the courts have no power to restrain.

But the position is taken on behalf the complainant, and most strenuously insisted upon, that the livestock market at the Union Stock Yards, by reason of its magnitude, and its far-reaching influence upon the commerce of the country, has become a public market, and therefore impressed with a public use; and that not only said market, but all those doing business therein, are brought within the influence of those rules of public policy which apply to and govern public employments, and which it is the business of the courts to administer and enforce. After giving this contention our patient consideration, we are unable to yield to it our assent. The market itself is established and owned by the Union Stock Yards & Transit Company, a private corporation, not itself engaged in the business of buying and selling livestock, but which provides the ground, and has established very extensive stock yards, to which livestock shipped to Chicago for sale may be consigned, and where buyers and sellers may meet, either in person or by their agents, and transact the business of buying and selling such livestock. The bill alleges, and the truth of the allegation is not questioned, that the amount of business annually transacted at said stock yards is such as to constitute the market thus established the largest livestock market in the world. If it be admitted that the magnitude of the business transacted at said market, and its influence upon the general commerce of the country, are of themselves sufficient to constitute the stock yards a public market, so as to impress upon it a public use, it would probably follow that certain public duties and obligations would thereby be imposed upon the stock yards company. It would doubtless be held bound to keep its market open alike to all who might desire to do business therein, and, perhaps, to make no discrimination between individuals. But it does not follow that dealers resorting to said market for purposes of trade would be subjected to similar rules of public policy. They would deal with each other merely upon the footing of private parties, owing each other no duties except those which the rules of honesty and fair dealing impose. Each would be at liberty to deal or decline to deal with others precisely as he might see fit. The rules of trade would be no different from what they are in other markets, whether public or private. Nor can it be seen how combinations between merchants doing business in such public market, either with a view of increasing or diminishing competition, or of enhancing or diminishing prices, would be subjected to any rules different from those which apply to such combinations wherever made. As individual merchants, they would be subjected, in their dealings with each other, to no peculiar rules of public policy growing out of the fact that such dealings were in a public market, and an agreement among any number of them not to deal with a particular person or class of persons would not, of itself, subject them to such rules, but they would be amenable only to those general rules of law applicable to that sort of agreements. But we are not prepared to hold that the mere fact that the business of a particular market has become very large gives to the courts any power to declare such markets public, and impressed with a public use, or to apply to them any rules of public policy peculiar to that class of markets. It may well be doubted whether the term "public market," in the sense in which it is sought to be used here, is one which is known to our law. Markets overt, such as exist in England, are unknown here; nor is it usual in this country to grant to private parties the franchise or liberty of keeping or holding a fair or market, as is done in England. 2 Bl. Com. 37. Our statute in relation to the incorporation of cities and villages authorizes the legislative authorities of such municipal corporations to establish markets and market houses, and to provide for the regulation and use thereof. 1 Starr & C. Stat. p. 469. And it has been held that the power given to a municipal corporation to establish and regulate markets includes power to purchase a site, erect buildings, and provide rules for governing the same. Caldwell v. Alton, 33 Ill. 416, 75 Am. Dec. 282. But we are not aware that any class of markets in this country, not established by municipal authority, or by virtue of a market franchise granted by the state, has been held, merely because of the magnitude of the business carried on therein, to be impressed with a public use, so as to be held by the courts to be public markets, in that sense.

It is not claimed that the keeping or doing business in a market of this character is one of the employments which the common law declares to the public, nor is it pretended that it has been made so by statute. Ordinarily the adoption of new rules of public policy, or the application of existing rules to new subjects, is for the Legislature, and not for the courts. Accordingly, it may be held to be a general, though perhaps not an invariable, rule that the question whether a particular business, which has hitherto been deemed to be private, is public, and impressed with a public use, is for the Legislature. The doctrine on this subject is stated in Ladd v. Southern C. P. & Mfg. Co., 53 Tex. 172, where a question very similar to the one under discussion was before the court, as follows: "We know of no authority, and none has been shown us, for saying that a business strictly juris privati will become juris publici merely by reason of its extent. If the magnitude of a particular business is such, and the persons affected by it are so numerous, that the interests of society demand that the rules and principles applicable to public employments should be applied to it, this would have to be done by the Legislature, (if not restrained from doing so by the Constitution,) before a demand for such use could be enforced by the courts." The view thus expressed would seem to be precisely applicable to the present case, and we are inclined to adopt it as a correct statement of the law, as it should be applied to the facts before us. We do not say that there may not be exceptions to the rule thus stated, but, if there are, they are not of such character as to be material here.

Apart from the consideration that the extension and application of even existing rules of law to subjects not heretofore within their purview is legislative in its nature, the determination by the courts as to the precise point at which a mere private business reaches that stage of growth and expansion which is sufficient to render it juris publici would be surrounded with very great difficulties, and would present questions for which the courts, unaided by legislation, would be able to find no just or satisfactory criterion or test. But when the Legislature, acting upon a competent state of facts, has interposed and declared the business to be juris publici, all difficulty is removed.

The views here expressed do not conflict with what was decided in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118, 24 L. ed. 77. The question raised and decided in that case was as to the constitutionality of the Act of the Legislature of this state, declaring certain grain elevators to be public warehouses, and prescribing rules for their management, and fixing maximum charges for the storage and handling of grain. There the legislative department had interposed and declared the public use, and the court, in holding the act constitutional, held merely that the legislative power had been properly exercised. This was the only question, having any relevancy here, presented in that case, or which the court undertook to decide, and the discussion of the evidence showing that the business carried on in said grain elevators was of such character that it had in fact become impressed with a public use was only for the purpose of showing that a condition of things existed which justified the Legislature in passing the statute then under consideration. The case of New York & Chicago G. & S. Exch. v. Chicago Board of Trade, 127 Ill. 188, 2 L. R. A. 411, is clearly distinguishable from the one now before us. There the board of trade had for a series of years voluntarily engaged in the business of compiling market quotations, showing the fluctuations of the prices of commodities bought and sold on the board, and of furnishing the same, for a consideration, by telegraph, to all members of the public who desired to obtain them. By this means, the business of buying and selling agricultural products throughout the entire country had been brought under the control of the market prices fixed and determined on said board. It was held that these quotations were property, and that the board, by its own act, had so far impressed upon them a public interest that it should be required, so long as it compiled and furnished them to any one, to furnish them to all, without discrimination. This conclusion was reached upon the theory that the board had, for a series of years, voluntarily and intentionally devoted its property to a use in which the public had an interest, and had, in effect, granted to the public an interest in that use; and that it must, therefore, so far as it dealt in that species of property at all, submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest it had thus created. The determining elements present in that case are wanting here. The business which is here sought to be subjected to a public use was, at its commencement, confessedly private, and private only; and the public use is sought to be impressed upon it, not by virtue of any voluntary grant to the public, but simply because, by mere process of growth and expansion, the business has reached such magnitude as to affect public interests because of its magnitude alone. These facts would doubtless be sufficient to warrant the Legislature, in the exercise of its legislative discretion, in declaring a public use, and placing said business under legal control and supervision; but such power, in our opinion, does not rest with the courts.

The point is made that it was error for the court, on sustaining the defendant's motion to dissolve the injunction, to also enter a decree dismissing the bill for want of equity; the contention being that the bill should have been retained for final hearing on pleadings and proofs, according to the usual practice in chancery. We are of the opinion that the bill was properly dismissed. It was, in substance, at least as against the exchange, a bill for an injunction only. Its prayer, as against Rogers, having been granted by a prior decree, that portion of the relief sought is not to be considered, and, as against the exchange, nothing is prayed for but an injunction, except that the exchange be required to issue the certificate of membership formerly held by Rogers to the complainant. Under no possible view of the case, even if the bill had been retained for a further hearing, could this latter relief have been granted. The dissolution of the injunction was, in effect, a disposition of the entire case. Besides the bill, upon its face, as we think sufficiently appears from what has been said, is without merit; and, when that is the case, a motion to dissolve an injunction, the bill being in effect for an injunction only, has the same effect as a demurrer to the bill, and the court, on sustaining such motion, may properly dismiss the bill. Titus v. Mabee, 25 Ill. 257; Weaver v. Poyer, 70 Ill. 567; Prout v. Lomer, 79 Ill. 331. What we have said renders it unnecessary for us to consider the effect upon the status of the complainant of the fact, about which there seems to be no dispute, of its failure to record its certificate of incorporation until after the commencement of the present suit.

It is contended that the decree in favor of the defendant corporation, awarding damages on dissolution of the injunction, is not sustained by the evidence, and is therefore erroneous. We have duly considered the evidence applicable to that question, and are of the opinion that it supports the decree. The only damages proved are for solicitors' and counsel fees incurred in obtaining a dissolution of the injunction. It appears to us to be a fair conclusion, from all the evidence, that the sum awarded, viz., $1,250, is no more than is fairly chargeable for the services rendered by solicitors and counsel in the mere matter of obtaining a dissolution of the injunction.

We find no material error in the record, and the judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

Magruder, J.: I do not concur in this decision.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT.

BANK OF EDGEFIELD, Plff. in Err.,
v.
FARMERS' CO-OPERATIVE MANU-FACTURING CO.

(62 Fed. Rep. 96.)

1. A plea defectively verified may be verified in open court at the trial, under Ga. Code, § 3473, relating to amendments, and U. S. Rev. Stat., § 964, permitting amendment at any time of any defect in process or pleadings.
2. Dishonor of the first to mature of several notes given upon the same consideration, but not showing that fact upon their face is no notice to a subsequent indorsee for value before maturity of the other notes of the equities existing between the original parties, although he had notice of such dishonor.
3. The general commercial law as to notice to an indorsee of a note of the equities between the original parties prevails in the Federal courts when the rights of an indorsee whose residence is in a state different from that of the maker are to be determined, rather than any particular rule established in a state by its courts or statutes.
4. A bona fide holder of a note the consideration for which has failed in part as between the original parties is not limited by the fact that it was taken as collateral security, to recover only of the amount for which it was valid as between the original parties unless he had notice of the equities between them, but may recover at least the amount for which it was pledged.

(June 13, 1892.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia to review a judgment awarding plaintiff a less amount than claimed in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon certain promissory notes. Reversed.

Before Pardee and McCormick, Circuit Judges, and Locke, District Judge.

Statement by Pardee, Circuit Judge:

The plaintiff in error filed a suit on the common-law side of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Georgia against the defendant in error, being an action upon three promissory notes, aggregating $5,270. Each of said notes was made at Griffin, Ga., on the 28th September, 1889, by the defendant in error, payable to the order of Smith & Vaile Company, a corporation organized under the laws, and being a citizen, of the state of Ohio. These three notes were afterwards, and before due, indorsed by Smith & Vaile Company to D. A. Tompkins, a citizen of, and residing in, the state of North Carolina, who then, before the notes became due, indorsed them for value to the plaintiff in error, a citizen of, and residing in the state of South Carolina. The defendant in error filed certain pleas setting up the failure of consideration, which said pleas were sworn to by W. P. Walker, president of the defendant company, before a justice of the peace for Spalding county, in the state of Georgia.

When the case was called for trial in the court below, plaintiff in error moved for judgment, because there was no issuable defense filed under oath, as provided by the statutes of the state of Georgia and rules of court, plaintiff contending that the affidavit to the plea, made before a justice of the peace, constituted no sworn defense in the circuit court of the United States. The court ruled (a) that the affidavit was sufficient; and (b) that if it was not sufficient the plea could be sworn to then in open court; and the plea was thereupon sworn to by W. E. H. Searcy, president of the defendant company, before W. C. Carter, deputy clerk of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Georgia. Plaintiff then renewed the motion for judgment, because there could be no affidavit to a plea after the first term of the court. The court overruled this motion, and declined to permit the plaintiff to take judgment without a jury. The defendant then filed an additional plea, which was also sworn to before the deputy clerk, setting forth that, when the loan was made by the Bank of Edgefield to D. A. Tompkins, upon the three notes as collateral, certain of the notes which had been given by defendant to Smith & Vaile Company, and which were among those deposited as collateral security by Tompkins, were then due and unpaid; and that this was notice to the Bank of Edgefield; and that, if anything was due to plaintiff, it was only the amount first loaned to Tompkins, being $500.

The other facts in the case sufficiently appear from the assignments of error, as follows:

"(1) That the court erred in not granting a judgment for plaintiff, as requested by its attorneys, upon the ground that there was no issuable defense filed under oath by defendant.

"(2) Because the court erred in not granting judgment for plaintiff, as requested by its attorneys, after defendant had been allowed to swear to its pleas in open court at the time of the trial.

"(3) Because the court erred in permitting the introduction of the depositions of M. H. Mims, cashier of plaintiff, which were offered by defendant at the trial, and objected to by plaintiff in open court and in presence of the jury.

"(4) Because the court erred in permitting W. E. H. Searcy, president of the defendant company, to testify in the cause over the objection of the plaintiff made in open court in presence of the jury.

"(5) Because the court erred in not ruling out and excluding from the jury the depositions of said M. H. Mims and the testimony of W. E. H. Searcy, when the same was requested by notice, of the dishonor of the first of several notes given for the same consideration.

attorney for plaintiff in open court and in presence of the jury.

"(6) Because the court erred in charging the jury as set forth in the transcript of the record.

"(7) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, these notes are held by the Bank of Edgefield, and the proofs show exactly what that transaction was. We have the evidence of the cashier of the bank that these six notes—the three notes sued on, and the three notes for $500 each, which were the first three to mature—were placed in August, 1890, in the Bank of Edgefield, and that some notes were given by Mr. Tompkins after that, the first of which were given on the 18th October. The three notes, however, were due at the time these notes were placed in the bank. In the opinion of the court, the dishonoring of the three notes, as it is called in law,—the failure to pay them when they were due,—was notice to the bank of all the equities existing between the machinery company, Smith & Valle Company, and the defendant corporation.'

"(8) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'So that being the case, in the opinion of the court, the bank would only be entitled to recover on these notes, under the evidence and the pleadings, the amount due by the defendant to Smith & Valle Company, which would be the amount as stated to you a while ago, the difference in the freight, and the interest which Mr. Searcy says was on the entire transaction up to the time they made the arrangement, at or about the time of the date of the letter.'

"(9) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'About the date of that letter which you have in evidence, 28th February, 1890, I believe, there was an adjustment of this matter between Tompkins, agent or representative of the establishment that sold the machinery and the president of the defendant corporation; there having been no evidence adduced at the trial to authorize or justify such charge.

"(10) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'The proof shows that these notes were given for the purchase of certain machinery, and that that machinery was not delivered; that it was not to be delivered, however, until the three five-hundred dollar notes were paid, and that these notes were not paid. The evidence is somewhat indefinite about that; it appearing from the evidence of W. E. H. Searcy, a witness for defendant, positively and without dispute, that neither of the said three five-hundred dollar notes were paid, the evidence not having in any wise been indefinite upon this point.

"(11) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'But Mr. Searcy stated they agreed he was to pay the interest on the entire transaction, and the difference in freight. I do not believe that the bank is entitled to recover any more than that. I think, however, they are entitled to recover that; there having been no evidence to warrant such a charge, and the same being illegal and misleading.

"(12) Because the court erred in refusing to charge the jury, when so requested by counsel for plaintiff, as follows: 'If you find, as is admitted by the plaintiff, that the three notes for $500 each were past due when they were transferred by Tompkins to the plaintiff bank, along with the three notes sued on, then this is not notice to the bank of all the equities existing between the defendant company and Smith & Valle Company; nor was it evidence of a want or failure of consideration of the three notes not then due, and now sued upon. But you may consider the fact of the three $500 notes being past due when the six notes were transferred to the plaintiff bank in determining from the evidence if that fact showed bad faith in the bank in taking the notes not due, and, if it did, then the plaintiff cannot recover anything. But if you find from the evidence that, when the bank took the six notes, it took the three notes sued on before due, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, to wit, as collateral security for debt of D. A. Tompkins, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover the full amount called for by the three notes sued on.'

"(13) Because the court erred in taking a wholly erroneous view of the real issues and merits of the cause, and in permitting the defendant to introduce evidence of the equities existing between the defendant and Smith & Valle Company, to whom the notes sued on were given, without there being any pleadings to justify the introduction of such evidence, and without there being any legal right on the part of the defendant to introduce testimony as to such equities; it not having been shown that the plaintiff took the three notes sued on without any knowledge of any failure of consideration or infirmity in the said notes, nor that plaintiff took said notes in bad faith."

Mr. Henry B. Tompkins for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Hall & Hammond and Dis-mukes & Mills for defendant in error.

Pardee, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The first and second assignments of error are not well taken. The plea in this case was sworn to originally before one of the officers mentioned in section 3450 of the Georgia Code, and in accordance with the Georgia practice, which we are inclined to think was sufficient verification to the plea filed in the circuit court, but, whether this be so or not, when the plea was afterwards sworn to in open court at the time of the trial, by the direction of the court, we have no doubt the plea was sufficiently verified. Code Ga., § 3479 et seq., is very liberal with regard to the allowance of the amendments, and sufficiently broad, in our opinion, to cover this case. And section 954 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that the court "may, at any time, permit either of the parties to amend any defect in process or pleadings, and upon such conditions as it shall in its discretion and by its rules prescribe."

The seventh assignment of error seems to be well taken. It is as follows: "(7) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, these notes are held by the Bank of Edgefield, and the proofs show exactly what that transaction was: We have the evidence of the cashier of the bank that these six notes—the three notes sued on, and the three notes for $500 each, which were the first three to mature—were placed in August, 1890, in the Bank of Edgefield, and that some notes were given by Mr. Tompkins after that, the first of which were given on the 18th of October. The three notes, however, were due at the time these notes were placed in the bank. In the opinion of the court, the dishonoring of the three notes—as it is called in law, the failure to pay them when they were due—was notice to the bank of all the equities existing between the machinery company, Smith & Vaile Company, and the defendant corporation.”

There was nothing on the face of the notes to indicate that the three notes for $500 each, which were past due when they, with the three notes sued on, were deposited as collateral security with the plaintiff, were for the same consideration, or referred in any way to the same transaction, upon which the three notes sued upon were any of them issued. There is no proof in the case tending to show that the plaintiff had any knowledge whatever of the transaction or contract between the defendant and Smith & Vaile Company, or that the six notes constituted or formed part of one transaction. “Where more than one note is executed upon the same consideration, they are not all to be regarded as dishonored when one is overdue and unpaid.” Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 787.

The precise question was before the supreme court of the state of Wisconsin in the case of Boss v. Hewitt, 15 Wis. 261. In that case the court said: “Upon the question whether the purchaser should be chargeable with notice of any defects in the consideration of the notes subsequently to become due by reason of the first being overdue at the time, no authority was cited by either counsel, and we have found none. The notes were all secured by one mortgage, and, if it had appeared on the face of the papers that they were all given for one consideration, upon one transaction, it might be urged, with considerable force, that, as the law charged the purchaser with notice of any defect in the consideration of the first note, it must also charge him with like notice that all were given for one consideration. But how that question should be decided, if it ever arises, can be then determined. But there was nothing on the face of the papers to show that the notes were all given for one consideration. It is true they bore the same date, and were secured by one mortgage. But it is frequently the case that parties, in giving securities, include debts arising out of many different transactions, as to some of which there might have been defenses not affecting the others; and we do not think that a purchaser of negotiable notes before maturity can be held chargeable with notice of any defect in their consideration from the mere fact that another note, secured by the same mortgage, was overdue, and had not been paid.”

Boss v. Hewitt was affirmed in Kelley v. Whitney, 45 Wis. 110, citing National Bank of North America v. Kirby, 108 Mass. 497, and Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51, 24 L. ed. 681. In Cromwell v. Sac County affirmed in Indiana & I. Cent. R. Co. v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 756-763, 26 L. ed. 554-557, and also in case of Morgan v. United States, 118 U. S. 476-502, 28 L. ed. 1044-1053, it is held that the fact 18 L. R. A.

that installments of interest are overdue and unpaid is not sufficient to affect the position of one taking bonds and subsequent coupons before maturity for value, as a bona fide holder.

The defendant in error contends that the rule given in the judge's charge was correct, because section 2786 of the Code of Georgia provides as follows: “If the holder receives it after it is due, its nonpayment at maturity is notice to him of dishonor, and he takes it subject to all the equities existing between the original parties thereto; and if there be several notes constituting one transaction, but due at different times, the fact that the one is overdue and unpaid shall be notice to the purchaser of all, and put him on his guard.” And he cites the case of Harrell v. Broxton, 78 Ga. 129, to the same purport.

The plaintiff in error contends that the question of notice of equities existing between original parties in the case of commercial paper is regulated and determined by the commercial law, and not by the rule or decisions in any particular state, relying upon Smith v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1, 10 L. ed. 865; Oates v. First Nat. Bank of Montgomery, 100 U. S. 239, 25 L. ed. 580; Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank of Republic of New York, 102 U. S. 14, 26 L. ed. 61; Pana v. Bowler, 107 U. S. 529-541, 27 L. ed. 424-429; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 88, 27 L. ed. 865; King v. Doane, 189 U. S. 173, 35 L. ed. 87.

There is no doubt that the law of the place where the contract was made usually governs in the construction and enforcement thereof, and that the validity and effect of all writings or contracts are determined by the laws of the place where executed. The question presented here, however, is not with regard to the construction of the contract or its validity, but, rather, with regard to the rule of commercial law which affects subsequent holders in the matter of notice of prior equities. We are of the opinion that the general commercial law prevails, and not any particular rule or decision established in the state of Georgia either by the decisions of the supreme court of that state or by statute announcing a rule.

It has been settled in the courts of the United States since the leading case of Goodman v. Simonds, 61 U. S. 20 How. 343, 15 L. ed. 984, that one who acquires mercantile paper before maturity from another, who is apparently the owner, giving a consideration for it, obtains a good title, though he may know facts and circumstances that would cause him to suspect, or would cause one of ordinary prudence to suspect, that the person from whom he obtained it had no interest in or authority to use it for his own benefit, and though by ordinary diligence he could have ascertained those facts. Swift v. Smith, 102 U. S. 442, 26 L. ed. 193; King v. Doane, 189 U. S. 166, 35 L. ed. 84. It follows that, although the three notes of the same date as those acquired by the plaintiff were past due, and that the plaintiff was informed of that fact, still that would not be notice that the three notes not yet due were in any wise tainted by defective consideration, or for any other cause.

The eighth assignment of error seems also to be well taken. It is as follows: “(8) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows:

"So that being the case, in the opinion of the court, the bank would only be entitled to recover on these notes, under the evidence and the pleadings, the amount due by the defendant to Smith & Vaile Company, which would be the amount as stated to you a while ago, the difference in the freight, and the interest which Mr. Searcy says was on the entire transaction up to the time they made the arrangement, at or about the time of the date of the letter."

The proof in the case shows without dispute that the three promissory notes sued upon by plaintiff were held by it as collateral security to secure loans and discounts from time to time thereafter to D. A. Tompkins, whose total indebtedness to the plaintiff at the time suit was brought amounted to $1,239.77. This evidence was produced by the defendant, and, as there is no evidence to the contrary, it is certainly binding upon the defendant. "When it appears that the bill or note was acquired by the holder as collateral security for a debt, and he is deemed entitled to recover upon it, he is still limited to the amount of the debt which it secures if there be a valid defense against his transferor, being regarded as, at all events, a bona fide holder, and entitled to stand upon a better footing only pro tanto. Thus the holder could recover against an accommodation party no more than the consideration actually advanced; but, in the absence of proof, he will be deemed to have advanced the full amount of the paper." Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 892. To the same effect see Stoddard v. Kimball, 6 Cush. 469; Chicopee v. Chapin, 8 Met. 40; Fisher v. Fisher, 98 Mass. 303; Union Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 45 Wis. 378; Dubuque First Nat. Bank v. West, 52 Iowa, 684; Hatcher v. Independence Nat. Bank of Philadelphia, 70 Ga. 547, and cases there cited.

The charge of the court, based on the theory that the plaintiff was not a bona fide holder, limiting plaintiff's right to recover to the amounts due by the defendant to Smith & Vaile Company, was probably correct, if the theory upon which it was based had been the correct theory of the case; but, as we have shown in considering the seventh assignment of error, that theory was wrong, and it follows that the charge of the court limiting the plaintiff's right to recover an amount less than the indebtedness of Tompkins to plaintiff was erroneous. A consideration of the other assignments of error is unnecessary.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, with costs, and the cause is remanded, with instructions to order a new trial.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Samson EDWARDS, Appt.,

v.

Jennie CULBERTSON.

(.....N. C.....)

A woman who purchases land with money fraudulently obtained from a man by a promise to marry him and to hold such land in lieu of her right to dower under the marriage may be held to be a trustee on her refusal to marry him and the land charged with a lien for such money.

(November 22, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Chatham County refusing to make a sum of money, with which it had charged defendant as trustee, a lien upon land which she had purchased with it. Judgment in favor of appellant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas B. Womack, for appellant:

A trust is created when money is obtained from another by a fraud.

Wood v. Cherry, 73 N. C. 110.

When such money is invested in land, the land will be followed.

2 Lewin, Trusts, § 897, subsec. 10.

The expected marriage was a sufficient consideration, and so one calculated to deceive.

See Womack's Digest, 227-4, 1075, 1969.

In addition to the marriage, there was the surrender of marital rights, which, in the event of marriage, equity would have enforced.

Womack's Digest, 1075.

Mr. John Manning for appellee.

Shepherd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

According to the finding of the jury the defendant fraudulently obtained of the plaintiff the sum of $275.25, for the purpose of purchasing the land described in the complaint, and that the fraud consisted in "falsely and fraudulently promising and pretending that, if the plaintiff would let her have the said sum of money for said purpose, she would marry him in a very short time, and that the land to be purchased with the said money should be in lieu of her right of dower which she would acquire" by the said marriage. Upon this verdict, his honor rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the recovery of the amount so fraudulently obtained, but refused to declare it a charge upon the land purchased by the defendant with the said money, the land still remaining in her hands. Were there nothing more than a mere promise to marry, it is plain that a violation of it would not entitle the plaintiff to any equitable relief, but we must infer from the verdict that the defendant did not intend to perform the promise at the time it was made, and that she intended it, as well as the additional agreement to hold the land in lieu of dower, simply as a trick or contrivance by which to cheat and defraud the plaintiff of his money. By submitting to the verdict and judgment, the defendant (even if he could successfully do so) is precluded from denying that she obtained the money under circumstances which the law denounces as fraudulent, and, this being so, it cannot be doubted that if the specific money had been retained by her and could have been identified, the plaintiff, in a proper action, could have recovered it. If this be true, why may not the money be traced into the land and declared to be a charge thereupon? This is a somewhat novel question in this state, but in view of well-settled equitable principles, as well as authorities in other jurisdictions, it is believed to be unattended with any very serious difficulty.

The only decision of this court to which we have been referred as bearing upon the question is that of Campbell v. Drake, 39 N. C. 94. The plaintiff filed a bill in equity against the heirs-at-law of one Farrow, praying that they be declared trustees of certain land purchased by their ancestor with money stolen by him of the plaintiff while in the employment of the latter as his clerk. The court said that it was "not at all like the cases of dealings with trust funds by trustees, executors, guardians, factors, and the like, in which the owner of the fund may elect to take either the money or that in which it was invested;" and it was accordingly held that the plaintiff was not entitled to the particular relief asked for. It was strongly intimated, however, by Ruffin, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion, that the plaintiff might "have the land declared liable as a security for the money laid out for it." It was not stated upon what principle this could be done, but we apprehend that it was based upon the general proposition that, whenever a person has obtained the property of another by fraud, he is a trustee ex maleficio for the person so defrauded, for the purpose of recompense or indemnity. "One of the most common cases," remarks Judge Story, "in which a court of equity acts upon the ground of implied trusts in invitum, is when a party receives money which he cannot conscientiously withhold from another party." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1255. And he states it to be a general principle that "whenever the property of a party has been wrongfully misapplied, or a trust fund has been wrongfully converted into another species of property, if its identity can be traced, it will be held in its new form liable to the rights of the original owner, or cestui que trust." Id. § 1258; Hill, Trustees, 222; Whitley v. Foy, 59 N. C. 34, 78 Am. Dec. 236; Taylor v. Plumer, 8 Maule & S. 562; Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 696; People v. City Bank of Rochester, 96 N. Y. 32; Central Nat. Bank of Baltimore v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 693.

Mr. Pomeroy says: "In general, whenever the legal title to property, real or personal, has been obtained through actual fraud, or through any other circumstances which render it unconscientious for the holder of the legal title to retain and enjoy the beneficial interest, equity imposes a constructive trust on the property thus acquired in favor of the one who is truly and equitably entitled to the same, although he may never, perhaps, have had any legal estate therein, and a court of equity has jurisdiction to reach the property either in the hands of the original wrongdoer or in the hands of any subsequent holder, until a purchaser in good faith and without notice acquires a higher right, and takes the property relieved from the trust. The forms and varieties of these trusts, which are termed 'ex maleficio' or 'ex delicto,' are practically without limit. The principle is applied whenever it is necessary for the obtaining of complete justice, although the law may also give the remedy of damages against the wrongdoer." Pom. Eq. Jur. 1053. A confidential relation is not necessary to establish such trust, and there is no good reason why the owner of property taken and converted by one who has no right to its possession should be less favorably situated in a court of equity, in respect to his remedy, (at least for the purpose of "recompense or indemnity.") than one who by an abuse of trust has been injured by the wrongful act of a trustee to whom the possession of trust property has been confided. "The beautiful character—pervading excellence, if one may say so—of equity jurisprudence," says Judge Story, "is that it varies its adjustments and proportions so as to meet the very form and pressure of each particular case in all its complex habitudes." The trusts of which we are speaking are not what is known as "technical trusts," and the ground of relief in such cases is, strictly speaking, fraud, and not trust. Equity declares the trust in order that it may lay its hand upon the thing and wrest it from the possession of the wrongdoer. This principle is distinctly recognized by our leading text-writers, and it is said by Mr. Bispham (Eq. 92) that "equity makes use of the machinery of a trust for the purpose of affording redress in cases of fraud." The principles above stated are illustrated by many decisions to be found in the reports of other states, and as our case may easily be assimilated to those in which money or other property has been stolen and converted, such cases must be recognized as pertinent authority in the present investigation. In Newton v. Porter, 69 N. Y. 133, it was held that the owner of negotiable securities, stolen and afterwards sold by the thief, may follow and claim the proceeds in the hands of the felonious taker or of his assignee with notice; and that this right continues and attaches to any securities or property in which the proceeds are invested, so long as they can be traced and identified. The law, it was said, "will raise a trust in invitum out of the transaction, in order that the substituted property may be subjected to the purposes of indemnity and recompense." Andrews, J., said that "equity only stops the pursuit when the means of ascertainment fail, or the rights of bona fide purchasers for value, without notice of the trust, have intervened. The relief will be moulded and adapted to the circumstances of the cases, so as to protect the rights of the true owner." Lane v. Dighton, Ambl. 409; Manvell v. Manvell, 2 P. Wms. 679; Lench v. Lench, 10 Ves.

Jr. 511; Perry, Trusts, § 829; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1258. In National Mahanov Bank v. Barry, 125 Mass. 20, it was held that equity will charge land, paid for in part with the proceeds of stolen property, with a trust in favor of the owner of the property for the amount so used. In Humphreys v. Butler, 51 Ark. 851, the defendant, in paying for a house and lot purchased by him for $400, wrongfully used $149.52 belonging to the plaintiff, and of which he had obtained possession without her authority, knowledge, or consent. The court declared the defendant a trustee to the extent of the money of the plaintiff used by him, and charged the same upon the property, and in default of its payment by a certain time decreed that the same be sold to satisfy the said lien. These and other authorities that could be cited abundantly sustain the intimation of Chief Justice Ruffin, to which we have referred, and we are therefore of the opinion that the money fraudulently obtained of the plaintiff may be followed into the land described in the complaint, and that the judgment of his honor should be so modified as to declare it to be a charge upon the same.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

N. H. GUNN, Appt.,

v.

WHITE SEWING MACHINE CO.

(.....Ark.....)

A contract by which a resident of a state agrees with a foreign corporation to canvass certain territory for the sale of its sewing machines which the corporation thereby agrees to sell to him on credit and a bond given to secure payment to the corporation of any sum that may become due under such contract constitutes a part of the interstate commerce carried on by the sale of such sewing machines in accordance with said contract and therefore cannot be affected by a state statute prohibiting business within the state by a foreign corporation which has not complied with certain requirements such as filing a certificate to designate an agent on whom process may be served.

(Cockrill, Ch. J., and Mansfield, J., dissent.)

(December 8, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Faulkner County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce the liability of defendant as surety upon a bond which had been given to plaintiff by one, Julian, in connection with a contract for the sale of plaintiff's machines. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. H. Harrod and E. A. Bolton, for appellant:

The legislation of a state will only be restrained when the exercise of the right conflicts with the perfect execution of a sovereign power delegated to the United States.

Dobbins v. Erie County, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 435, 10 L. ed. 1022.

Even if a state were bound to accord to a company the right of acting in a corporate capacity within its limits, the state would undoubtedly retain the power of making reasonable regulations for the government of the company, and prescribing conditions to be complied with before the right may be claimed.

2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 974.

Messrs. Sanders & Watkins for appellee.

NOTE.—For note on peddlers and drummers as related to interstate commerce, see Re Spain (N. C.) 14 L. R. A. 97.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The White Sewing Machine Company was a corporation organized and doing business under the laws of the state of Ohio, and was engaged in the selling of sewing machines and other goods at Cleveland, in that state. A. I. Julian and N. H. Gunn were citizens of Faulkner county, in this state. On or about the 6th day of August, 1888, the sewing machine company entered into a contract with Julian, by which the company undertook and bound itself to sell sewing machines, and the component parts thereof, to Julian, at stipulated prices, on a credit, and Julian agreed to canvass Faulkner county, or cause it to be canvassed, "with horse and wagon, exclusively for the sale of the White sewing machines." Julian was to order the machines, or the component parts of the same, when he desired them to be sent to him. At the same time Julian, as principal, and Gunn, as surety, executed a bond to the sewing machine company, conditioned, among other things, that Julian would pay all sums of money that he would be owing to the company for sewing machines or otherwise. After this the company, pursuant to the terms of its contract, and on the faith of the bond executed to it, sold and shipped to Julian a large number of sewing machines and other property, and Julian became indebted to it on account thereof in a large sum of money. Julian failing to pay, the company brought this action on the bond against Gunn to recover the same, or a part thereof.

The only defense made by Gunn was the company had not, at the time the bond was executed, filed any certificate in the office of the secretary of the state of Arkansas, designating an agent upon whom process could be served, and its principal place of business in this state.

Evidence was, however, adduced at the trial tending to prove, among other things, the facts before stated, and that the machines and other property were sold by the company in Ohio, and shipped to Julian in this state. The court below held that these transactions were a part of the interstate commerce of the United States, and were not affected by the laws of this state, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff against the defendant, and he appealed.

Appellant contends that the bond sued on is void under the Act of the General Assembly of April 4, 1887. That Act declares that before any foreign corporation shall begin to carry on business in this state it shall, by a certificate under the hand of the president and seal of such company, filed in the office of the secretary of state, designate an agent, who shall be a citizen of the state, upon whom process may be served, and also state therein its principal place of business in this state; and provided that, if any such corporation shall fail to file such certificate, all its contracts with citizens of this state shall be void as to the corporation, and shall not be enforced in any of the courts of this state in favor of the corporation.

It is conceded that the certificate required by that Act was not filed by the appellee until after the debt sued on matured. Was the bond void?

In Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 857, the court, speaking of a foreign corporation, said: "The recognition of its existence, even by other states, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those states,—a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers is prejudicial to their interests, or repugnant to their policy. Having no absolute right of recognition in other states, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows as a matter of course that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those states may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely, they may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as in their judgment will best promote the public interests. The whole matter rests in their discretion."

But this right of the state cannot be so exercised as to interfere with the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. In Paul v. Virginia the corporation involved in litigation was an insurance company, and was not engaged in interstate commerce. In speaking of the power to regulate commerce, in that case, the court further said: "It is undoubtedly true, as stated by counsel, that the power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce includes as well commerce carried on by corporations as commerce carried on by individuals. . . . This state of facts forbids the supposition that it was intended in the grant of power to Congress to exclude from its control the commerce of corporations. The language of the grant makes no reference to the instrumentalities by which commerce may be carried on. It is general, and includes a like commerce by individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations."

In Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, the court, speaking of interstate commerce, said: "The power to regulate that commerce, as well as commerce with foreign nations, vested in Congress, is the power to prescribe the rules by which it shall be governed; that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted, to determine when it shall be free, and when subject to duties or other exactions. The power also embraces within its control all the instrumentalities by which that commerce may be carried on, and the means by which it may be aided and encouraged. The subjects, therefore, upon which the power may be exerted are of infinite variety. While, with reference to some of them, which are local and limited in their nature or sphere of operation, the states may prescribe regulations until Congress intervenes and assumes control of them, yet, when they are national in their character, and require uniformity of regulation, affecting alike all the states, the power of Congress is exclusive. . . . Nor does it make any difference whether such commerce is carried on by individuals or by corporations."

In Pembina Consol. S. Min. & M. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 81 L. ed. 650, the court, after discussing this power at length, said: "The only limitation upon this power of the state to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within its limits, or hiring offices for that purpose, or to exact conditions for allowing the corporation to do business or hire offices there, arises where the corporation is in the employ of the Federal government, or where its business is strictly commerce, interstate or foreign. The control of such commerce, being in the Federal government, is not to be restricted by state authority." Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708; Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 118 U. S. 727, 28 L. ed. 1137.

In Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, the court said: "Certain principles have been already established by the decisions of this court which will conduct us to a satisfactory decision. Among those principles are the following: (1) The Constitution of the United States having given to Congress the power to regulate commerce, not only with foreign nations, but among the several states, that power is necessarily exclusive whenever the subjects of it are national in their character, or admit only of one uniform system or plan of regulation. . . . (2) Another established doctrine of this court is that, where the power of Congress to regulate is exclusive, the failure of Congress to make express regulations indicates its will that the subject shall be left free from any restrictions or impositions; and any regulation of the subject by the states, except in matters of local concern only, as hereinafter mentioned, is repugnant to such freedom."

"Of the former class may be mentioned all that portion of commerce with foreign countries or between the states which consist in the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. Here there can of necessity be only one system or plan of regulations, and that Congress alone can prescribe." Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U.

"Of the class of subjects local in their nature or intended as mere aids to commerce," on which it has been held that the authority of the states may be exerted for their regulation and management until Congress interferes and supercedes it, "may be mentioned harbor pilotage, buoys, beacons to guide mariners to the proper channels in which to direct their vessels," bridges over navigable streams, wharves, wharfage and quarantine. "State action upon such subjects," said the court in Mobile County v. Kimball, supra, "can constitute no interference with the commercial power of Congress, for, when that acts, the state authority is superseded. Inaction of Congress upon these subjects of local nature or operation, unlike its inaction upon matters affecting all the states, and requiring uniformity of regulation, is not to be taken as a declaration that nothing shall be done in respect to them, but is rather to be deemed a declaration that for the time being, and until it sees fit to act, they may be regulated by state authority."

A few cases will serve to show the character of some of the statutes which have been held by the court to be unconstitutional because they interfere with the exclusive power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and thereby what constitutes, in part, the commerce over which such power extends. In Hall v. DeCuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547, a statute of the state of Louisiana which attempted to regulate the carriage of passengers upon railroads, steamboats, and other public conveyances, and which provided that no regulation of any companies engaged in that business should make any discrimination on account of race or color, was considered. "The case presented under the statute was that of a person of color, who took passage from New Orleans for Hermitage, both places being within the limits of the state of Louisiana, and was refused accommodations in the general cabin on account of color. In regard to this the court declared that, for the purposes of this case, we must treat the Act of Louisiana of February 23, 1869, as requiring those engaged in interstate commerce to give all persons traveling in that state, upon public conveyances employed in such business, equal rights and privileges in all parts of the conveyance, without distinction or discrimination on account of race or color."

We have nothing whatever to do with it as a regulation of internal commerce, or as affecting anything else than commerce among the states." And, speaking in reference to the right of the states, in certain classes of interstate commerce, to pass laws regulating them, the court said: "The line which separates the powers of the states from this exclusive power of Congress is not always distinctly marked, and oftentimes it is not easy to determine on which side a particular case belongs. . . . But we think it may safely be said that state legislation which seeks to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce, or to interfere directly with its freedom, does encroach upon 18 L. R. A.

the exclusive power of Congress. The statute now under consideration, in our opinion, occupies that position. It does not act upon the business through the local instruments to be employed after coming within the state, but directly upon the business as it comes into the state from without, or goes out from within. While it purports only to control the carrier when engaged within the state, it must necessarily influence his conduct to some extent in the management of his business throughout his entire voyage."

In Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, the taxing district of Shelby county, Tenn., which includes the city of Memphis, acting under the authority of a statute of that state attempted to impose a license tax upon a drummer for soliciting, within that district, the sale of goods for a firm in Cincinnati, which he represented; but the court decided that such a soliciting of business constituted a part of interstate commerce, and that the statute of Tennessee imposing a tax upon such business was in conflict with the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, and was therefore void.

In McCall v. California, 186 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 392, the plaintiff in error was convicted of violating an order of the city and county of San Francisco, in the state of California, which made it a misdemeanor for any one to act as an agent of a railroad company without having first paid the sum of $25 as a license fee. He was an agent in said city and county for the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, a corporation having its principal place of business in the city of Chicago, and which operated a continuous line of road between Chicago and New York. As such agent his duties consisted in soliciting passenger traffic in that city and county over the road he represented. He did not sell tickets for his company; neither did he receive nor pay out money on account of it. His sole offense consisted in soliciting passengers to go over his company's road, without having paid the license tax imposed upon him by said order as a condition precedent to his right to act as such agent in said county. The court held that the license fee as to such agency was a tax upon interstate commerce, and in that respect was unconstitutional. The court, speaking of the agency and tax, said: "The object and effect of his soliciting agency were to swell the volume of the business of the road. It was one of the means by which the company sought to increase, and doubtless did increase, its interstate passenger traffic. It was not incidentally or remotely connected with the business of the road, but was a direct method of increasing that business. The tax upon it, therefore, was, according to the principles established by the decisions of this court, a tax upon a means or an occupation of carrying on interstate commerce, pure and simple."

In this case the contract between the corporation and Julian, and the bond sued on, were executed in this state, and were business transacted in Arkansas. But no sales or indebtedness were created by them. The contract was only an agreement to sell, and the bond was a condition upon which the corporation agreed to sell and a means adopted to secure the indebtedness to be contracted by sales, and both constituted a contract. They were made a foundation of a future trade between a corporation of one state and a citizen of another, and were a direct method devised to increase the business of the former, and, as to them, served as a basis of interstate commerce. Relying on them, the corporation sold the machines and other property, and shipped them from the state of Ohio, its place of manufacture and business, to Julian, in Arkansas; the place of sales being in Ohio. Until they ceased, according to their terms or by agreement of the parties to be of any force, they were an inducement to, and entered into, every sale, and formed a part of it. According to the principles firmly established by numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, they, (the bond and contract,) and the sales and shipment of the machinery and other property, were a part of the interstate commerce of the United States, which Congress has the exclusive right to regulate, and were and could not be affected by the Act of April 4, 1887.

Judgment affirmed.

Cockrill, Ch. J., dissenting:

A corporation created under the laws of one state has no right to recognition in another state. It is a privilege to be enjoyed only through comity. Having the absolute power of excluding it from its jurisdiction, the state may, of course, impose such conditions upon the privilege of doing business in its limits as it may think expedient. This doctrine went without qualification for more than three fourths of a century after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, when the Supreme Court of the United States ingrafted upon it an exception in favor of foreign corporations which were agencies of commerce. The exception was first adverted to in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168. 19 L. ed. 357. But that was confessedly obiter, and established nothing. It has been said by judges delivering the opinions of the court that the exception was first established in Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 1. 24 L. ed. 708, in 1877. See Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 805, 314, 36 L. ed. 164, 167; Pembina Consol. S. Min. & M. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 185, 31 L. ed. 650, 652. But Chief Justice Waite, who delivered the opinion in that case, seems not to have been aware that he was deciding the question, for, after quoting the obiter in Paul v. Virginia above mentioned, he says, "the questions thus suggested need not be considered now," and gives as a reason for it the fact that the court had placed the invalidity of the state statute under consideration upon the ground that it conflicted with the legislation of Congress. The question has since been adjudicated in several cases. I am aware of no case in which it has been ruled that the exception applies to a foreign corporation which is not itself an agency of commerce. There are dicta which may go further, but there are also expressions of the courts so pointed as to indicate that the exception is limited to such corporations as are agencies of commerce,—as carriers of freight, passengers, or communications. Thus, in Pembina Consol. S. Min. & M. Co. v. Pennsylvania, supra, Judge Field, who first gave expression to the exception, in speaking of the case of Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co., supra, said it was there held that the telegraph, as an agency of commerce and intercommunication, came under the controlling power of Congress and could not be excluded by a state from transacting its business within its limits. And again, in the same case, he says the exception extends only to a foreign corporation in the employ of the Federal government, "or where its business is strictly commerce." The same language is quoted with approval through Judge Lamar in McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 112, 34 L. ed. 898. In Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, Judge Bradley, after saying that a state could not restrict the right of a foreign corporation where "the principal object of its organization" was "the business of carrying on interstate commerce," said: "The case is entirely different from that of . . . manufacturing corporations, and all other corporations whose business is of a local and domestic nature."

Conceding that the extreme doctrine of Robbins v. Shelby County Tax Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, must be extended to foreign corporations, the conclusion does not follow that such a corporation, engaged in interstate trade,—as selling merchandise,—can gain a domicile in a state in violation of its statutes, merely to gain a vantage ground for the sale of its goods. A manufacturing corporation is connected with commerce, for if it cannot sell, its output is worthless. Many manufacturing corporations would suspend operations if their sales were limited to the state creating them. They are, then, in a measure connected with interstate commerce. But the business connection with commerce must be direct in order to work an inhibition of state action. It is not sufficient that the business is remotely or incidentally connected with interstate or foreign commerce. State legislation which operates upon natural persons and corporate agencies of commerce is not invalidated by the commerce clause of the Constitution, unless it directly affects commerce. Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 102, 23 L. ed. 819, 820; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 474, 31 L. ed. 511. The rule as to corporate business cannot be more rigid against the state's right of regulation or prohibition. In Pembina Consol. S. Min. & M. Co. v. Pennsylvania, supra, state legislation was upheld restricting the privilege of a foreign mining company from maintaining an office in Pennsylvania notwithstanding the maintenance of the office in that state afforded the corporation the opportunity for the sale of its foreign products. So in Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 805, 36 L. ed. 164.

Following the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the only question in this case open to serious consideration, in my judgment, is, Did the White Sewing Machine Company do business in this state? Or, to put the question as Judge Field does in the case of Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, supra, Did the company do business as a corporation in this state? If so, it must submit to any condition the state sees fit to impose upon it. Any other rule would bind the hands of the state authorities, only to subject the public to all the corporate abuses now known or hereafter to be devised. The statement of such a doctrine is startling. This case does not stand upon a single casual transaction in Arkansas followed by contracts for sales of merchandise which were consummated in Ohio. Nor was the contract which the corporation entered into with Julian, for whom the appellant was surety, simply an agreement to sell merchandise. If those were the only facts in the case, it might be gravely doubted whether the corporation had done business in Arkansas, within the meaning of our Constitution and statute. It has been ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States that a foreign corporation does not, by doing a single act of business in one state, with no purpose of doing other acts there, come within the prohibition of a constitution and statute which are substantially like our own. Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727, 28 L. ed. 1187. See Scruggs v. Scottish-American Mortg. Co. 54 Ark. 566. And a merchant in Ohio who fills orders for merchandise received from a customer in Arkansas, cannot be said to be doing business in the latter state. If neither one nor the other constitutes carrying on business in Arkansas, it is difficult to see how the two together could make out the case. If they do not no question under the commerce clause of the Constitution is presented, and the discussion of it by the court is obiter. But the record shows the following state of facts in this case: The White Sewing Machine Company, an Ohio corporation, maintained a resident agent at Little Rock, in this state. The proof does not show that the agent held or sold any machines or other merchandise for the company. He traveled over the state, and in the name of the company sold to individuals the exclusive right to vend its merchandise in a limited territory. The consideration for this exclusive privilege was a contract on the part of the vendee, binding himself to sell no other sewing machine, and to canvass the territory assigned to him in the interest of the White machine. The company also bound itself to sell the vendee White sewing machines upon terms fixed by the contract. As a part of this contract, the vendee was also required to enter into bond to the company, with a surety, for the faithful payment of whatever indebtedness might be incurred by them to the corporation under the contract named, or by any other means, whether the same should arise out of the purchase and sale or lease of sewing machines, or the consignment of property or merchandise, or the failure to redeliver or account for the same to the corporation, or for indebtedness arising in any manner whatever.

A great number of such contracts were entered into before the corporation complied with the statute. After the one in suit was executed, the corporation complied with the law by filing a certificate designating the agent before mentioned as the person upon whom service might be had, and Little Rock as its principal place of business in Arkansas. The business continued as before. Julian signed one of these contracts and bond, with the appellant as surety, and purchased machines, as set out in my Brother Battle's opinion. The suit is to recover upon the bond thus executed. I understand that it is upon the uncontroverted facts above stated that the court concludes that the corporation carried on business in Arkansas. The ruling that it carried on business, within the meaning of the statute, is expressly announced. The evidence does not show simply the case of a drummer soliciting contracts for purchase of merchandise, to be consummated in Ohio, as was the case of Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694. It shows that the intention of the foreign corporation to gain a domicile in Arkansas, and to carry on its business of selling, leasing, and consigning machines there through local agents, as it was authorized to do in the state of Ohio. To ascertain whether the corporation did business in Arkansas, we are not required to limit our inquiry to the transaction with which the defendant alone is concerned. If it was carrying on a business in Arkansas before and after the transaction with the defendant, it was competent for him to show that his transaction was of the general class; and when it is proved that the corporation has done acts here manifesting the intent to gain a domicile for the purpose of transacting its business, that is the beginning of its business here, and the contracts which manifest that intention are avoided by the statute. The instant the business is entered upon, the prohibition of the statute attaches, without waiting to see what the corporation will do next. Suppose the corporation had entered into a contract to hire an office in Arkansas, with the avowed purpose of establishing a domicile here. That would be sufficient proof of the beginning of business here, and, as the statute prohibits it from beginning business here until it complies with the law, it could not enforce the contract. The fact that the transaction in suit, if isolated from the others, would show one connected transaction of interstate commerce, and nothing more, will not take the case out of the statute, for when it is once established that the corporation is exercising its functions in a foreign state, as distinguished from the performance of mere commercial acts to be consummated in another state, it becomes subject to state regulation. Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, supra; Baker v. State, 44 Ark. 134. That the acts of the corporation in this case are not mere commercial transactions of the character indicated, seems apparent. The sales by the corporation of exclusive territory within which the vendees might sell White sewing machines, and the covenant on their part that they would sell none other, are contracts executed and to be performed in Arkansas, and, if connected with interstate commerce, it is remotely. The terms of the contracts show that they relate not only to domestic commerce, but to transactions having no connection with commerce at all; and the contract of suretyship, like the contract of insurance and indemnity, is not the subject of commerce. These matters were not transactions of interstate commerce, but were business transacted in the state independently of commerce. According to the decisions above cited, they rendered the corporation amenable to state regulation.

The defendant's cause might be rested here, but I think it may be fortified still further. If the foreign corporation were strictly an agency of commerce, entering the state for the purpose of carrying on the business of interstate commerce, I think it should be held that the regulation is not a restriction upon commerce. What is the regulation? It is that the foreign corporation doing business in this state shall make known its place of business here, and designate the agent upon whom service shall be had. No license fee or tax is demanded of the corporation. Not even a fee for defraying the expenses of the regulation is required. The regulation, then, is nothing more than that the corporation doing business here shall consent to be found here, and shall designate the officer upon whom service shall be had, and where he may be found. In theory the domicile of a corporation is only in the state where it is created, and the general rule, in the absence of legislation, is that it can be found nowhere else. But when it sends its agents into a foreign state to transact its business it is really as much represented by them there as in the state of its creation. It is competent for the Legislature of the foreign state to enact that personal service may be had on the corporation by service on agents in its borders who transact the company's business there. The corporation doing business thereafter in the foreign state is presumed to assent to that rule. American Casualty I. Co. v. Lea, (Ark.) 20 S. W. Rep. 416. But it was found often inconvenient for the creditor of the corporation to prove the agency, and so, to make the matter simpler, some of the states enacted that some particular state official should be authorized to receive service for the corporation. That is the law in this state as to insurance companies. As to others, it requires the corporation to designate a person who shall be its agent to receive service. That is fairer to the corporation than to compel it to run the risk of having judgment rendered against it by service on some one of a number of persons transacting business for it, who may not have the interest of the corporation at heart enough to notify it of the pendency of the suit. It is better for the creditor, because he is relieved of doubt as to the proper person upon whom to get service. To enforce the regulation, the penalty of avoiding the contract for its violation is imposed. That the regulation is reasonable, and within the power of the state, has never been doubted. St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 27 L. ed. 222; Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, supra. "Legislation in a great variety of ways may affect commerce and persons engaged in it, without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution; and it may be said generally that the legislation of a state, not directly against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operation of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate." Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. ed. 819; Nashville, O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 30 L. ed. 352; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Hanniford, 49 Ark. 291. This legislation is not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relates only to the right of the citizen to sue in the jurisdiction where the cause of action arises, and imposes upon the corporation only the duty of submitting to that jurisdiction. The domestic corporation is required to show by record where its principal place of business is, and the law specifies that service may be had on its officers. "It does not lie in any foreign corporation to complain that it is subjected to the same law as the domestic corporation." Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, supra. When a state no longer possesses the power to compel every corporation doing business within its jurisdiction, whether exclusively engaged in interstate or foreign commerce or not, to give publicity to its affairs in so simple a matter as making known its officers and place of business there will remain but little of value in its reserved rights. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the complaint dismissed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

John R. McAFEE, Appt.,

v.

Julia E. REYNOLDS.

1. A judgment creditor may maintain a suit in equity to have the lien of his judgment declared paramount to the title of the purchaser at a sale by the administrator of the judgment debtor, where such sale was made without mention of the judgment, since a motion would not remove the obstruction to the enforcement of the judgment, and a sale upon

NOTE.—The decision that a valid cause of action may be lost by mere lapse of time pending a suit to enforce it is a striking exception to the general 18 L. R. A.

rule. The peculiar character of the action which rests on a mere statutory right limited as to time furnishes the explanation. A direct precedent is execution would leave such purchaser's claim undetermined.

2. The expiration of the time during which a judgment continues to be a lien on land pending an action to have its existence established and to enforce it against a title inferior to it but which would be a cloud on the title of an execution purchaser, although not entirely defeating the action will deprive plaintiff of the right to have the lien enforced since the court cannot extend its life beyond the statutory period.

(September 23, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for White County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to have plaintiff's judgment lien upon certain real estate declared paramount to defendant's title thereto. Affirmed in part. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. P. Davidson, for appellant:

The duration of the lien of a judgment upon lands is, in this state, prescribed by statute and the statute is controlling.

Applegate v. Edwards, 45 Ind. 329; Brown v. Wuskoff, 118 Ind. 569; Mahoney v. Neff, 124 Ind. 380.

Other states have statutes in similar or precisely the same terms, and the courts are uniform in their holdings, (save in one state).

Freeman's note to Bank of Missouri v. Wells, 51 Am. Dec. 163.

The lien can continue no longer than the statute declares.

Albee v. Curtis, 77 Iowa, 644.

The lapse of time annihilates it.

Hendershott v. Ping, 24 Iowa, 184; Tucker v. Shude, 25 Ohio St. 355.

The time cannot be extended by the issuance or levy of an execution.

Albee v. Curtis, supra; Lakin v. McCormick, 81 Iowa, 545; Polk County v. Nelson, 75 Iowa, 648; Rogers v. Druffel, 46 Cal. 654; Eby v. Foster, 61 Cal. 287; Freeman, Judgments, 8d ed. § 395.

The execution plaintiff takes the risk of delay.

Shanklin v. Sims, 8 West. Rep. 867, 110 Ind. 143.

A sale on execution after expiration of the statutory time confers no title.

Pierce v. Fuller, 86 Hun, 179; Payson v. Rhyne, 82 N. C. 149; Freeman, Judgments, § 394a; 1 Freeman, Executions, § 205.

It is not within the power of a court of equity to renew or extend the lien, and if it expire pending suit the power of the court is gone.

Hutcheson v. Grubbs, 80 Va. 251 (see note on this case, 20 Cent. L. J. 463); Sutton v. McKenney, 82 Va. 46; Dabney v. Shelton, 82 Va. 349; Straus v. Bodeker, 13 Va. L. J. 855.

So inflexible are these statutes that even though process be prevented by war there can be no relaxation.

Smart v. Mason, 2 Heisk. 228.

Nor because a homestead right stood in the way.

Anderson v. Kulgo, 81 Ga. 699.

There can be no exceptions other than those expressly allowed by the statute.

Reilly v. Clark, 81 W. Va. 571; Straus v. Bodeker, supra.

Newell v. Dart, 28 Minn. 248, was a suit by creditors' bill to enforce the lien of a judgment against lands. The lien expired pending the suit, and it was held that the power of the court was at an end. That case was reaffirmed in Spencer v. Harg, 55 Minn. 231.

The statute was precisely as our own.

In Boyle v. Maroney, 73 Iowa, 70, the suit for a like purpose was commenced in 1873, three years after Francis obtained his judgment and lien, but was not determined until 1886—after the ten years had elapsed. The court below decreed a revivor of the lien, but this decision was reversed on appeal, the lien having expired sub judice.

The statute gave the appellee her remedy.

Decker v. Gilbert, 80 Ind. 107.

Where there was a plain remedy the court had no equitable jurisdiction further than to order an execution, and could not foreclose the lien of the judgment after the manner of a mortgage.

House Mach. Co. v. Miner, 28 Kan. 441.

Messrs. Jay H. Adams and John B. Sherwood, for appellee:

The question is not whether the lien of a judgment upon real estate may be prolonged beyond the statutory period fixed for such liens, but, whether the rights and liens existing and held and enjoyed by the plaintiff at the time of bringing suit, shall be adjudged and enforced as of the date of the commencement of the action.

The rights of the plaintiff must be determined as they existed at the commencement of this suit. The fact that ten years, exclusive of the time the plaintiff was restrained from prosecuting her remedy upon the judgment by the death of the judgment defendant, has expired since the commencement of this suit, is no bar to her right to recover.

The judgment debtor having died, and the title to the real estate having passed to another, the proper proceeding to enforce the lien of the judgment was an action against the purchaser to declare the lien of the judgment, and for an order of sale of the land to discharge the lien.

Decker v. Gilbert, 80 Ind. 107.

If a person goes into court seasonably to enforce a right, such right will be protected, declared and enforced as the same existed and was enforceable at the commencement of the action.

Caswell v. Kemp, 41 Hun, 484.

found in Newell v. Dart, 28 Minn. 248, which is quoted in the appellant's brief and also cited in the opinion. The case of Boyle v. Maroney, 73 Iowa, 70, which is also quoted, is less nearly in point as it was not the lien of plaintiff's judgment which expired pending that suit but the lien of a defendant's judgment who had purchased the land on execution sale and who had taken no steps at the time the lien expired to preserve or revive it. On setting aside the execution sale, the appellate court held that the lien could not be reinstated as against the plaintiff, who was another judgment creditor.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 19th day of June, 1877, Robert J. Brown was the owner of the real estate involved in this controversy, and on that day Earhart and others obtained judgment against him. This judgment became a lien upon the real estate, and has never been paid or satisfied. Brown died on the 6th day of November, 1877. By proper assignments, the appellee became the owner of the judgment. James M. Brown was appointed the administrator of the estate of Robert J. Brown, deceased, on the 3d day of December, 1877, and on the 30th day of July, 1878, petitioned for an order to sell the land to pay the debts of his intestate. Joseph Kious became the successor of James M. Brown, and filed a supplemental petition for an order for the sale of the property, and an order was made as prayed. Neither the appellee nor any other lienholder was a party to the proceedings, except in so far as the notice given by publication made under the law then in force may have constituted them parties. The real estate was sold pursuant to the order to the appellant on the 1st day of October, 1877. The purchase money was paid by him, and a deed was executed and approved. Under this deed, the grantee entered into possession. The estate of Robert J. Brown was insolvent. The only mention of liens in the proceedings on the petition was made in the decree approving and confirming the deed executed by the administrator, and the mention there made is not of the judgment of the appellee, but of a judgment owned by John P. Carr. The present action was begun on the 24th day of February, 1888. The conclusions of law stated by the court read thus: "(1) The rights of the plaintiff must be determined as they existed at the commencement of this suit. The fact that ten years, exclusive of the time the plaintiff was restrained from prosecuting her remedy upon the judgment by the death of the judgment defendant, has expired since the commencement of this suit is no bar to his right to recover. (2) The sale of the land by the administrator was made to the defendant subject to the lien of the plaintiff's judgment. So much of the decree confirming the deed to the defendant as adjudged that he take the land free of liens and incumbrances is void as to the plaintiff. There is nothing in the petition to sell, the appraisement, the order of sale, or the report of sale that authorizes any such decree. (3) The plaintiff is entitled to the relief prayed for in his complaint, with costs."

It is obvious that the right of the plaintiff created by her judgment was not divested by the decree directing the sale of the lands, nor is it contended by appellant's counsel that the lien was extinguished. It is also evident that the time the hands of the judgment creditor were tied by the statutory provision restraining proceedings to enforce a judgment for the period of one year after the death of the debtor cannot be justly considered in computing the time during which the lien continues in force. Jones v. Detchon, 91 Ind. 154. This, we understand, is conceded by appellant's counsel. The contention of appellant's counsel is, in effect, that the lien of the judgment having expired on the 4th day of July, 1888, after that time no decree could be rendered declaratory of its existence and providing for its enforcement. The appellee's counsel assert that "the question is not whether the lien of a judgment upon real estate may be prolonged beyond the statutory period fixed for such liens, but whether the rights and liens existing and held by the plaintiff at the time of bringing suit shall be adjudged and enforced as of the date of the commencement of action." This statement of the respective positions of counsel exhibit the principal question in the case. The land had passed into the hands of a third person, the purchaser at the administrator's sale, and hence the judgment creditor had a right to bring a suit to have his lien declared and freed from the claim asserted by the purchaser under the administrator's deed. Decker v. Gilbert, 80 Ind. 107; Faulkner v. Larrabee, 76 Ind. 154. The claim of the appellant was an obstruction to the enforcement of the judgment lien, and the creditor had a right to ask that the obstruction be removed so as to enable her to realize the benefit of her judgment. Quart v. Abbett, 102 Ind. 238, 53 Am. Rep. 662. Under the old procedure, scire facias was the appropriate procedure, where the rights of a third person intervened. 1 Freeman, Executions, 81. But, where such a proceeding would not give adequate relief, the assistance of equity was properly invoked. In such a case as this it is evident that a mere motion for leave to issue an execution would not secure adequate relief, since a sale upon execution would still leave the claim of the appellant undetermined; so that if it were conceded that the remedy by motion exists where the rights of a third person, based upon a claim of title created by a decree in judicial proceedings, have intervened, and where the judgment debtor has died, still that remedy would not be adequate, inasmuch as the order would not fully remove the obstruction created by the sale under the decree. The rule is that where there is some remedy at law, but not an adequate one,—that is, one that will adjudicate the entire controversy and grant full relief,—equity will assume jurisdiction. Watson v. Sutherland, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 74, 18 L. ed. 580; Denny v. Denny, 113 Ind. 22, 12 West. Rep. 200; Bishop v. Moorman, 98 Ind. 1, 49 Am. Rep. 731, and authorities cited. Whatever view is taken of the case, the result is that the conclusion must be that the suit is an appropriate one, and there was no mistake in electing the remedy.

What we have said establishes the initial proposition involved, inasmuch as it proves that the plaintiff stated a cause of action when she began her suit. If she is to be entirely defeated, it must be for the reason that the efflux of time has destroyed her right. Ordinarily, a plaintiff will succeed if, at the time he sues, a complete cause of action exists in him. This is a general rule to which there are few exceptions. The cases wherein the plaintiff by his own acts devests himself of a right of action constitute the most numerous class of exceptions; but there is here no element which makes that class of cases even remotely analogous, since no act was done by the plaintiff after suit which released or impaired her rights. If the right of action which existed in the plaintiff when she began her action has been destroyed, it must be because the law so operates as to take it from her. There is no express enactment divesting the cause of action, and no event has occurred changing the position of the parties. The only thing that can be said to have affected the case in any way is the lapse of time. If this can be assigned a retrospective effect, then there is plausibility and force in the contention that the right of action was wholly swept away; if not, then the contention is foundationless. If the lapse of time, without any fault of a plaintiff or any act of his, can destroy a cause of action, then it is in the power of a defendant, by prolonging litigation, to destroy a meritorious cause of action, and this is a result not to be reached without strong and cogent reasons. If a cause of action exists when a suit is begun, the plaintiff has a substantive right, and where there is a right there is a remedy. Where there is a right and a corresponding remedy, and steps have been taken to vindicate the right, a plaintiff has done all that the law requires of him, and he cannot be turned out of court, because delay, attributable to no fault of his, renders the right asserted by him ineffective. It seems clear to us, on principle, that the appellee did not lose her cause of action because of the lapse of time, and that the time which intervened between the bringing of the suit and the decision cannot so operate as to defeat her suit. What its effect is upon the measure of relief is quite another question, and one that will be considered further on. It may, however, be here said appropriately that the right to sue is one thing, and the quantity or degree of relief quite another thing. The difficult question here is not as to the existence of a right of action at the time the complaint was filed, but the difficult question is as to the measure of relief the plaintiff was entitled to at the time the decree was entered. The difficulty is created by the fact, for fact it is, that at the time the decree was pronounced the judgment of the plaintiff had ceased to have any force as a lien. The proposition of appellant that the lien of a judgment, as fixed by the statute, cannot be prolonged by the courts, is indisputably correct. Wells v. Bower, 126 Ind. 115; Shanklin v. Sims, 110 Ind. 143, 8 West. Rep. 867; Brown v. Wuskoff, 118 Ind. 569; Applegate v. Edwards, 45 Ind. 829; Albee v. Curtis, 77 Iowa, 644; Hutcheson v. Grubbs, 80 Va. 251; Boyle v. Maroney, 73 Iowa, 70; Spencer v. Haug, 55 Minn. 231; Newell v. Dart, 28 Minn. 248.

A judgment lien is the creature of statute, owing its life and force entirely to legislation. It has, indeed, been said that a judgment is a charge on land, but not in strictness a lien. Shirk v. Thomas, 121 Ind. 147; Johnson v. Hess, 126 Ind. 298-311, 9 L. R. A. 18 L. R. A.

471; Brunsdon v. Allard, 2 El. & El. 19; Ex parte Foster, 2 Story, 131.

A party who secures a judgment obtains such a charge upon land as the statute gives, and nothing more, for it is clear that he can acquire only what the statute creating the rights vests in him. Our statute declares that the lien shall continue for ten years, and "no longer;" thus definitely and positively limiting the duration of the lien. As no court is above the law, and as all courts must enforce the law as it is written, it necessarily results that a lien created and limited by statute cannot be extended beyond the period fixed by the law-makers. A party may possess a right to have a lien declared and established, and yet have no right to a decree extending its life beyond the statutory period. It is this right which the appellee possessed when she began her suit, and not a right to have a new lien created, nor an existing one prolonged beyond the limit fixed by the law. Courts cannot create a judgment lien on land, nor can they fix its duration, since that is the prerogative of the Legislature. No authority for making a judgment a lien on land, or for designating its incidents, can be found in the common law, since at common law a judgment was not a general lien upon that species of property. There was, it is true, a right to make a judgment available to a limited extent; but, as said by Marshall, Ch. J., in the case of United States v. Morrison, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 124, 7 L. ed. 804. "The lien is the consequence of the right to take out an eligit."

We are satisfied that the trial court did not err in adjudging that the appellee had a right of action at the time her suit was commenced, but we cannot escape the conclusion that it erred in holding that she was entitled to a decree ordering the land sold, and placing the lien above the title of the appellant. This was erroneous, for the reason that it assumed to give vitality to a lien which, by positive and inexorable law, was lifeless. The conclusions of law, and the decretal orders based on them, show that the trial court affirmed that the appellee had a right to have the land sold to discharge the statutory lien, and that the only right of the appellant was to the surplus remaining after the satisfaction of the judgment. The theory of the court that the lien could be prolonged directly or indirectly was erroneous, for, when the lien perished by operation of law, it could not be revived, nor could a new lien be created. The utmost that the appellee was entitled to was, as we have shown, a decree declaring that when her suit was brought she had a lien prior to the title of the appellee. When the court went beyond this, it erred, inasmuch as in so doing it prolonged the lien beyond the time of its legal life. The record fully enables us to ascertain and declare the justice of the case, and hence it is our right and our duty to render such a judgment as will secure to each party his just rights. This is a general power resident in all high appellate tribunals, and it has been often exercised in cases such as this, where the facts are not in dispute, and all the material matters appear upon the face of the record. Parker v. Hubble, 75 Ind. 580; Buchanan v. Milligan, 108 Ind. 433, 6 West. Rep. 915; Western Union Teleg. Co. v. Brown, 108 Ind. 539-544, 5 West. Rep. 661; Bartholomew v. Pierson, 112 Ind. 430, 11 West. Rep. 848; Brown v. Jones, 118 Ind. 46, 11 West. Rep. 31², and cases cited page 50, 118 Ind.; Sinker v. Green, 118 Ind. 264, 12 West. Rep. 912; Murdock v. Cox, 118 Ind. 266; Security Co. v. Arbuckle, 119 Ind. 69; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Etzler, 119 Ind. 89-44; Roberts v. Lindley, 121 Ind. 56, and cases cited page 59, 121 Ind.; Lapham v. Dreisvogt, 36 Mo. App. 275; Duck v. Peeler, 74 Tex. 268; Clark v. Sonnenschein, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 226; Luthe v. Luthe, 12 Colo. 421; Athens Foundry & Mach. Works v. Bain, 77 Ga. 72; McKenzie v. Peck, 74 Wis. 208. The power, as the authorities declared, is one that should be freely exercised where its exercise will put an end to litigation and yield justice. To accomplish this, it is always proper to so mould the form of the mandate as that the trial court may carry into effect, by the appropriate record entries, the judgment of the appellate tribunal.

The mandate of this court is that the judgment of the trial court be in part affirmed and in part reversed; that the costs of the case in the court below, up to the entry of the special finding be taxed against the appellant; that subsequent costs in that court be taxed in equal proportion against the respective parties; that the costs in this court be divided and taxed in like manner; and that the case be remanded, with instructions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion, by eliminating so much of the decree as adjudges a sale of the land, prolongs the lien, and limits the right of the appellant to the surplus, and by entering the proper judgment for costs against the respective parties, as herein indicated.

Rehearing denied.

PULLMAN'S PALACE CAR CO., Appt.,

v.

William LAACK.

1. Only where the evidence by whomsoever introduced with all fair and legitimate inferences thereupon is so insufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff that the court must set it aside if rendered will the court be justified in directing a verdict for the defendant.
2. Failure to provide a stopcock in the pipe connecting an oil tank with burners used for firing a brick kiln may be found by the jury to be negligence notwithstanding there is a shut-off at each of the burners and one on the tank where the tube adjacent to each burner is by reason of its construction liable to crack and allow the oil to escape, which in such case would ignite and render approach to the burner impossible because of the heat, and the stop in the tank could not be turned without a mechanical appliance, while in case the flow of the oil was not stopped a conflagration and explosion of the tank was probable.
3. A master must notify a servant of increased danger to which he is exposed by reason of any omission to supply usual and ordinary means to prevent accident whereby the hazard to the servant is increased if the change is not known to the servant or so open and visible that by the exercise of ordinary care it will be seen and known.
4. A master cannot delegate to another, even though it be a fellow servant, the duty of notifying his servant of increased danger so as to absolve himself from liability for failure to communicate it.

NOTE.—The above case illustrates the application of the doctrine of proximate cause to a case in which there is negligence both of servant and of master or fellow servant.

5. Persons who under a license from the master put new burners in a brick kiln for the purpose of testing their merits are in the position of vice-principals so far as relates to making such apparatus suitable and safe for the employes or giving notice of increased danger.

6. A servant is not to be held guilty of negligence in returning to protect his master's property after he has reached a place of safety because some unforeseen cause intervenes, which, concurring with the master's negligence, produces an injury which reasonable and prudent foresight could not have anticipated.

7. The continued flow of burning oil which would have been at once checked except for the master's negligent failure to provide the usual facilities for cutting off the supply will render him liable in case of injury resulting therefrom to a servant although the injury would not have happened if a fellow servant had not also been negligent in failing to cut off the supply by the use of the less adequate facilities that did exist.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Shope, J.:

This was an action on the case by appellee against appellant, to recover for personal injury alleged to have been received through the negligence of appellant. For several years before the accident, appellant had been engaged in burning brick, and appellee worked as its servant in that business. In 1887 appellant commenced burning brick with crude oil for fuel, and appellee, before his injury, had assisted in burning several kilns of brick by the new method. In May, 1888, shortly after the kiln was fired, the injury occurred. The kiln then being burned was 70 or 80 feet long and about 80 feet wide; there were 18 or 20 arches running through from side to side. Around the kiln, a little way from it, near the ground, two pipes were laid side by side, each about two inches in diameter. One of these pipes carried steam, and the other oil for fuel. Opposite the end of each arch, two short pipes, three fourths of an inch in diameter, extended towards the arch, one connected with the oil pipe, and the other the steam pipe. The short steam pipe was about two feet and a half long; the small oil pipe perhaps a foot long. On the end of the steam pipe, at each arch, was placed what was known as the "burner." In the small oil pipes there was a check valve or stopcock, near the main oil pipe, and the connection was made between this pipe and the burner by a rubber tube connecting the short pipe with the burner. The purpose for which the rubber was used was to permit expansion and contraction of the small steam pipe; in other words, so as to make the pipe containing the oil flexible. The burner was by this means extended, not into, but as near, the arch as possible, and the oil injected into the arch by the action of the steam through the burner. On a side track, 20 feet or more away from the kiln, common railroad oil tanks were run on their trucks, and the oil carried therefrom by means of a two-inch pipe, and emptied into the oil pipe surrounding the kiln. Prior to the time of the accident, but one tank had been used at a time, and the supply pipe from the tank was fitted with a check valve near its entrance into the feed pipe, or the pipe encircling the kiln. Each of the small pipes extending from the steam and feed pipes were supplied with a stopcock near the feed pipe, so that both steam and oil could be shut off from any individual burner. There was also a check valve on the tank, by closing which the flow of oil from the tank could be shut off. This valve was so arranged that it could not be turned by hand, but necessarily required the use of a wrench or tongs.

In the afternoon before the accident, the kiln being in condition to fire, Williams, the kiln foreman, was ordered by appellant, through its superintendent, to cut the feed pipe in the middle of the kiln on each side, and stop the ends, which was done. Prior to this, there had been in use what was known as the Brown burner. They were directed to attach the Brown burner to one half of the feed pipe or the pipe encircling one half the kiln, which appellee and the gang of men with him, under the direction of the steam fitter of appellant, did. By the cutting of the oil pipe, the circulation of oil around the kiln was impossible, and, to supply the other end, another tank was run upon the side track, and attached, by a new supply pipe, with the other half of the feed pipe, so as to furnish oil to run the other burners to be thereto attached. The purpose was to test the relative merits of the Brown burner, and another called the Cannon burner, to see which would consume the greater amount of oil in producing the requisite continued heat. The attachment between the additional tank and the pipe surrounding the half of the kiln at which the Cannon burners were to be tested, including putting on the burners, was made by "Mr. Cannon and his men," possibly assisted by Mr. Williams, kiln foreman, and perhaps other fellow workmen about the kiln. Cannon had been a gas fitter, was familiar with the work, but neither he nor the men under him were in the employ of appellant. In making connection between the tank and the feed pipe encircling the half of the kiln at which the Cannon burners were put, no stopcock or valve was put in where the supply pipe from the tank joined the feed pipe, so that the oil running to the Cannon burners could be shut off only at two points,—at the tank and at the small stopcocks where the small burner pipes joined the feed pipe. At the other end, the supply pipe formerly in use was put in, which was supplied with the check valve near the feed pipe. This arrangement of the pipe to which the Cannon burners were attached was made by Cannon, and, as before said, possibly with the knowledge of the foreman; but appellee, nor the gang of men with whom he worked had no notice that the stopcock at the joining of the supply and feed pipes had been omitted. The rubber pipe leading to the burner, from the heat and action of the oil, was soon destroyed, and would break or crack off, permitting the oil to escape, and the oil, being highly inflammable, would catch fire from the heat of the arch, and prevent the closing of the small check valve in the pipe leading to the burner; and in such case the stopcock at the junction of the supply and feed pipes had always been used, and, by shutting off the oil there, a conflagration was prevented. This condition of things was known to appellee, and it had supplied rubber tubing in considerable quantities to take the place of such as might be destroyed in that way. It is shown that the breaking of the rubber and escape of the oil was frequent, the rubber lasting sometimes during the burning of a kiln, and sometimes not.

The kiln was fired in the evening. Appellee and the gang of men under him were in charge of the end of the kiln to which the old or Brown burners were fixed, and Williams and another shift of men in charge of the other end, until about 12 o'clock midnight, when Williams and his gang retired, and appellee and two helpers took charge of the entire kiln. About 4 o'clock in the morning appellee was on a ladder at the side of the kiln, observing the top, when a rubber hose connecting with one of the Cannon burners burst, and the oil immediately took fire, and, extending, so covered the small stopcock that it was impossible to close it. He ran immediately to the place where the supply pipe joined the feed pipe, expecting to find the stopcock where it had always previously been found, but found none. He called to the other employés, and went himself about 200 feet and turned in the fire alarm, and immediately returned to the end of the kiln where the fire was spreading. The fire was spreading rapidly, was very hot, and, fearing an explosion of the oil in the tank, appellee determined to disconnect the tank from the supply pipe and get it away from the fire. For this purpose he directed one of the men to shut off the tank; that is, to close the valve between the tank and the supply pipe. One of the men went on to the tank for that purpose and again got off. Appellee inquired if the valve had been closed, and one of the men replied that it had. He again inquired, and, upon being assured that it had been closed, he went under the tank and disconnected the feed pipe from the tank, when the oil from the tank flowed over him and saturated his clothing, which instantly caught fire from the burning oil spreading from the feed pipe. Appellee was seriously injured. It appears that the man who went upon the tank to close the valve endeavored to do so with his hands. Finding that impossible, he ran to get a wrench; but upon his return the flames were sweeping over the tank and drove him away.

The negligence charged in the declaration, in the first count, was the neglect of appellant to furnish proper and safe connections between the tank and the brick kiln, and that appellant negligently and improperly provided and used a connection made of rubber, which was unsuitable and improper for such purposes; that the rubber became heated, and cracked and broke, permitted the oil to escape, which took fire, etc. The second count alleged the use of crude oil was dangerous and hazardous; that plaintiff was in appellant's employ as assistant to the foreman, and his employment necessarily brought him near to the tanks, kilns, etc.; and it became and was the duty of appellant to exercise a high degree of care and diligence in providing proper and safe appliances around the brick kiln and oil tank, and proper connections, etc., and also to provide a safety check, or some suitable device, to stop the flow of oil in case of accident, etc., so as to insure the safety of its employes; yet appellant did not do so, but carelessly, negligently and improperly provided a connection made of rubber, which, on becoming heated, vulcanized and broke, and the oil thereby escaped, and, not having provided suitable and proper appliances by which the flow of the oil could be checked, the flames from the kiln communicated with the oil, resulting, etc. After the plaintiff rested his case, the defendant moved the court to direct the verdict for it, which the court denied. At the close of the case defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that the evidence did not sustain the plaintiff's cause of action, and to return a verdict for the defendant, which was also refused. The jury found for appellee and assessed his damages at $4,000. The judgment thereon was affirmed by the appellate court, and the case is brought here by the further appeal of the defendant below.

Messrs. J. S. Runnells and William Barry for appellant.

Mr. E. Furthmann for appellee.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the close of appellee's case in chief, appellant moved the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, and, this being denied, again, at the close of the case, 18 L. R. A.

asked, and the court refused, an instruction directing the jury to find for the defendant. This ruling of the court is assigned as error, and forms the chief ground of complaint in this court. If there is, in the record, evidence upon which a verdict for plaintiff may be sustained, the court committed no error in not taking the case from the jury. It is only where the evidence, with all fair and legitimate inferences thereupon, is so insufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff that the court must set it aside if rendered, that the court will be justified in directing a verdict for the defendant. Simmons v. Chicago & T. R. Co. 110 Ill. 846; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 109 Ill. 120; Goodrich v. Lincoln, 93 Ill. 860; Phillips v. Dickerson, 85 Ill. 11, 28 Am. Rep. 607; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Johnsen, 135 Ill. 641; Purdy v. Hall, 134 Ill. 298.

It is immaterial upon which side the evidence is introduced; if there is evidence which fairly tends to support the plaintiff's case, it must be submitted to the jury. If, therefore, there was any evidence tending to sustain the issues in plaintiff's behalf, the error is not well assigned in this court. The weight and degree of credit to be given to evidence falls within the province of the jury. And when their finding of fact has been approved by the trial court, and its judgment affirmed in the appellate court, the only question raised in this court by an instruction seeking to take the case from the jury is. Was there any evidence fairly tending to establish a right of recovery by the plaintiff? If there was, the finding of the trial and appellate court is conclusive as to its sufficiency to support the verdict.

It is, however, urged that the omission to put in a stopcock in the supply pipe was not negligence, even if appellant can be held responsible therefor, and, no other act of negligence being averred or proved, the plaintiff wholly failed to prove a case entitling him to recover. It is clear that the fact that the rubber used to carry the oil from the feed pipe to the burner was liable at any time to open and permit oil to escape, and that oil thus escaping was liable to ignite from the arch, was known not only to the persons engaged in burning the kiln, but to the superintendent and officers of appellant. It had frequently happened, and it was known, that the action of the oil and heat upon the rubber was such that it was very soon destroyed, and would crack open or break off. The company kept on hand a large supply of rubber to meet this condition. The manner of connecting the burner with the feed pipe was: The feed pipe opposite the arches was fitted with a short three-fourths inch pipe extending towards the arch, in which was fitted a stopcock. Over the end of this short pipe the rubber tubing was forced, and the other end in like manner attached to the burner. The rubber tubing was about 18 inches in length, and, when completed, it was about 80 inches from the feed pipe to the end of the burner next to the kiln. The effect of the breaking of the rubber might be the discharge of a stream of oil to its full capacity, practically under the stopcock, as the evidence tended to show was done by the breaking in this case. The effect testified to would be likely to occur. The oil being highly inflammable, and igniting, would prevent the use of the small stopcock to prevent the flow of oil. The evidence tended to show that, without negligence on the part of appellee or his fellow servants, it became, for the reason stated, immediately impossible to stop the flow of oil at that place; that he immediately went to the supply pipe, where a stopcock had always been before inserted, and found none; and that this was the first notice he, or, so far as shown, his fellow workmen then assisting him at the kiln, had that no valve had been put into the supply pipe.

But it is said, two ways of stopping the flow of oil having been provided, it was not negligence not to supply the third. The question as to whether it was or was not negligence was a question of fact which has been found adversely to appellant's contention. The jury were justified by the evidence in finding that the check valve in the three-fourths inch pipe, as could readily have been foreseen might be the case, was rendered immediately useless by the spread of the burning oil. There was evidence tending to show that the valve on the tank was not relied upon in an emergency, as when it became necessary to quickly stop the flow of oil. It was used when the supply pipe was to be attached or disconnected, or the car moved. It is conceded that, from its construction, it could not be turned by hand. Counsel for appellant say, in speaking of it: "It was evidently so arranged that it required some kind of wrench to turn it." No notice was given appellee, or any of his fellow workmen in the same gang or shift, of the omission of the stopcock from the supply pipe, so as to enable him or them to have appliances ready to shut off the oil from the tank, if it became necessary. When Wagner and others of the fellow workmen were called to assist in moving the tank, he jumped upon it, and endeavored to turn the valve with his hand, and found it impossible. He went immediately for a wrench, but upon his return was driven away by the flames. Notice to Williams, foreman at the kiln, or to others who might be regarded as fellow servants of appellee, was not notice to appellee. If, by reason of the omission to supply the usual and ordinary means to prevent accident, the hazard to its servants was increased, and the change in appliances was not known to the servants, or so open and visible that they, by the exercise of ordinary care, would see and know of it, the legal duty rested upon the master to notify them of the increased danger to which they were thereby exposed; and, it being a duty owed by the master to the servant, it could not delegate it to another, even though a fellow servant of appellee, and absolve itself from liability for the injury resulting in consequence of the failure to communicate knowledge to appellee of the increased hazard. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 113 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787; Indiana Car Co. v. Parker, 100 Ind. 181; Thomp. Neg. 972; Whart. Neg. § 211; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 59, note 3.

It is also insisted that a change in the appliances, by means of which it is alleged the injury was caused, although not known to appellee, having been made by his fellow servants, the negligence, if any, was that of his fellow servants, and he cannot therefore recover. This question, like the preceding, was one of fact. Whether the persons who put in the appliances to which the Cannon burners were attached were fellow servants of appellee in performing that work, under the rules defining who are fellow servants, was a question of fact. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Morgenstern, 106 Ill. 216; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Morando, 98 Ill. 802. There is ample evidence from which the jury might have found that they were put in by Mr. Cannon and men in his employ (none of whom were in the employ of the appellant), under a license from appellant, for the sole purpose of testing the relative merits of the two burners in the consumption of oil in producing the requisite heat to burn a kiln of brick. If so, they were not fellow servants of a common master with appellee, or engaged in the same line of employment, or so associated with him as to fall within the definition of "fellow servants," as held by this court in the foregoing and numerous other cases. Where the negligent act is a direct result of the exercise of power conferred by the master, in the performance of a duty devolving by law upon him, the master is liable. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. May, 108 Ill. 288; North Chicago Roll. Mill Co. v. Johnson, 114 Ill. 57.

If, therefore, it be said that they were fellow servants of appellee, or that fellow servants of appellee in the work of burning brick, and operating the appliances furnished by the master at the kiln, assisted in putting in such appliances, they would not be fellow servants of appellee in respect of the particular work done by them. That the master, although not held to guarantee the absolute perfection and suitability of the machinery and appliances furnished the servants, is, nevertheless, bound to provide that which is safe and suitable for carrying on the business in which the servant is engaged, and is held to the employment of every precaution which a reasonably prudent man would exercise under like circumstances, is well established. Arising by implication from the contract of employment, as well as from reasons of public policy and natural justice, the duty rests upon the master—whether a corporation or a natural person—not to expose the servant, in the discharge of his duty, to perils and dangers against which the master may guard by the exercise of reasonable care. Fairbank v. Haentzsch, 78 Ill. 286; Pennsylvania Co. v. Lynch, 90 Ill. 333; Missouri Furnaces Co. v. Abend, 107 Ill. 44, 47 Am. Rep. 425. Hence the rule is that the master must, either personally or by his agent if an individual, and by its agents if a corporation, exercise reasonable and proper care, taking into consideration the nature of the business, and the instrumentalities employed, to provide, and keep in suitable repair and condition, safe and suitable machinery and appliances, adequately sufficient for use by the servant in and about the business in which it is to be used by him. And if a servant is injured in consequence of a neglect of such duty, or a negligent discharge of it, he being in the exercise of ordinary care, for his own safety, the master is liable. Cases supra; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Platt, 89 Ill. 141; Columbus, C. & I. R. Co. v.

Troesch, 68 Ill. 545, 18 Am. Rep. 578; Calumet Iron & Steel Co. v. Martin, 115 Ill. 858; Wood, Mast. & S. § 826 et seq.; Beach, Contrib. Neg. 123; Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 218, 25 L. ed. 612. It necessarily follows that, in the discharge of the duty resting upon and owing by the master to the servant, the acts of the person authorized by the master to perform the duty are the acts of the master. The liability of the master does not depend upon who performs the duty, but upon the existence of the duty itself, which the master must perform, and he cannot, by delegating it to another, absolve himself from liability for its nonperformance. As a general rule, the servant assumes the natural and ordinary risks of the business in which he engages, and is held to impliedly contract that the master shall not be liable for injuries consequent upon the negligence of a fellow servant in the employment of whom the master has exercised proper care; but he does not assume or contract to waive liability of the master for his own negligence, whether committed in person or by an agent authorized by the master to perform a duty resting upon him. In such case, the master being under contract duty to perform, the servant may, without sufficient appearing or being shown to put him upon notice to the contrary, rely upon the due and reasonable performance of the duty. The law will not permit the master to evade the duty which it has cast upon him, by shifting it upon another. In this case the master licensed Cannon, who was in no wise connected with the work which appellee was employed to do, to put in his burners. This required a new supply pipe connecting another tank of oil with one half of the feed pipe. It was put in for the convenience of the master or his licensee, and the master was bound to see to it that it was suitable and safe, or give notice to appellee so that he might quit the employment, if unwilling to assume the increased risk occasioned by the insufficient manner of its construction. The persons thus discharging the duty of the master were vice-principals, and their negligence was the negligence of the master.

But it is said, also, that upon the facts shown, appellee was guilty of such contributory negligence as to bar recovery. It is urged—First, that it was gross negligence for him to go under the tank, and uncouple the supply pipe, whereby the oil poured over him; and, second, that, having been in a place of safety when he went to turn on the fire alarm, it was negligence for him to return to the place of known danger.

In respect to the first, it will only be necessary to say that whether the doctrine of comparative negligence, as defined in Galena & C. U. R. Co. v. Jacobs, 20 Ill. 478, and subsequent cases, has still a place in the jurisprudence of this state, and whether the later case of Calumet Iron & Steel Co. v. Martin, 115 Ill. 858, and other cases since decided, have not placed that doctrine upon a basis where it has become simply another form of stating the common-law rule of contributory negligence, need not be here discussed, for the reason that it can have no application to cases like this, where the plaintiff is found to be in the exercise of ordinary care. The question was fairly submitted whether the plaintiff was, in uncoupling the supply pipe, in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety; the jury have found that he was, upon ample evidence to sustain the finding. This is conclusive of the question of the right of recovery, if his injury was the result of the defendant's negligence. Calumet Iron & Steel Co. v. Martin, supra; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. O'Connor, 119 Ill. 586; Abend v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 111 Ill. 203, 53 Am. Rep. 616; Whart. Neg. § 884 et seq.; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 25, 36, 37.

In respect of the second point, we are referred to numerous cases holding that, because of the sacredness with which human life is regarded by the law, negligence will not be attributable to him who impulsively rushes into known danger to save it; but that rule does not apply to one who goes voluntarily into such danger to save property, whether his own or another's. The authorities are not uniform upon the last proposition, but its determination here is wholly unimportant. When appellee returned from sending the fire alarm, there was nothing, save the possible explosion of the oil tank, that menaced him with personal danger. He undertook to move the tank out of the way of the fire, and undoubtedly would have succeeded, without injury to himself, had the valve upon the tank been closed when he uncoupled the supply pipe from it. It was his duty to make all exertion possible, consistent with his personal safety, to rescue the master's property, and prevent the further spread of the conflagration. He was required to judge of the danger from the condition of affairs as they then existed, and act with promptness, and as prudence dictated; and if, at the time he returned and endeavored to perform his duty, reasonable and prudent men, under all existing circumstances, would have apprehended no personal danger, he is not to be held guilty of negligence in returning, because some unforeseen cause intervened, which concurring with the master's negligence, produced the injury, which reasonable and prudent foresight could not have anticipated. Whether there was in fact danger from explosion from the tank is unimportant. It did not explode, and the injury did not result from that, nor from any danger to appellee's person, real or apparent, that the utmost prudence could have reasonably apprehended, when he returned to the place of injury.

But it is urged that the injury resulting as a consequence of the negligence of a fellow servant, in not closing the valve upon the tank, no recovery against appellant can be justified. It is said—First, that the negligence of the fellow servant intervening as an efficient cause of the injury, the negligence of the master, if any is attributable, became the remote, and not the proximate, cause; and, second, that the master not being liable for injury inflicted in consequence of the negligence of a fellow servant, if the injury would not have resulted but for such intervening and negligence of the servant, the master is not liable. The fallacy of the first position lies in its assumption of the fact that the negligence of the fellow servant was, in and of itself, a new and efficient cause of the injury. Whether the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury was a question of fact, also, to be determined by the jury, under proper instructions from the court. We held in Fent v. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. 59 Ill. 849, 14 Am. Rep. 13, approving Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Pindar, 53 Ill. 451, 5 Am. Rep. 57, that whether the alleged negligence was the proximate cause of the injury was, in each case, a question of fact, and expressly repudiated the contrary rule as laid down in Ryan v. New York Cent. R. Co. 85 N. Y. 210, as in the teeth of almost numberless decisions, and as unsupported by reason. In the subsequent case of Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Muthersbaugh, 71 Ill. 572, the same was again held. We said in the Fent Case that, so far as the case turned upon the issue of remote or proximate cause, the jury should be instructed that, "if the loss is a natural consequence of its alleged carelessness, which might have been foreseen by any reasonable person," the defendant is responsible, but is not to be held responsible for injuries which could not have been foreseen or expected, as the result of the negligence. This is not to be understood as requiring that the particular result might have been foreseen; for, if the consequences follow in unbroken sequence, from the wrong to the injury, without any intervening efficient cause, it is sufficient if, at the time of the negligence, the wrongdoer might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have foreseen that some injury might result from his negligence. Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Kemp, 61 Md. 74, 619, 48 Am. Rep. 134; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Buck, 96 Ind. 346, 49 Am. Rep. 163, and cases collected; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 42; Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Keifer, 134 Ill. 481, 10 L. R. A. 696; Louisiana Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tweed, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 44, 19 L. ed. 65; Miller v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Mo. 889; Kellogg v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Wis. 223; Smith v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 6 C. P. 21; Bevan, Neg. 80, 81. Thus, in the Keifer Case, supra, it could not be foreseen that the particular injury might follow the placing of the tank upon an insufficient support. It might have fallen and injured no one, or a person other than appellee's intestate. It was held sufficient that the support was so insufficient that injury might result, from the falling of the tank in consequence, to some one.

If the wrong of appellant put in motion the destructive agency, and the result is directly attributable thereto, and there was no intervention of a new force or power of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of the mischief, the negligence of appellant must be considered the proximate cause of the injury, if it could have been foreseen, by the exercise of ordinary care, that injury might or would result from the negligence. "An intervening efficient cause is a new and independent force, which breaks the causal connection between the original wrong and the injury, and itself becomes the direct and immediate—that is, the proximate—cause of an injury." Bishop, Noncont. Law, §§ 42, 885, 886. And the test is, "Was it a new and independent force, acting in and of itself in causing the injury and superseding the original wrong complained of, so as to make it remote in the chain of causation?" It must be manifest, from this definition, that the negligence of the fellow servants, whether it be treated as creating a condition merely, or as a cause, was not such an intervening efficient cause as to break causal connection between the negligence of appellant and the injury. The destructive agency set in motion by the negligence of appellant increased in extent by the flow of burning oil, igniting whatever was in its way that was combustible. This followed as a natural and inevitable sequence, and, coming in contact with the oil upon appellant's clothing, ignition followed as a natural result. It therefore required the combined negligence of appellant and the fellow servant to produce the consequences resulting in appellee's injury. It is well settled that where the injury is the result of the negligence of the defendant and that of a third person, or of the defendant, and an inevitable accident or an inanimate thing has contributed with the negligence of the defendant to cause the injury, the plaintiff may recover, if the negligence of the defendant was an efficient cause of the injury. 3 Thomp. Neg. p. 1085, § 8; Bishop, Noncont. Law, §§ 89, 450, 452; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 31 et seq.; Cartersville v. Cook, 129 Ill. 152; Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Keifer, supra, and cases cited. In such case, the negligence of two independent persons resulting in injury to the third, where neither is sufficient within itself, both are to be treated, in combination, as the proximate cause of the injury. It is clear that the negligence of the fellow servant, in and of itself, could not have produced the injurious results suffered by appellee. The negligence of appellant and the fellow servant were therefore concurrent causes, and, combined, were the proximate cause of the injury. An efficient cause is simply the "working cause," or that cause which produces effects or results. Webster, Dict. And a proximate cause is that which stands next in causation to the effect, not necessarily in time or space, but in causal relation.

The modification of instructions complained of were in harmony with the view here expressed, and were not erroneous. The court modified the twenty-first and other instructions asked by the defendant, and thereby said to the jury, in effect, that, if they believed from the evidence that the injury resulted wholly from the negligence of the fellow servant as the immediate cause of the injury, the defendant was not liable. This modification raises the second proposition, and, in effect, presents the question of whether, where the negligence of the servant necessarily entered into or intervened to produce the injurious result, the master is liable. It would seem to follow, as a result of the doctrine, that, although the servant impliedly agrees that the master shall not be liable for the negligence of fellow servants, he does not agree to take any risk or waive liability of the master for his own negligence; that the servant may recover, although the injury is the combined effect of the negligence of the master and fellow servant. It is a familiar principle that where the negligence of two are, in combination, the proximate cause of an injury, either or both may be held responsible for the consequences resulting from their combined negligence. Cartersville v.

Cook, supra; Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Keifer, supra; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Shacklet, 105 Ill. 884, 44 Am. Rep. 791; Union R. & T. Co. v. Shacklet, 119 Ill. 232; 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 1085, § 8, and cases cited; Cooley, Torts, 1st ed. 684; Nil. Rem. 178; Whart. Neg. § 778; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 122.

Mr. Bishop after stating that the rule of law is "that a person contributing to a tort, whether his fellow contributors are men, natural or other forces, or things, is responsible for the whole, the same as though he had done all without help," subject to the limitation that the person injured shall receive his damages but once (Noncont. Law, §§ 518, 519), proceeds (§ 684), that, within the doctrine thus explained, "a master whose negligence contributed to the injury of a servant is, if the servant's negligence did not contribute also, liable for the entire injury, though some other force, for which the former is not responsible, —for example, the negligence of a fellow servant,—likewise contributed;" and cites in support Crutchfield v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 76 N. C. 820; Boyce v. Fitzpatrick, 80 Ind. 526; Paulmier v. Erie R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 151; Stringham v. Stewart, 100 N. Y. 516; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKensie, 81 Va. 71. See also Thomp. Neg. p. 981, § 10; Booth v. Bos- ton & A. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 88, 29 Am. Rep. 37; Cayzer v. Taylor, 10 Gray, 274, 69 Am. Dec. 817.

These authorities fully sustain the position that, where the negligence of the master is combined with the negligence of a fellow servant in producing the injurious result, and neither is the efficient cause alone, the master as well as the fellow servant is liable. No case to which we have been referred, or of which we are aware, has gone so far as to hold that, where the negligence of the master contributes to the injury, the servant may not recover. The doctrine of contributory negligence is confined to the negligence of the party injured, and it is such negligence only, concurring with the negligence complained of, that will defeat the right of action. The modification of defendant's instructions had the effect of making them conform to the rules and principles herein held, and was not, therefore, in our judgment, erroneous, nor was it error for the court to refuse the instruction in effect taking the case from the jury.

While the case is extremely close upon its facts, the jury were correctly instructed, and we find no error for which the judgment should be reversed. It is accordingly affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

J. B. COWDEN, Appt.,

v.

1. The admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States courts extends to controversies arising out of contracts for the shipment of merchandise upon the high seas between ports of the same state.
2. Mere discrimination in freight rates by a common carrier against a shipper was not a wrong for which the common law gave a remedy so as to come within the clause in the United States Statute, (Rev. Stat. § 711,) conferring jurisdiction over maritime cases upon United States courts to the exclusion of state courts, which saves to suitors in all cases "the right of a common-law remedy, where the common-law is competent to give it."

(May 6, 1892.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Diego County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused to plaintiff by reason of discriminations in freight charges against him upon shipments of merchandise upon defendant's steamships. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—On the question of the right of a carrier at common law to discriminate between its patrons, as to which there is some conflict of authority, see Louisville & St. L. Consol. R. Co. v. Wilson (Ind.) ante, 105.

Mr. L. L. Boone, for appellant:

A carrier by vessel upon the high seas between ports within the United States is subject to the same duties and liabilities which attach to the capacity of common carrier as a carrier by land, except so far as the common law has been modified by statute.

King v. Shepherd, 3 Story, 849; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants Bank, 47 U. S. 6 How. 428, 12 L. ed. 344; Pearson v. Duane, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 615, 18 L. ed. 450; Elliot v. Russell, 10 Johns. 1, 6 Am. Dec. 306; Menacho v. Ward, 27 Fed. Rep. 529; Bennett v. Peninsular & O. S. B. Co. 6 C. B. 448.

Under the common law a carrier's rates must not only be reasonable, but equal when the conditions are substantially the same.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages of defendant for a discrimination in freight rates. A demurrer to the complaint was interposed upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and that no cause of action was stated. The demurrer was sustained, and the ruling of the court in this regard is the only matter before us for review.

The complaint substantially alleges that the defendant is a common carrier of freight, by vessel, between San Francisco and San Diego, via the Pacific ocean; that between certain dates plaintiff, as a merchant of San Diego, paid to defendant, according to its regular schedule of rates, large sums of money as charges for freight; that defendant charged a second merchant 12½ per cent less for freight of the same character and quantity than it did plaintiff; that said charges were a discrimination against plaintiff, and, though often requested so to do, defendant refused to allow plaintiff such reduced rates, whereby he has been damaged in the sum of $1,674.14. The amount sought to be recovered as damages is the difference between the freight charges made to plaintiff and those made to the more favored merchant. It would seem to be entirely immaterial, to the extent, at least, of the consideration of the merits of this appeal, whether the present action is one of contract or of tort. From either standpoint it arises from a maritime contract solely, and courts of admiralty alone have jurisdiction, unless the cause comes within the reservation found in section 711 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: "The jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States, in the cases and proceedings hereafter mentioned, shall be exclusive of the courts of these several states; . . . (3) Of all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it." There can be no question but that the voyage of a carrier made upon the high seas, even though the ports of departure and destination are in the same state, is under the exclusive control and regulation of Congress. It is only the internal commerce and navigation of a state that is under the control and regulation of the state. As was said in Carpenter v. The Emma Johnson, 1 Cliff. 638: "Great mischief would inevitably result from any rule denying admiralty jurisdiction in all cases where the place of the departure of the vessel and the place of her destination are both within the same state, when any part of the voyage is upon the high seas, for every navigator knows that in many such cases nearly the whole voyage is out of the limits of the state." See

Lord v. Goodall, N. & P. S. S. Co. 102 U. S. 544, 26 L. ed. 226; Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. 18 Fed. Rep. 10.

It follows from the foregoing authorities that plaintiff has no standing in the courts of this state, unless his rights are reserved to him under the reservation of the Revised Statutes previously quoted. In other words, has he a cause of action at common law against the defendant, under the facts of his complaint? The gist of the complaint is that for the same quantity and character of freight plaintiff was charged a sum 12½ per cent greater for transportation from the same point than the other merchant. Respondent insists that at common law the right of action was based upon the rate charged being unreasonable and excessive in itself, and that a mere discrimination, as disclosed in this case, gave no cause of action; that no wrong was committed if the charge was reasonable for the service, and, there being no wrong, no remedy was demanded. Appellant insists that at common law it is the duty of the carrier to "receive and carry goods for all persons alike, and that the rates must not only be reasonable, but equal, when the conditions are substantially the same." It will thus be seen that the merits of this appeal will be concluded by a determination as to what is the common law upon this question; and that is a matter of some difficulty of solution, owing to the divergent views expressed upon the subject by the various courts of this country. This divergence of opinion among the courts has undoubtedly been caused to some extent by the fact that for more than fifty years the courts of England have had no occasion to expound the common law upon this subject; common carriers, especially railway companies, having been placed entirely under the control of the statute law. In this country, to some extent, there is a lack of direct authority upon the question, owing to the fact that constitutional and legislative provisions are common in nearly all the states of this Union, prohibiting common carriers from practicing discrimination in their rates of toll. And, while these statutory and constitutional provisions have been regarded and incidentally declared to be reiterations of the common law by many courts of this country, sound authority upon which to base such declarations is wanting in the books. The fundamental and statute law of the various states upon this subject appears to have been founded upon the principles embodied in the early acts of parliament pertaining to the conduct and control of railways as common carriers, rather than upon the common law of England. Indeed, we have been able to obtain but few direct adjudications from English courts upon this question, owing to the fact that it would seem the business of inland common carriers in that country was not a matter of great concern until railroads were operated; and, immediately subsequent to that great epoch in the world's progress, statutory enactments followed, entirely taking away from the courts the necessity of any further application of the common-law rights and remedies. If the common law were as appellant here contends it to be, there would have been no necessity for parliament to have enacted these stringent "equality clauses," as they were termed. It appears that this principle of equality of charges arose from the necessity of the times, a necessity created by the operation of railroads, which swallowed up and destroyed all other common carrier systems of England, and thereby created a monopoly of the business, and a power for wrong that at once demanded the restrictions of legislative enactments. This conclusion is fully borne out by the language of Mr. Justice Blackburn in Great Western R. Co. v. Sutton, L. R. 4 H. L. 288, wherein he said: "I think it appears from the preamble of the 90th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) that the Legislature was of opinion that the changed state of things arising from the general use of railways made it expedient to impose an obligation on railway companies acting as carriers beyond what is imposed on a carrier at common law. And, if this be borne in mind, I think the construction of the proviso for equality is clear, and is that the defendants may, subject to the limitations in their special acts, charge what they think fit, but not more to one person than they, during the same time, charge to others under the same circumstances. And I think it follows from this that if the defendants do charge more to one person than they, during the same time, charge to others, the charge is, by virtue of the statute, extortionate. And I think the rights and remedies of a person made to pay a charge beyond the limit of equality imposed by the statute on railway companies, acting as carriers, on their line, must be precisely the same as those of a person made to pay a charge beyond the limit imposed by the common law on ordinary carriers as being more than was reasonable. The mode of establishing that the demand is extortionate differs in the two cases. Where it is sought to prove that the charge is unreasonable, and therefore extortionate, the fact that another was charged less is only material as evidence for the jury tending to prove that the reasonable charge was the smaller one. When it is sought to show that the charge is extortionate, as being contrary to the statutable obligation to charge equally, it is immaterial whether the charge is reasonable or not; it is enough to show that the company carried for some other person or class of persons at a lower charge during the period throughout which the party complaining was charged more under the like circumstances."

It is not the purpose of the court to review the authorities of this country upon the question under discussion. For the reasons previously suggested, the matter was only indirectly involved in the great majority of them, and, as authority upon the subject, they are weakened to that extent. The case of Scotfield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 43 Ohio St. 571, 54 Am. Rep. 848, is the leading case in the United States supporting appellant's contention, and it is upon this case that appellant says "he has pinned his faith and hung his hope." The case of Johnson v. Pensacola & P. R. Co., 16 Fla. 623, 26 Am. Rep. 731, is the leading case in this country holding to the contrary view, and the opinion of the learned judge in the Scotfield Case does not appear to overrule the doctrine there declared, but would seem to look to the statute law of Ohio for support, rather than to the common law. It says, in speaking of the Florida case: "Reliance is placed on the doctrine that discrimination is not necessarily unlawful, and that all the freighter is entitled to is a reasonable rate, not necessarily equal to all, and, in the absence of any statute to the contrary, we are not inclined to question the correctness of these decisions." The facts in the Florida case appear to be practically identical with the facts of this case. Florida had no statutory law upon the subject of the regulation of common carriers, and hence, as here, the merits of the case rested upon the determination as to what was the common law upon the subject. In this case the ancient, as well as the modern authorities are ably reviewed, and the court says: "Our conclusions are that, as against a common or public carrier, every person has the same right; that in all cases, where his common duty controls, he cannot refuse A. and accommodate B.; that all, the entire public, have the right to the same carriage for a reasonable price, and at a reasonable charge for the service performed; that the commonness of the duty to carry for all does not involve a commonness or equality of compensation or charge; that all a shipper can ask of a common carrier is that for the service performed he shall charge no more than a reasonable sum to him; that whether the carrier charges another more or less than the price charged a particular individual may be a matter of evidence in determining whether a charge is too much or too little for the service performed; and that the difference between the charges cannot be the measure of damages in any case, unless it is established by proof that the smaller charge is the true, reasonable charge, in view of the transportation furnished, and that the higher charge is excessive to that degree." The court also says: "In the last edition of Story on Bailments we find the rule of the common law thus stated: 'At common law a common carrier of goods is not under any obligation to treat all customers equally. He is bound to accept and carry for all upon being paid a reasonable compensation. But the fact that he charges less for one than for another is only evidence to show that a particular charge is unreasonable,—nothing more. There is nothing in the common law to hinder a carrier from carrying for favored individuals at any unreasonably low rate, or even gratis.'"

By reason of the variance which exists in the views of the courts of this country as to what is the common law upon this subject, it would seem that the adjudications of the common-law courts of England upon such a matter should have pre-eminent and controlling weight with the courts of the various states. In the case of Great Western R. Co. v. Sutton, to which reference has already been made, Mr. Justice Blackburn, in a very luminous opinion, addressed in part directly to this question, said: "At common law a person holding himself out as a common carrier of goods was not under any obligation to treat all customers equally. The obligation which the common law imposed upon him was to accept and carry all goods delivered to him for carriage according to his profession, (unless he had some reasonable excuse for not doing so,) on being paid a reasonable compensation for so doing; and, if the carrier refused to accept such goods, an action lay against him for so refusing; and, if the customer, in order to induce the carrier to perform the duty, paid, under protest, a larger sum than was reasonable, he might recover back the surplus beyond what the carrier was entitled to receive, in an action for money had and received, as being money extorted from him. But the fact that the carrier charged others less, though it was evidence to show that the charge was unreasonable, was no more than evidence tending that way. There was nothing in the common law to hinder a carrier from carrying for favored individuals at an unreasonably low rate, or even gratis. All that the law required was that he should not charge any more than was reasonable." The learned justice in his opinion clearly indicates that the prime object of the railway equality clauses enacted by parliament was to cover the exact case of injury by discrimination in freights, such as is claimed by plaintiff in this record. During the progress of the argument in Bazendale v. Eastern Counties R. Co., 4 C. B. N. S. 78, Justice Byles said: "I know no common-law reason why a carrier may not charge less than what is reasonable to one person, or even carry him free of all charge." For the foregoing reasons the court concludes that the complaint is deficient in not stating that the charge to plaintiff was unreasonable; and that the allegation of discrimination or inequality is not the equivalent of an allegation of an excessive charge.

Let the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Paterson, J.; Harrison, J.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE of West Virginia

v.

Allen HARRISON, Plff. in Err.

(..... W. Va.)

*1. A mere separation of a jury will not

*Headnotes by BRANXON, J.

entitle the person to a new trial; but where there has been an improper separation of the jury during the trial, if the verdict is against the prisoner, he is entitled to the benefit of the presumption that such separation has been prejudicial to him, and the burden of proof is upon the state to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the prisoner has suffered no injury by reason of NOTE.—Irresistible impulse as an excuse for crime.

Upon this question there is an irreconcilable conflict in the authorities. The theory that there can be an irresistible impulse which will excuse from responsibility for crime one who is able to distinguish right from wrong, is expressly rejected in the separation. If the prosecution fails to do this, the verdict will be set aside.

2. The same rule should be applied to all cases of misconduct or irregularity by the jury during the trial which are of such a character as to raise a presumption that the prisoner was prejudiced thereby.

3. The testimony of jurors may be received to disprove or explain any such separation, misconduct, or irregularity; but their testimony will not be received to show by what motive they were actuated, or that any admitted fact, misconduct, or irregularity had no influence or effect upon their minds in producing the verdict. In any case, where proper at all, the testimony of jurors should be received with great caution.

4. Mere business conversation by a juror with another person, entirely foreign to the case on trial, in the presence and hearing of the sheriff and the other jurors, will not avoid the verdict.

5. A new trial will not be granted in a criminal case for matter that is a principal cause of challenge to a juror, which existed before he was elected and sworn as a juror, but which was unknown to the prisoner until after the verdict, and which could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence, unless it appear from the whole case that the prisoner suffered injustice from the fact that such juror served in the case. In determining this court should look only to the evidence touching such cause of challenge; not to the evidence on the trial as to the prisoner's guilt.

6. To set aside a verdict because of an opinion entertained by a juror before he was sworn, it ought to appear that such opinion was not merely unsubstantial and hypothetical, but such as would have excluded him from the jury had it been known before he was sworn.

7. A motion for continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case; and, though an appellate court will supervise the action of an inferior court on such motion, it will not reverse the judgment on that ground, unless such action was plainly erroneous.

8. Where a continuance is asked to procure the evidence of a witness not resident in the state, the affidavit should state not only the bona fide belief that such evidence can be procured, but the grounds of such belief, in order that the court may see that the belief is not merely a hope, but a well-founded, reasonable expectation, that it will be procured.

9. A court must see reasonable ground to doubt the sanity of a person about to be tried for felony before impaneling a jury to inquire as to his sanity. The court may inspect and examine the prisoner, consider his action and demeanor, read affidavits, inquire of physicians and others touching his mental condition. The decision of the trial court will have a very weighty, if not conclusive, influence in the appellate court, and will not be reversed, if at all, unless it very manifestly appears that the decision was wrong, or that the court abused the discretion lodged with it by the statute.

10. A person partially insane is yet responsible for a criminal act if at the time of the act he knows right from wrong, and knows the nature and character of the particular act and its consequences, and knows that it is wrong,

Reg. v. Haynes, 1 Post. & F. 606; Reg. v. Burton, 3 Post. & F. 772; Reg. v. Barton, 3 Cox. C. C. 275; Reg. v. Stokes, 3 Car. & K. 185; Reg. v. Pate, cited in 1 Bennett & H. Lead. Cas. 96; United States v. Holmes, 1 Chff. 98; People v. Hoin, 62 Cal. 120, 45 Am. Rep. 641; Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 460; State v. Nixon, 32 Kan. 235; State v. Mowry, 87 Kan. 389; State v. Yarbrough, 39 Kan. 581; Spencer v. State, 69 Md. 23; Graves v. State, 45 N. J. L. 847; State v. Brandon, 53 N. C. 463; State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 437; People v. Coleman, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 1; People v. Walz, 60 How. Pr. 204; Flanagan v. People, 52 N. Y. 467, 11 Am. Rep. 731; Walker v. People, 88 N. Y. 81; People v. Carpenter, 102 N. Y. 238; People v. Montgomery, 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. 207; State v. Alexander, 30 S. C. 74; State v. Leveille, 84 S. C. 120.

A request to charge that "if some controlling disease was in truth the acting power within the prisoner which he could not resist, or if he had not sufficient use of his reason to control the passions which prompted the act complained of he was not responsible," was held to have been properly refused in Anderson v. State, 42 Ga. 9; State v. Coleman, 27 La. Ann. 691; Flanagan v. People, and People v. Carpenter, supra.

In Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 424, it was held that reasonability depends upon the possession of will,—not the power over it; and an instruction based on ability to distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular act committed, was held to properly express the law.

In United States v. Young, 25 Fed. Rep. 710, the court said that a man may be driven to a desperate and homicidal act by morbid impulse, but that the cases in which the defendant is wholly irresponsible are rare, the difficulty in the way of applying the test very great, and that the court was compelled to adhere to the "right and wrong" test until something better was devised. A similar opinion was expressed in State v. Bundy, 24 S. C. 439, 58 Am. Rep. 203.

In his charge to the jury in Huntington's Case, who was tried for forgery in New York, in 1858, Capron, J., said that the theory might be preferable that insanity might exist and the subject be totally incapable of controlling his actions, while his knowing and reasoning powers suffered no noticable lesion, but that until the proper authorities sanctioned it, he could not regard it. Huntington's Trial, p. 447.

In United States v. Faulkner, 35 Fed. Rep. 720, the jury were instructed that they were to decide whether the accused had mind enough to know that it was wrong, and will enough to withhold from putting obscene matter in the mails, but instructed them that he was responsible if he knew what he was doing and that it was wrong.

In State v. Scott, 41 Minn. 865, it was held that an irresistible impulse to commit a crime in the mind of one conscious of its nature and quality, or that it was wrong, could not be allowed as a defense, under Minn. Pen. Code, § 21; "a morbid propensity to commit prohibited acts existing in the mind of a person who is not shown to have been incapable of knowing the wrongfulness of such acts forms no defense to a prosecution therefor."

In Com. v. Rogers, 7 Met. 500, 41 Am. Dec. 458, 1 Bennett & H. Lead. Cas. 87, Shaw, Ch. J., said that one who in committing a homicide acted from an irresistible and uncontrollable impulse, and with a mind diseased to such a degree that for the time it overwhelmed the reason, conscience, and judgment is not responsible. This is a leading case on the subject, but it is very doubtful how far the chief justice intended to go in the matter."

It has been cited both for and against the theory that irresistible impulse excuses. In Cunningham v. State, 56 Miss. 206, 21 Am. Rep. 360, it was held to and is hurtful to another, and deserves punishment. In such case no mere irresistible impulse to do the act will exempt him from criminal responsibility for such act.

(October 1, 1892.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cabell County to review a judgment convicting defendant of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Marcum, Peyton & Marcum, for plaintiff in error:

The affidavit of W. H. Harrison showed that at the time the case was called for trial the mind of the prisoner, Allen Harrison, was in such a condition as to render him incapable of consulting with his attorneys or any one else, touching his case; that he was not in condition of mind to communicate with his counsel or to render them any assistance whatever in preparing for or conducting his defense; that his mind had been in that condition for some time prior to that day and ever since the commission of alleged offense; that he regarded the said Allen Harrison as wholly incapable of imparting such information to his counsel, relative to his case, as would enable them intelligently to prepare for his defense.

This being a fact it was plainly the duty of the court to suspend the trial until a jury was impaneled to inquire into the sanity of the prisoner.

W. Va. Code, chap. 159, § 10; also, Gruber v. State, 3 W. Va. 699.

The affidavit of W. H. Harrison, filed in support of the prisoner's motion for continuance, states that one Dr. J. E. Erwin was a material and necessary witness for the prisoner in his defense; that the prisoner could prove facts by the said Erwin that could not be proved by any other witness known to him; that the said Erwin had been, for a long time, the attending physician of the prisoner; that said Erwin had told the affiant that the mind of the prisoner was diseased and unsound; had told him the name of the disease and the cause thereof; that said Erwin was not a resident of this state and could not be served with subpoena or other process; that when affiant last heard of him, he was living in Tennessee; that the prisoner could not safely go into the trial of his case in the absence of the said Erwin; that by the next term of the court he could have the said Erwin present, or procure his deposition in the case.

Upon the face of the affidavit the prisoner showed himself entitled to a continuance.

We are more impressed with the soundness of these views on account of the fact that but six days elapsed from the time of the commission of the alleged offense, until the prisoner was forced into a trial of the case.

See W. Va. Code, chap. 159, § 1; also, State v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 726.

The right and wrong test is not the only test of criminal responsibility.

The later decisions and authorities couple with the right and wrong test the power of choosing between the two, and the power of the will over the actions.

Parsons v. State, 81 Ala. 577, 60 Am. Rep.

be equivalent to the "right and wrong" test, and that a person is responsible for an act committed under a mental condition which perfectly perceives the true relations of the party, and recognizes all the obligations thereby imposed, but which is unable to control the will.

A person laboring under partial insanity, who still understands the nature and character of his acts and its consequences, has a knowledge that it is wrong and criminal, and a mental power sufficient to apply that knowledge to his own case, and to know that if he does it he will do wrong and receive punishment, and possesses withal a will sufficient to restrain the impulse that may arise from a diseased mind, is responsible for such act. Dejarnette v. Com. 75 Va. 367.

In Missouri there has not been absolute uniformity in regard to this subject. In Baldwin v. State, 12 Mo. 223, it was held that a person who, at the time of committing an alleged criminal act, had not possession of reason sufficient to know that it was wrong, or impelled by an insane impulse, had not the power to refrain from the commission of it, is not responsible.

In State v. Handley, 46 Mo. 414, it was said that if a person was so insane as not to know right from wrong, and that the act he was committing was wrong, and was so far deprived of his will as not to possess the power of choosing between right and wrong in regard to the act, he was not responsible, unless the insanity was the immediate result of intoxicating liquors or narcotics.

An instruction that if the defendant was at the time of committing a homicide incapable of distinguishing right from wrong, or of exercising control or will power over his actions, or was unconscious at times of the nature of the crime he was about to commit, he was not responsible, was held in State v. Erb, 74 Mo. 199, to have been properly 18 L. R. A.

refused; while an instruction that to be irresponsible, his mental faculties must have been so deranged as to render him incapable of knowing the right from the wrong of the act properly expressed the law. This was followed in State v. Kotovsky, 74 Mo. 247, two of the five judges holding that one knowing the right from the wrong might in consequence of mental derangement be incapable of exercising the will, and therefore not responsible.

And in State v. Pagels, 92 Mo. 300, it was said that an uncontrollable impulse to commit a crime, springing from an insane delusion, is not an excuse for crime.

The contrary doctrine.

In some jurisdictions the test of responsibility for a criminal act is the power to distinguish right from wrong in regard to that act and the power to choose whether to do it or not. State v. Windsor, 5 Harr. (Del.) 512; State v. Brown, 1 Houst. Cr. Rep. 539; Walker v. State, 103 Ind. 502; Com. v. Haskell, 2 Brewster, 491. The last is not a criminal case.

Insanity whether general or partial, to excuse from crime, must exist to such a degree as to have controlled the will of its subject, and have taken from him the freedom of moral action. Com. v. Mosler, 4 Pa. 264; Ortwein v. Com. 76 Pa. 414, 18 Am. Rep. 420.

Moral insanity is not a defense unless it exists to such an extent as to subjugate the intellect, control the will, and render it impossible for the person to do otherwise than yield thereto. Taylor v. Com. 109 Pa. 282.

In Com. v. Mosler, supra, it is said: There is a moral or homicidal insanity consisting of an irresistible inclination to kill or commit some other particular offense. The doctrine which acknowledges this mania is dangerous and can be recognized only in the clearest cases. It should be 193; 1 Whart. Crim. Law, 9th ed. §§ 83, 43, 45; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, 7th ed. § 886 et seq.; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 872; 1 Stevens, Crim. Law, § 168.

An act to be criminal must be willful. If therefore the prisoner Harrison had no will power; if his mind was so diseased as to render his will power incapable of either directing or controlling his actions, then the killing of Bettie Adams by him was not willful and therefore not criminal.

The juror who was permitted to separate himself from the others stated that he saw no one while absent from the jury and had no conversation about the trial.

These statements made by a juror upon this subject were improper and can have no weight in determining defendant's right to a new trial.

State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 718, 43 Am. Rep. 799.

The evidence shows that R. A. Goodwin, a member of the jury, while on the jury trying the case had a conversation with Doolittle and Biggs in the office of the St. Nicholas Hotel; that a deed was examined and acknowledged by said Goodwin; that this conversation took place anywhere from eight to ten feet from the sheriff having jury in charge, and that it lasted some time, although the sheriff was in the room with them, but did not hear conversation nor examine deed. Each of these witnesses said that nothing was mentioned about the case of Harrison.

This explanation is not sufficient to rebut presumption of prejudice and destroy prisoner's right to a new trial on this account.

shown to have been habitual or to have shown itself in more than one instance. To establish it as a justification, its contemporaneous existence, or the existence of an habitual tendency, amounting to second nature, must be shown. See also Coyle v. Com. 100 Pa. 573, 45 Am. Rep. 397.

If the prisoner was actuated by an irresistible impulse to kill, and was utterly unable to control his will or subjugate his intellect, and was not actuated by anger, jealousy, revenge, and kindred evil passions, he is entitled to an acquittal. Com. v. Freth, 3 Phila. 106; Brown v. Com. 78 Pa. 125; Sayres v. Com. 88 Pa. 261.

The true test of responsibility is whether the accused had sufficient reason to know right from wrong, and whether or not he had sufficient power of control to govern his actions. Graham v. Com. 18 B. Mon. 587; Smith v. Com. 1 Duv. 234. In the latter case Robertson, J., said that moral insanity was as well known as intellectual, and constituted an excuse for crime.

In Kriel v. Com., 5 Bush, 362, it is held that one who commits an otherwise criminal act is responsible unless laboring under such a state of mental aberration and disease as to deprive him of a knowledge of right and wrong, or if he has this knowledge, to take from him the moral power to resist his morbid inclination to its perpetration.

Moral insanity arising from the subjugation of the intellect by a morbid impulse or propensity, or from an overwhelming and destruction of the faculties of the mind to the extent of rendering the party incapable of governing his actions, is an excuse for crime; but it must exist in such violence as to render it impossible for him to do otherwise than yield to its promptings. Scott v. Com. 4 Met. (Ky.) 227, 88 Am. Dec. 461.

In Ohio it has been held that the proper test of responsibility is, whether the accused was a free 18 L. R. A.

Com. v. Wormley, 8 Gratt. 712.

Mr. Alfred Caldwell, Atty-Gen., for the State:

Unless good cause for a continuance was offered, it was the duty of the circuit court to try the accused at the term the indictment was found.

Code, chap. 159, § 1.

The refusal of a continuance is certainly not plainly erroneous, and it must be to make it a cause of reversal.

Buster v. Holland, 27 W. Va. 511; State v. Betts, 11 W. Va. 708; Davis v. Walker, 7 W. Va. 447; Dimmay v. Wheeling & E. G. R. Co. 27 W. Va. 82; Wilson v. Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 323; Wilson v. Kochlein, 1 W. Va. 145; Tompkins v. Burgess, 2 W. Va. 187.

The instructions for the state were unobjectionable.

State v. Cain, 20 W. Va. 679; State v. Robinson, Id. 718, 43 Am. Rep. 799; State v. Douglass, 28 W. Va. 297; State v. Welch, 36 W. Va.

As to the separation of the jury, the facts in evidence probably made it necessary for the state to show that no prejudice to the accused could arise therefrom and consequently no new trial should have been granted on that account. This showing was made by the state very fully.

State v. Robinson, supra.

As to the objections made in relation to the juror, Philip Ward, the record discloses such satisfactory denials, explanations and corroborating evidence to that given by Ward that, under the authorities, it is clear that such objections are not good ground for setting aside moral agent in committing the act, whether he was at the time capable of judging whether it was right or wrong, and whether he knew it was an offense against the laws of God and man. Clark v. State, 12 Ohio, 483, 40 Am. Dec. 481; Blackburn v. State, 23 Ohio St. 146.

In Farrer v. State, 3 Ohio St. 54, Corwin, J., in a dictum said that every correct definition of sanity, either expressly or by necessary construction, must suppose freedom of will to avoid a wrong, no less than the power to distinguish between the wrong and the right.

A person moved to commit a criminal act by an insane impulse controlling his will and judgment is not responsible therefor. Stevens v. State, 31 Ind. 485.

Insanity may not only affect the understanding but control the power of volition, and an instruction which limits the question of insanity to the understanding is objectionable. Bradley v. State, 31 Ind. 402.

One urged to the commission of a criminal act by an insane impulse so strong as to overcome his will and judgment, so powerful that he was unable to resist it even though knowing it to be wrong and a violation of law, is not responsible, whether the impulse arose from mental or physical causes or both, unless voluntarily induced by himself. Sawyer v. State, 35 Ind. 80.

One who commits a criminal act, moved thereto by an insane impulse controlling his will and judgment, and too powerful for him to resist, arising from causes not voluntarily induced by himself, is not responsible. Grubb v. State, 117 Ind. 277.

In State v. Bartlett, 43 N. H. 224, 80 Am. Dec. 154, the charge to the jury, not discussed on appeal, was that if the mind of the accused was in a diseased and unsound state to so high a degree that for the time being it overwhelmed the reason, con-the verdict, coming as they do, after a protracted and expensive trial.

State v. Strauder, 11 W. Va. 745, 27 Am. Rep. 606; State v. McDonald, 9 W. Va. 456; Bank of the Ohio Valley v. Lockwood, 18 W. Va. 893, 81 Am. Rep. 768; State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 802.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 14th day of April, 1892, Allen Harrison was sentenced to death by the circuit court of Cabell county for the murder of Bettie Adams, and he comes to this court for relief from that sentence. Should the verdict be set aside because of separation of the jury? Between 12 and 1 o'clock at night a juror rose from his bed, and went to the water closet of the hotel where the jury boarded, to answer a call of nature. The deputy sheriff in charge of the jury unlocked the door of the room wherein the juror slept, and went with him into the hall leading to the closet, and saw that no one was in the hall, and saw that the door of the closet was open, and saw no one in the closet, and says no one was in it, though there was a portion of the closet—the two apartments containing the bowls—which he could not see from where he stood; and the juror walked down the hall 40 or 50 feet to the closet, the sheriff returning to bed, but listening, and the juror remained absent from four to eight minutes, and returned to the room. There were some rooms along the hall towards the closet, occupied perhaps by others, one by the high sheriff. Without regard to the statements of the juror, it does not in any manner appear that this juror mingled with, saw, talked, or had any sort of communication, with any person while absent. The facts that it was at the dead hours of the night, that the hall was clear of persons, and that the apartment to which the juror went was not like the public rooms of an hotel, but a water closet, render it highly improbable that the juror met or conversed with any one. In all the Virginia and West Virginia cases where verdicts have been set aside on account of separation of the jury, it appeared that the juror during the separation mingled and talked with other persons, or had ready opportunity to do so. I hardly think that where it safely appears that the juror has no communication, nor opportunity for it, the mere separation, if we can call it "separation" in a legal sense, would vitiate a verdict. But if we can read and credit the statement of the juror in question, then the fact that he had no intercourse, or opportunity for it, with any other person, will not depend simply on the probability arising from the facts above stated; for he states that he neither spoke to nor saw any one while so absent. That we can consider the juror's statement is shown by the syllabus and opinion in State v. Cartwright, 20 W.

science and judgment, and that in committing the act, he acted from an irresistible and uncontrollable impulse, he was not responsible.

In State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 6 Am. Rep. 533, it is said that if one accused of a criminal act knows it to be wrong, he is equally irresponsible whether his will is overcome and his hand used by the irresistible impulse of his own mental disease, or by the irresistible power of another person. If his mental, moral, and bodily strength is subjugated and pressed to an involuntary service, it is immaterial whether it is done by his disease, or by another man, or any other force set in operation without any fault on his part.

In State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 399, 9 Am. Rep. 242, it was held that it was a question for the jury whether every insane impulse was always irresistible, and whether in the particular instance the insane impulse might have been resisted.

Effect of disease to create irresistible impulse.

That an act is punishable if committed by one under an irresistible impulse, whose mental faculties are in a sound normal condition, is held in Boeswell v. State, 63 Ala. 307, 35 Am. Rep. 20.

One who with no mental disorder, commits a criminal act from overmastering anger, jealousy, or revenge, is responsible therefor. Williams v. State, 50 Ark. 511; Bolling v. State, 54 Ark. 598; Smith v. State, 55 Ark. 259; Gueltig v. State, 63 Ind. 94, 32 Am. Rep. 99; Sanders v. State, 94 Ind. 147; Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550; Plake v. State, 121 Ind. 433; People v. Finley, 38 Mich. 482; People v. Mortimer, 48 Mich. 37; People v. Durfee, 63 Mich. 437; State v. Stickley, 41 Iowa, 232.

One who commits an alleged crime, knowing it to be wrong, is responsible unless he has so far lost the power to choose that his free agency was at the time destroyed, and the crime was so connected with a disease of the mind as to be the product of it solely. Parsons v. State, 81 Ala. 577, 30 Am. Rep. 183.

To be a subject of punishment, one must have

mind and capacity to judge of the nature and consequences of the act committed, that it is wrong and criminal, and will properly expose him to punishment, and he must not be overcome by an irresistible impulse arising from disease. State v. Johnson, 40 Conn. 136.

To render one responsible for a criminal act, the one committing it must be so insane at the time as not to have sufficient soundness of mind and reason to distinguish right from wrong in regard to the act, and to understand its nature and consequences, and not have sufficient mental power to apply it to his own case, and thereby not have the ability to control himself, and to choose by an effort of the will whether he would do the act or not. State v. West, 1 Houst. Crim. Rep. 371.

In Cole's Trial, 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. 321, the jury, having been instructed that an insane impulse leaving the mind incapable of exertion, and holding the person incapable of exercising his mind freed from responsibility, but that no impulse could excuse when there was a consciousness that one is committing a crime against the laws of his country, found the prisoner sane the moment before and the moment after the criminal act, but being in doubt of his sanity at the exact moment, were directed to acquit.

In People v. Klein, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 13, Edmonds, J., charged the jury that if some controlling disease was in truth the acting power within the prisoner which he could not resist, or if he had not a sufficient use of his reason to control the passions which prompted the act complained of, he was not responsible, but that it must not be a mere impulse of passion, an idle, frantic humor, or unaccountable mode of action, but an absolute dispossession of the free and natural agency of the human mind, and that the moral as well as the intellectual faculties might be so disordered by disease as to deprive the mind of its controlling and directing power.

A similar charge was given by the same judge in People v. Divine, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 594, and by Hoff-

Va. 82, and instances in Virginia cases therein cited, (page 43,) which are binding on us, in which affidavits of jurors were received. We cannot read that portion of the affidavit wherein the juror states that he did not go to the closet for any improper purpose connected with the trial, and that his absence had no influence upon his verdict, but we can read its statement that he met with no one, saw no one, talked with no one. There is no showing in the slightest degree to the contrary; and if we give this affidavit any weight, corroborated and rendered probably true by the other circumstances spoken of, we must be satisfied that its statements are true. Would it not be a stigma and reproach upon the administration of criminal law to reverse a solemn trial for such a cause, we being confident that the prisoner suffered no harm from the occurrence? Separation merely does not necessarily annul a verdict; it does so only prima facie.

Two Virginia cases are spoken of as holding that separation per se annuls the verdict,—McCaull's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 371; Overbe's Case, 1 Rob. (Va.) 356. Perhaps I may add Wormley's Case, 8 Gratt. 712, though Judge Rives, in Philips' Case, 19 Gratt. 541, says, perhaps correctly, that it is not to be interpreted as so holding. In none of these cases is there any reasoning by the court, except in McCaull's Case, and in it Judge Nelson, after saying that the one view of the subject was that the law required the jury to be kept entirely inaccessible, so that communication with them would be impossible, and the other view was that mere separation, unless it be proved that there has been some conversation or tampering with a member of the jury, shall not vitiate a verdict, and there must be proof to work this effect, disclaims a decision of the general principle, saying the court was not called on to decide between the two views, and would decide only whether the separation in that particular case should overthrow the verdict. But later and well-considered cases hold that mere separation will not per se impair a verdict. State v. Cartright, 20 W. Va. 82; State v. Robinson, Id. 718, 48 Am. Rep. 799; Thompson's Case, 8 Gratt. 637; Philips' Case, 19 Gratt. 485; McCarters' Case, 11 Leigh, 633. Even in the old Thomas Case, 2 Va. Cas. 479, the doctrine that separation per se is fatal to the verdict is repelled, and, what is pointedly applicable to this case, it was held that "the bare possibility of tampering with the jury is not sufficient to set aside a verdict;" and Judge Dade said: "But we think we have shown that in this case there was a bare possibility of such consequence, and we do not think ourselves justified, on account of a remote possibility, to obstruct the justice of the country in a case where we cannot doubt that the prisoner has received no injury." So we may say in this case that the possibility of any communication of the juror with a soul is very remote, it being almost absolutely certain that he had not, and we are confident the de-man, R., in MacFarland's Case, 8 Abb. Pr. N. S. 57. The later decisions in New York, however, have been opposed to this. See Flanagan v. People, 52 N. Y. 467; People v. Carpenter, 102 N. Y. 238.

One who commits a criminal act when suffering from mental disease which dethroned his reason and judgment with reference to that act, and destroyed his power to comprehend its nature and consequences, and, overpowering his will irresistibly forced him to its commission, is not responsible, but is responsible if the act results from passion overthrowing the reason. State v. Felter, 25 Iowa, 67; State v. Mewherter, 48 Iowa, 83.

A man with reason sufficient to discriminate between right and wrong, whose will to do the right is not overcome by some real delusion in reference to the object upon which the act is committed, so as to irresistibly and uncontrollably force him to commit it, is responsible. Fouts v. State, 4 G. Greene, 500.

In Leache v. State, 22 Tex. App. 379, 58 Am. Rep. 668, the court while holding that the instruction to which exception was taken was broad enough to include irresistible impulse as an excuse for crime, disapproved of allowing it as an excuse unless resulting from mental disease.

If the will power is not overthrown by disease, and there is sufficient mental capacity to know right from wrong, there is criminal responsibility. Conway v. State, 118 Ind. 432.

Impulse obliterating sense of right and wrong.

When there is an uncontrollable impulse to do a criminal act so great as to deprive a person of the ability to distinguish right from wrong in regard to that act, the person is held to be irresponsible. Wright v. State, 4 Neb. 407; Hart v. State, 14 Neb. 572; Burgo v. State, 26 Neb. 630; People v. Sprague, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 43. (But see other New York cases supra.)

In Texas, Rogers v. Com., 7 Met. 500, 41 Am. Dec. 458, has been followed and it is held that where one 18 L. R. A.

who commits a criminal act is afflicted with unsoundness of mind to such a degree as to create an uncontrollable impulse to do the act charged by overriding the reason and judgment, and obliterating the sense of right and wrong, and depriving the accused of the power of choosing between right and wrong as to the particular act done, he is not responsible. King v. State, 9 Tex. App. 515. See Warren v. State, 9 Tex. App. 619.

In Fisher v. People, 23 Ill. 233, it was held that before a jury can render a verdict of acquittal because of moral insanity, they must be satisfied that the accused was acting under an uncontrollable impulse, a frenzy which rendered him unable to control his actions or direct his movements.

But later Illinois cases state more guardedly that unsoundness of mind of such a degree as to create an uncontrollable impulse to do the act charged, by overriding the reason and judgment and obliterating the sense of right and wrong as to the particular act done, and depriving the accused of the power of choosing between them, is an excuse for crime. Hopps v. People, 81 Ill. 335, 63 Am. Dec. 231; Dunn v. People, 109 Ill. 635; Dacey v. People, 116 Ill. 555.

The cases which require that the sense of right and wrong must be obliterated in order to allow the defense of irresistible impulse practically agree with the old doctrine making the knowledge of right and wrong the test rather than with those which recognize the theory of moral insanity or irresistible impulse.

Kleptomania.

Kleptomania is a recognized symptom of mania to which the attention of the jury should be specially called, when the evidence tends to sustain such defense. Looney v. State, 10 Tex. App. 520, 38 Am. Rep. 646.

Kleptomania is a species of insanity which will render its subject morally irresponsible for the crime of theft. Harris v. State, 18 Tex. App. 297.

J. H. H.

fendant suffered no harm from the occurrence.

The rule to be deduced from these cases is that a mere separation of the jury will not entitle the person to a new trial; but where there has been an improper separation he is entitled to the benefit of the presumption that it was prejudicial, and the burden is on the state to show beyond reasonable doubt that he suffered no injury. State v. Robinson and State v. Curtright, supra. This rule is an ample safeguard over the purity of a jury trial. Any other rule, would, as Judge Thompson said in Thompson's Case, supra, in these days, when criminal trials and adjournments in them are so numerous and protracted, result in frequent miscarriages in trials, and delay and defeat the ends of justice, when there is not the slightest presumption or probability, or even possibility, of injustice to the prisoner. It clearly appears that in this case he suffered no harm. While we must at all times guard the rights of the accused, we must not be so technical in procedure as to overturn fair trials for mere shadows, thus bringing criminal justice into endless delay and public derision.

Another occurrence relied upon to annul the verdict is this: The sheriff in charge of the jury had it in a public room of the hotel, and allowed a juror to converse with two persons, one a notary, touching the execution of a deed. The sheriff and a deputy were present, within 8 to 10 feet of the juror, when he met these persons and signed the deed. He saw the deed. The evidence of these two persons, the sheriff, and the juror shows clearly that nothing whatever touching the trial took place, and there was no conversation about anything save the mere signing and acknowledging the deed, which occupied three to five minutes, including the drafting of the certificate of acknowledgment. The other jurors were right at hand. There was no low conversation. Every one could see the deed spread out on the table, and hear the conversation. This is no separation of the jury. The sheriffs were present, and other members of the jury also, and this juror was in charge of the officers. While it is reprehensible in a sheriff in charge of a jury to allow conversation or transaction of business between jurors and other persons, yet this instance does not constitute misconduct in a juror in a legal sense, such as to impair the verdict. We might almost as well say that conversation at table between jurors and waiters, the sheriff being present, though 10 or 15 feet away, and not hearing such conversation, would impair the verdict. In Kennedy's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 510, one of the jurors called to a friend from the window to send a message to his family, and to get his watch, though the sheriff did not hear the conversation, and it was held not cause for setting aside the verdict. So in Thomas' Case, supra, a juror, in presence of the sheriff, but separate from the other jurors, called to a neighbor, and sent a message to his family, and it was held not sufficient to affect the verdict. Wormley's Case, 8 Gratt. 712, cited to support this objection, does not do so, for there the sheriff left the room several times, remaining out from five to ten minutes each time, leaving three persons in the room with the jury, who conversed freely and drank spirits with the jury, but had no conversation as to the trial, while here the sheriffs were present in the room.

Should the verdict be set aside because Ward, one of the jurors, said before he was put on the jury that if the jury should return a verdict that Harrison was insane the jury ought to be hung, and that Harrison ought to be hung? In the first place, we do not know but that the opinion of the juror so expressed was a merely hypothetical, unsubstantial opinion based on mere rumor, and not such as to have disqualified him had it been known when he was questioned on his voir dire, for the mere fact that a juror has expressed an opinion does not necessarily disqualify him. State v. Schnelle, 24 W. Va. 787, and State v. Baker, 38 W. Va. 819. The Virginia general court very long ago held that declarations by jurors that the prisoner was doomed to the penitentiary, and that he ought to be hung, would not call for a new trial; the court saying that it did not appear the juror had a deliberate opinion. Smith's and Kennedy's Cases, 2 Va. Cas. 6, 510. Likely the juror in this case was giving vent to mere idle declarations, not real opinion. But, in the second place, it is settled by many cases that a new trial will not be granted for matter that is principal cause of challenge, which existed before the juror was sworn, but which was unknown to the prisoner until after the verdict, unless it appears from the whole case that the prisoner suffered injustice from the fact that the juror served in the case. Greer's Case, 22 W. Va. 802; State v. Strauder, 11 W. Va. 745, 27 Am. Rep. 606; State v. McDonald, 9 W. Va. 456, and Virginia cases there cited. In Greer's Case the juror said the prisoner ought to be hung, but it was no cause for a new trial. And, in the third place, the juror denies that he made any such statement. There is nothing to show that the prisoner suffered injustice from the presence of Ward on the jury, and the circuit court judge was of opinion that he had not; and, under the many cases holding the doctrine above stated, we must hold this no cause for setting aside the verdict.

Did the court err in refusing to continue the case? An affidavit made by the prisoner's father stated that Dr. Erwin had been a long time the attending physician of the prisoner, and that Erwin had told affiant that the prisoner's mind was disordered and unbalanced; that he told him what function of the brain was disordered, and the cause of the disorder; and that Erwin lived in Tennessee, and affiant regarded his testimony as material, and did not know of any witness by whom the same facts could be shown; that Erwin removed from Cabell county five years before that time, and affiant did not know of his whereabouts, but that his whereabouts could be ascertained. The affidavit while stating that affiant did not know of any witness by whom the same facts stated by Erwin could be proven, does not state that affiant had made inquiry to learn whether he could do so or not. He certainly knew what physicians had attended his son. The range of inquiry was confined to a few physicians in the neighborhood. Erwin had been absent five years, and no place in Tennessee is named as his residence, and his whereabouts are unknown. Was there any certainty of ever getting his deposition?

In Wilhelm v. State, 72 Ill. 483, and Dacey v. People, 116 Ill. 556, it was held that, where a continuance is asked because of the absence of a nonresident witness, the affidavit must state, not only the party's belief that his attendance can be procured, but also the grounds of such belief, so that the court may see whether there is a reasonable ground for the expectation that his evidence can be procured; and without such statement the affidavit is defective. It is different from a resident witness. It was also held that a continuance will not be granted where the evidence is only cumulative, unless it be shown there will be conflict of evidence. Furthermore, a physician who treated the prisoner for masturbation, and stated that in his opinion the prisoner was affected with a form of insanity called "melancholia," was introduced as a witness for the defense, and the father and many others gave evidence for the prisoner upon the only defense made by the prisoner,—that of insanity,—and there was on both sides a large volume of evidence upon that question; and all this enables us to say that the question of the prisoner's sanity was fully, fairly, and elaborately presented to the jury, and that the evidence of the witness Erwin, if attainable, would have been only additional or cumulative; and we cannot see with any certainty that its absence was detrimental, or could have been detrimental, to the prisoner's cause; and therefore we have under this head only to apply the rule of law, well settled in this court, that a motion for continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case; and though an appellate court will supervise the action of an inferior court, and reverse it when it has ruled a party into trial when he was entitled to a continuance, yet it will not reverse on that ground, unless such action was plainly erroneous. The judge presiding sees all the surroundings of the trial, and can better than we decide whether the design of the motion for a continuance is delay, or whether a continuance is really essential to a fair and proper trial. It is not without force to add that the statute (Code, chap. 159, § 1) commands a trial at the same term at which the indictment is found, unless good cause be shown for continuance. Flott v. Com. 12 Gratt. 576; Hewitt's Case, 17 Gratt. 627; Betsall's Case, 11 W. Va. 703; Davis v. Walker, 7 W. Va. 447; Buster v. Holland, 27 W. Va. 511.

Did the court err in failing to impanel a jury, before trial of the prisoner's guilt, to inquire as to his sanity when called to trial? Code, chap. 159, §§ 9, 10, provide that no one while insane shall be tried for crime, and that, if the court see reasonable ground to doubt his sanity, the trial shall be suspended until a jury inquire of his sanity. That feature of the statute which forbids a trial while the party is insane is only declaratory of the common law, as was held of a similar statute in Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216, for Blackstone says: "If a man in his sound memory commit a capital offense, and before arraignment for it becomes mad, he ought not to be arraigned for it, because he is not able to plead to it with that advice and caution that he ought." 4 Bl. Com. 24; 1 Hale, P. C. 34; 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 666; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 761. While at common law, in capital cases, it was the more usual course, when it appeared that the sanity of the accused was doubtful, to inquire touching it by a jury, yet inspection of the accused by the judge without a jury was allowable. 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 666; 1 Hawk. P. C. 8, note; 1 Hale, P. C. 83; Freeman v. People, supra; Bonds v. State, Mart. & Y. 142, 17 Am. Dec. 795. But our statute has in the latter respect changed the common law by requiring, when the court sees reasonable ground to doubt the sanity of the accused, that the question of his sanity shall be tested by a jury.

Next comes the question whether, upon a mere suggestion of present insanity, or even when it is supported by affidavit, the judge is compelled to order a jury, even when he is satisfied that the accused is feigning insanity to avoid trial, or is competent to make a proper defense. At common law, I think, the jury inquest was simply to inform the conscience of the court. The case of Webber v. Com., 119 Pa. 223, was upon a statute providing that, "if any person, upon arraignment, be found a lunatic by a jury lawfully impaneled for the purpose," he should be kept until capable of trial, thus granting him a jury upon the question of his sanity; and it was held that such inquiry by a jury could only be had when the judge has doubts respecting the sanity; that such inquest may be had, at the discretion of the judge, for the purpose of informing his conscience whether the trial ought to proceed, but that the defendant is not, as a matter of legal right, entitled to such jury; and that the question of sanity, both at the date of the offense and trial, was before the jury on the trial of the main issue, and, after a conviction finding that he was and is sane, the appellate court would not inquire whether the discretion of the inferior court was properly exercised in refusing a jury for a preliminary inquiry as to sanity. The court said that neither the suggestion of the prisoner or his counsel nor affidavits could alone suffice to create the doubt necessary to ordering a jury; that they are necessarily addressed to the court, as there is no other tribunal to entertain them, and it is the court which must be affected by considerations supposed to produce the doubt which must precede the inquiry; that a personal inspection of the prisoner, public or private, inquiry from physicians and those around the accused, might be resorted to,—all these and others may contribute to create doubt in the mind of the judge, and for that reason all might be resorted to; and if after all had transpired, the judge has no doubt of the prisoner's sanity, he is neither bound, nor ought he, to order a jury. It is his judicial conscience alone that is to be satisfied. So it was held to be a matter of sound discretion with the judge in Jones v. State, 18 Ala. 157, and State v. Arnold, 12 Iowa, 488, and that the inquiry should not be allowed if, from all the circumstances, the court had no ground to doubt the prisoner's sanity. Guagando v. State, 41 Tex. 626, is to the contrary. From the letter of our statute, and the reason and public policy pertinent to the subject, the decision of the judge must have a very weighty, if not decisive, influence; though, in case of abuse of discretion, I should think it remediable. The judge saw the prisoner face to face, and scanned his countenance, his demeanor and actions, and saw all the surroundings of the trial, as we cannot see them, and was far more competent to say whether the prisoner was in a state of mind fit to undergo a trial, or was simply seeking delay, than are we. Who was better able to pass on the question? There was no showing of his insanity beyond the affidavit of his father that he was not mentally in a condition to undergo trial, and it did not allege his insanity, though I make no point as to this. We cannot on appeal overrule the circuit judge on this matter. We do not see that he abused the discretion lodged with him by the statute. We see only the affidavit of the prisoner's father against the judge's action, and see nothing of the important evidence present to the judge, and moving him to his action.

Is there error in giving, at the state's instance, the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the prisoner, at the time of firing the shot or shots which caused the death of Bettie Adams, was capable of knowing the nature and consequences of his act, and, if he did know, then that he knew he was doing wrong, and that so knowing he fired the shot or shots at the deceased with the willful, deliberate, and premeditated purpose of killing her, they will find the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree." The criticism upon it is that it makes the test of criminal accountability turn on the capacity to know right from wrong, and a knowledge that the accused knew the particular act was wrong,—a principle propounded by early decisions; whereas, the modern law does not make this the only test, but couples with the "right and wrong" test the power of choosing between the two, and the power of the will over the actions; that, though the accused had capacity to know right from wrong, and knew the particular act was wrong, and knew the nature and consequences of that act, yet, if, by reason of mental disease, he had not the power to choose between the right and wrong, and had not power to resist doing the act, he would not be responsible. Even if this theory be granted, the above instruction is not bad; for, in addition to its requiring for conviction that the accused must have been able to know the nature and consequence of the act, and that he was doing wrong in committing it, the instruction also requires that the act was willful, deliberate, and premeditated. If willful, his will must have entered into his act; if deliberate and premeditated, it was the result of reason and reflection, of will and thought concurring, not of irresistible impulse. To do a willful, deliberate, and premeditated act one must have reasoning powers, and the power to exercise the will to refrain from the act or to commit it; not a mere momentary impulse. Defendant's instruction 7 told the jury that "a premeditated design or purpose is one resulting from thought and reflection. A design conceived, and afterwards so deliberately considered as to become resolved and fixed in the mind, is regarded by law as premeditated." So in requiring the act to be willful, deliberate, and premeditated, it logically required will power and capacity to exercise it and to avoid the act. But its theory is wrong for reasons below given.

Is there error in refusing instruction 17: "That, in order to constitute a crime, a man must have intelligence and capacity enough to have a criminal intent and purpose, and if his reason and mental powers are either so deficient that he has no will, no conscience, or controlling mental power, or if, through the overwhelming violence of mental disease, his intellectual power is for the time obliterated, he is not a responsible moral agent, and is not punishable for criminal acts." If we concede it to be correct, then we say that, as the court in defendant's instruction 15 told the jury definitely that insanity was a full legal defense, and gave instructions 16 and 18, they gave the prisoner the benefit of the principle of the instruction as effectually as if that instruction had been given, and the prisoner suffered no harm from its refusal. The instruction is obscure in meaning.

Is there error in refusing instruction 21: "The court instructs the jury that a man may have reason and intelligence sufficient to enable him to distinguish and know the difference between right and wrong. He may know that the act he is about to commit is wrong; and yet, if from defect, weakness, or disease of the mind, he is incapable of controlling his acts and of resisting the impulse to commit the act, then the act, however great a crime it may be, is not a willful act, and therefore not criminal. Therefore, if the jury believe that, although the prisoner, Allen Harrison, at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, knew it was wrong, yet if the jury believe and are satisfied from the evidence in this case that his will power was so impaired by disease or otherwise as to render him incapable of controlling his acts or resisting the impulse so to do, then the killing of Bettie Adams under such circumstances was not the willful act of the prisoner, and he should not be held criminally responsible therefor." This instruction requires us to say whether it proposes a proper legal test of criminal responsibility. It is based upon the theory above mentioned, that, though a person have capacity to know right from wrong, and to know that the particular act is wrong, yet if he has not will power to avoid the act, if he is instigated to it by uncontrollable impulse, he is not criminally liable; and that the "right and wrong" test is not the proper test, as it excludes the effect of uncontrollable impulse. It is conceded that this instruction is not good under the criminal law as stated in the earlier text-books and decisions, but it is claimed that it is sustained by the later and better decisions and text writers. Lords Coke and Hale wrote that to exonerate from crime on account of insanity a man must be totally deprived of memory and understanding; and Justice Tracy, on Arnold's Trial in 1724, (16 St. Trials, 695,) said he must be one totally deprived of memory and understanding, and doth not know what he is doing, no more than an infant, a brute, or wild beast. These statements are not recognized in their full!

ness in later years, yet in modern cases the courts have generally stated the question of responsibility to be whether, at the time the prisoner committed the act, he had mental capacity to know right from wrong, and comprehend his relations to others, and to understand the nature and consequence of the particular act, and that the act was morally wrong, or what is the same, whether he was conscious of doing wrong. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 475. This is the "right and wrong" test, as commonly called. It has had for a long time, and has to-day, the sanction of the most eminent legal authority, those best acquainted with the real and practical demands of the daily administration of justice, as best suited to it, all things considered, and as at once the safest rule for the protection of human life and the preservation of those charged with crime. In 1843, in answer to questions propounded by the house of lords as to crimes committed by persons afflicted with insane delusions in respect to one or more particular persons or subjects, and what were proper questions to be submitted to a jury in such case, and in what terms the question should be left to the jury as to the prisoner's state of mind at the time of the act, the judges of England laid down these principles: "That a person laboring under partial delusions only is nevertheless punishable 'if he knew at the time of committing such crime he was acting contrary to law;' and 'that the jury ought to be told in all cases that every man is presumed to be sane, and to possess sufficient reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction; that to establish the defense of insanity it must be clearly proved that at the time of committing the act the party accused was laboring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing; or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong. The mode of putting the latter part of the question to the jury on these occasions has generally been whether the accused, at the time of doing the act, knew the difference between right and wrong, which mode, though rarely, if ever, leading to any mistake with the jury, is not, as we conceive, so accurate when put generally and in the abstract, as when put with reference to the party's knowledge of right and wrong in respect to the very act with which he is charged." 1 Russ. Crimes, 19; 2 Greenl. Ev § 373, and note.

These answers of the judges are based on the "right and wrong" test, and, though sometimes criticised, they have prevailed in England since 1843. They do not recognize the doctrine of irresistible impulse as an independent element of test. In New York, in 1847, in Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216, these answers of the English judges were recited as the law as it should be given to the jury, and it was said that in murder trials, where insanity is the defense, "the inquiry is always to be brought down to the single question of a capacity to discriminate between right and wrong at the time when the act was committed." In Flanagan v. People, 52 N. Y. 467, 11 Am. Rep. 781, the law was again affirmed as set forth by the English judges, and 18 L. R. A.

the doctrine of uncontrollable impulse, as co-existent with a perception of the moral quality of the acts done, was rejected as a "new element;" the court saying: "We are asked to introduce a new element into the rule of criminal responsibility in cases of alleged insanity, and to hold that the power of choosing right from wrong is as essential to legal responsibility as the capacity of distinguishing it, and that the absence of the former is consistent with the presence of the latter. The argument is on the theory that there is a form of insanity in which the faculties are so disordered and deranged that a man, though he perceives the moral quality of his acts, is unable to control them, and is urged by some mysterious pressure to the commission of the act, the consequences of which he anticipates, but cannot avoid. Whatever medical or scientific authority there may be for this view, it has not been accepted by courts of law. The vagueness and uncertainty of the inquiry which would be opened, and the manifest danger of introducing the limitation claimed into the rule of responsibility, in cases of crime, may well cause courts to pause before assenting to it. Indulgence in evil passions weakens the restraining power of the will and conscience, and the rule suggested would be the cover for the commission of crime and its justification. The doctrine that a criminal act may be excused upon the notion of an irresistible impulse to commit it, where the offender has the ability to discover his legal and moral duty in respect to it, has no place in the law. Rolfe, B., in Rogers v. Allunt, where, on a trial for poisoning, the defendant was alleged to have acted under some moral influence which he could not resist, said: "Every crime was committed under an influence of such a description; and the object of the law was to compel people to control this influence." The New York court laid down the law to be that "the test of responsibility is the capacity of defendant to distinguish between right and wrong at the time of and in respect to the act complained of," and that "the law does not recognize a form of insanity in which the capacity of distinguishing right from wrong exists without the power of choosing between them." Later, in People v. Carpenter, 102 N. Y. 238, this doctrine is again held. In 1889 the South Carolina supreme court held that "mere irresistible impulse to commit murder by reason of mental derangement at the time of the act is not a defense, as long as the accused knew that the act he was committing was a crime morally, and punishable by law." State v. Alexander, 30 S. C. 74. In the debate in the house of lords upon the answers of the fourteen judges of England to the questions propounded by the house of lords, Lord Brougham said that if the perpetrator knew what he was doing; if he had taken the precaution to accomplish his purpose; if he knew, at the time of doing the desperate act, that it was forbidden by law,—that was his test of sanity, and he cared not what judge had given another test, he should go to his grave believing it was the real, sound, and consistent test. I fully concur with Lord Brougham. In Reg. v. Barton, 8 Cox, C. C. 275, that great jurist, Baron Parke, said the single question was whether, at the time of the act, the prisoner knew the nature and character of the deed, and, if so, whether he knew he was doing wrong; and further said that he concurred with the view previously taken by Baron Rolfe that the excuse of an irresistible impulse, coexisting with the full possession of the reasoning powers, if allowed as a defense, might be urged in justification of every crime, for every man might be said not to commit crime except under the influence of some irresistible impulse; that something more than this was necessary to justify acquittal on the ground of insanity; and it would be for the jury to say whether the impulse under which the prisoner had committed the deed was one which altogether deprived him of knowledge that he was doing wrong. In United States v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 93, Mr. Justice Clifford pointedly rejected the "irresistible impulse" test, after a review of the cases. He said that it had been suggested that the rule in the state courts was different from the English rule, but that his examination had led him to the conclusion that the great majority of the well-considered cases followed the English judges; and on another page he says all the well considered cases in both countries since 1848 followed their answers. He said that, in case of partial insanity, it is a question for the jury to determine, under all the evidence, whether the degree of insanity is sufficient to constitute a valid defense; "and if it appears that the mind of the accused is merely clouded and weakened, but is not incapable of reasoning and judging between right and wrong in respect to his own particular act, that he still understands the nature and character of the act and its consequences, and has a knowledge that it is wrong and criminal, and mental power sufficient to apply that knowledge to his own case, and to know that if he does the act he will do wrong and deserve punishment, then the law, on that state of facts, properly regards the accused as a moral agent, responsible for his criminal acts, and punishable for the crime; and to admit, in such a case, that the defense may be set up successfully that he was impelled to the commission of the act by any uncontrollable or irresistible impulse, would be to overlook and disregard the test or criterion of responsibility for criminal acts which the law itself establishes in such a case, and to allow that defense in justification of every crime known to the law."

Courts have to ask themselves what is meant by that insanity which excuses from crime because of incapacity to entertain criminal intent. The infinite and intricate phases of disorders of the mind are interesting, and their study necessary in that noble science which gives relief in the most distressing and saddest of human ailments, and which in our days, unlike the days of Shakespeare, can "minister to a mind diseased, pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow, raze out the written troubles of the brain." But the law is not a metaphysical or theoretical science; it must follow principles suitable to the practical wants of men in organized society by protecting it against heinous crime. Mr. Justice Curtis, in United States v. McGlue, 1 Curt. C. C. 9, adopted the "right and wrong" test as the test which the law applied, and said these were the questions for the jury: "Did the prisoner understand the nature of the act when he stabbed Mr. Johnson? Did he know he was doing wrong, and would deserve punishment? Or, to apply them more nearly to this case, did the prisoner know that he was killing Mr. Johnson; that to do so was criminal and deserving punishment? If so, he had the criminal intent necessary to convict him of murder, and cannot be acquitted on the ground of insanity." The "irresistible impulse" test has been pointedly rejected also in Missouri in State v. Pagels, 93 Mo. 800, the court saying: "It will be a bad day for this state when uncontrollable impulse shall dictate a rule of action to our courts." It has been specifically rejected twice in Kansas,—State v. Nixson, 32 Kan. 205; State v. Mourry, 87 Kan. 369; and in North Carolina in State v. Brandon, 53 N. C. 468. See 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 718. Mr. Bishop does not regard this test as adopted, for in 1 Crim. Law, § 475; he says the "right and wrong" test is the one generally applied by the courts; and in section 478 he says that it is understood in science, and sometimes recognized in courts, though judges are slow to yield on the point, that the mental and physical machine may slip the control of the owner, and so a man may be conscious of what he is doing, and yet his criminal character and consequences, while yet he is impelled onward by a power irresistible. But he says this is not the rule of the courts. In Illinois, in two cases, it is held as to the defense of irresistible impulse that it must proceed from an unsound mind affected with insanity "to such a degree as to create an uncontrollable impulse to do the act by overriding his reason and judgment." Hopps v. People, 81 Ill. 891, 88 Am. Dec. 231; Dacey v. People, 116 Ill. 555. In other words, the party, because of insanity, knew not the wrong of the act. The California supreme court, in People v. Hoin, 63 Cal. 120, 45 Am. Dec. 651, held that an irresistible impulse to commit a criminal act "does not absolve the actor, if at the time, and in respect to the act, he had the power to distinguish between right and wrong." In Maine, an instruction based substantially upon it was held to have been properly rejected. State v. Lawrence, 57 Me. 577, 581. And the cases are almost without number which, while not passing on the "irresistible impulse" test, expressly yet logically exclude it, because they lay down the "right and wrong" test above stated. See note to State v. Marler, 3 Ala. 43, 36 Am. Dec. 407; note to Guiteau's Case, 10 Fed. Rep. 195. The "right and wrong" test was approved in the Guiteau Case. In a few states the "irresistible impulse" test is upheld. See notes just cited.

The case of Parsons v. State, 91 Ala. 577, 60 Am. Rep. 193, is cited to us as one of the best-considered cases supporting this rule, holding that, though there be a capacity to distinguish between right and wrong, as applied to the particular act, still the party is not responsible if by reason of duress of mental disease he has so far lost the power to choose between right and wrong as not to avoid doing the act, so that his free agency was at the time destroyed, and at the same time the crime was so connected with such mental disease, in relation of cause and effect, as to have been the product or offspring of it solely. A dissenting opinion of great ability was filed to that decision, and it overruled a decision to the reverse in Alabama in Boswell's Case, 63 Ala. 807. So, also, Smith v. Com. 1 Duv. 224. So, also, held the Indiana court in Stevens v. State, 81 Ind. 485. The opinion in the last case plants this decision on the opinion of Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Rogers, 7 Met. 500, 41 Am. Dec. 458. It struck me that the opinion of Chief Justice Shaw not only did not support this view, but supported the "right and wrong" test; and I find that Mr. Justice Clifford concurs in this view by citing Chief Justice Shaw's opinion in support of the "right and wrong" test in United States v. Holmes, supra. Chief Justice Shaw said, as to cases of partial insanity, the rule of law "is this: A man is not to be excused from responsibility if he has capacity and reason sufficient to enable him to distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular act he is then doing; a knowledge and consciousness that the act is wrong and criminal, and will subject him to punishment. In order to be responsible, he must have sufficient power of memory to recollect the relation in which he stands to others, and in which others stand to him, and that the act he is doing is contrary to the plain dictates of justice and right, injurious to others, and a violation of the dictates of duty. On the contrary, although he may be laboring under partial insanity, if he still understands the nature and character of his act and its consequences; if he has a knowledge that it is wrong and criminal, and a mental power sufficient to apply that knowledge to his own case, and to know that if he does the act he will do wrong, and receive punishment,—such partial insanity is not sufficient to exempt him from responsibility for criminal acts." The words, "mental power sufficient to apply that knowledge to his own case," mean only capacity to apply his knowledge of right and wrong to the particular act so as to know whether it is wrong. The judge did not mention will power. I cannot see how the eminent Chief Justice Shaw can be quoted on this statement of the rule, as favoring the "irresistible impulse" test. The eminent Chief Justice Dillon is quoted as approving this test in State v. Fetter, 25 Iowa, 67, whereas his opinion will not do so. He did say the "right and wrong" test should not be applied too strictly in all cases. He admitted that the cases of authority recognized that a party was responsible if he knew the act was wrong, but said that if it should, by the observation and concurrent testimony of medical men, come to be definitely established as true that there is a diseased condition of mind in which, though the person knows abstractly that his act is wrong, yet from insane impulse, proceeding from an insane mind, he is driven to the act irresistibly, then the law must be modified. This is purely hypothetical or conditional; an admission that such then was not the law. And in the actual decision he held as proper, and not erroneous, an instruction based on the "right and wrong" test, and said: "With reference to the 'right and wrong' test referred to in the instructions, it will be seen that the court does not adopt this criterion as a general one; that is, it does not say that, if the defendant has capacity to distinguish between right and wrong generally, he is criminally responsible. But it held that if at the time and with respect to the act about to be committed the defendant had not reason enough to discriminate between right and wrong with reference to that act, and had not reason enough to know the nature of the crime, and did not know that he was doing wrong in committing it, he is not criminally punishable. The court, in substance, held that if the defendant's reason was so far gone or overwhelmed that his perception of right or wrong with respect to the contemplated act was destroyed; if he did not rationally comprehend the character of the act he was about to commit,—he should be acquitted. The instruction as given finds full support in the judgments of courts the most respectable. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 27, 47 Am. Dec. 216, approved in Willis v. People, 82 N. Y. 715; State v. Brandon, 58 N. C. 463; Com. v. Mosler, 4 Pa. 264; McNaghton's Case, 10 Clark & F. 210; Oxford's Case, 9 Car. & P. 525." He thus quotes the very cases holding the "right and wrong" test. How this case of State v. Fetter can be cited to sustain the "irresistible impulse" test, I am unable to see. And in the later case of State v. Meagher, 46 Iowa, 88, the court held that to justify acquittal for uncontrollable propensity the insanity "must be such as to destroy the power to comprehend rationally the nature and consequences of his act, and overpower his will." Several cases cited in note in 86 Am. Dec. 407, as on the side of the "irresistible impulse" test are not on its side, but against it, some of them, Ortwein v. Com. 76 Pa. 414, 18 Am. Rep. 420; Com. v. Mosler, 4 Pa. 264; Brown v. Com. 78 Pa. 122; Sayres v. Com. 88 Pa. 291; State v. Gut, 13 Minn. 858; State v. Shippey, 10 Minn. 229, 88 Am. Dec. 70; Blackburn v. State, 23 Ohio St. 148, and others. The "irresistible impulse" test seems to meet the approval of the distinguished law writer, Mr. Wharton. Whart. Hom. § 574; 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 44; 1 Whart. & S. Med. Jur. § 147.

This "irresistible impulse" test has been only recently presented, and, while it is supported by plausible arguments, yet it is rather refined, and introduces what seems to me a useless element of distinction for a test, and is misleading to juries, and fraught with great danger to human life, so much so that even its advocates have warningly said it should be very cautiously applied, and only in the clearest cases. What is this "irresistible impulse"? How shall we of the courts and juries know it? Does it exist when manifested in one single instance, as in the present case, or must it be shown to have been habitual, or at least to have evinced itself in more than a single instance, as Chief Justice Gibson said must be the case? We have kleptomania and pyromania, which better works on medical jurisprudence tell us cannot excuse crime where there is capacity to know the character of the act. Whart. & S. Med. Jur. §§ 592, 602, 616. Shall we introduce homicidal mania, and allow him of the manslaying propensity to walk innocent through the land while yet not insane, but capable of knowing the nature and wrong of his murderous act? For myself I cannot see how a person who rationally comprehends the nature and quality of an act, and knows that it is wrong and criminal, can act through irresistible innocent impulse. Knowing the nature of the act well enough to make him otherwise liable for it under the law, can we say that he acts from irresistible impulse, and not criminal design and guilt? And if we are sure he was seized and possessed and driven forward to the act wholly and absolutely by irresistible impulse, his mind being diseased, how can we say he rationally realized the nature of the act,—realized it to an extent to enable us to hold him criminal in the act? How can the knowledge of the nature and wrongfulness of the act exist along with such impulse that shall exonerate him? Can the two coexist? The one existing, does not the other nonexist? Can we certainly say that a person who is really driven to an act by such an impulse was capable, at the instant of the act, of knowing its true nature? The mother who threw her child overboard into the billows of the deep was held innocent because she was possessed and impelled by the uncontrollable impulse to do so, while yet she was conscious of the heinousness of the act. Can we be sure she knew the character of the act? If in fact she did, can we safely say she was driven on by the mysterious spirit of irresistible impulse? So it appeared to the Kansas court, in State v. Nizon, 32 Kan. 205, where the court says: "It is possible that an insane impulse is sometimes sufficient to destroy criminal responsibility, but this is probably so only when it destroys the power of the accused to comprehend rationally the nature, character, and consequences of the particular acts, and not where he still has the power of knowing the character of the acts, and that they are wrong. . . . The law will hardly recognize the theory that an uncontrollable impulse may so take possession of a man's faculties and powers as to compel him to do what he knows to be wrong and a crime, and thereby remove him from all criminal responsibility. Whenever a man understands the nature and character of an act, and knows that it is wrong, it would seem that he ought to be held legally responsible for the commission of it."

After preparing this opinion, I met with Stephens' History of the Criminal Law of England. Mr. Stephens is quoted as favoring the "irresistible impulse" theory, and in volume 2, pp. 170, 171, brings himself to the admission that one who is the subject of such an impulse does not know that his act is wrong; that one who does know the right has power to choose the right over the wrong, this very knowledge involving and including power of self-control; that so the rules laid down by the law ought to be construed; that the test of "knowledge that an act is wrong" is the best and most proper test of accountability, and that such is the test by the law of the land. He says: "Knowledge and power are the constituent elements of all voluntary action, and, if either is seriously impaired, the other is disabled. It is as true that a man who cannot control himself does not know the nature of his acts as that a man who does not know the nature of his acts is incapable of self-control." I admit the existence of irresistible impulse, and its efficacy to exonerate from responsibility, but not as consistent with an adequate realization of the wrong of the act. It is that uncontrollable impulse produced by the disease of the mind, when that disease is sufficient to override the reason and judgment, and obliterate the sense of right as to the act done, and deprive the accused of power to choose between them. This impulse is born of the disease, and when it exists capacity to know the true nature of the act is gone. This is the sense in which "irresistible impulse" was defined in Hoppe v. People, 31 Ill. 885, 88 Am. Dec. 231, and Dacey v. People, 116 Ill. 556. It seems to me to be very dangerous to life to tell juries that a party may know the nature of his murderous act, and know and be conscious that it is wrong and criminal, and yet be excusable if he did the act at the command of irresistible impulse; thus eliminating the knowledge of the wrong of the act as an unessential, unimportant element in the test. I do not regard it essential to the safety of the parties accused. The operations of the human mind are wonderful, mysterious, and occult. Insanity is one of its melancholy and impenetrable conditions. Its types and phases are infinite and dark. Volumes upon volumes have been compiled by writers upon medical jurisprudence, mental philosophy, and law to pierce its depths, and find the general rules which shall tell criminal courts what degree and character of insanity shall avail to excuse crime; but no general rule universally applicable has been or can be found, because, as Mr. Bishop says, it is not in the nature of the subject to extract such a rule from it. I know of no better rule than the "right and wrong" test as above stated. Hence I do not think instruction 21 is good in law.

There is another objection to instructions 17 and 21, in that there was a theory presented by the evidence that before the killing of the deceased the prisoner had taken laudanum; and if he was under its intoxication, produced by the voluntary use of the drug, that intoxication would furnish him no excuse. These instructions do not insert that theory as an element of the hypotheses presented by them, but disregard and ignore it, and are bad for that cause. State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799; State v. Welch, 86 W. Va. —.

An objection to James Kelly's competency as a juror is not insisted on in the brief of counsel, and is not tenable. Nor is the motion to quash the indictment because of irregularity in the formation of the grand jury, or other cause, insisted on. No irregularity as to the grand jury appears.

Did the court err in refusing a new trial because the verdict was contrary to evidence and law? This involves the merits of the case upon the evidence before the jury; but it is unnecessary to elaborate the voluminous evidence, or even any of the facts touching the merits of the case. Suffice it to say, however, that Allen Harrison, the prisoner, was about 26 years of age. Having some difficulty with his father, he left his home, and was a homeless wanderer, and was kindly taken under the roof of Frank Adams, where he had been furnished a home, and treated very kindly as a member of the family for nearly a year before the tragedy, making no return but in small jobs of work. He fell in love with

Bettie Adams, daughter of Frank Adams, and paid her frequent attention, but his love was not by any means reciprocated, as he was well aware. Miss Adams preferred another, and so gave Harrison to understand. He became exceedingly jealous of attention to her from her lover, and when he would visit the house Harrison would leave it, and quarrel with Miss Adams about her receiving attention from others. They had frequent "spats," in the language of the witness, on that account. He declared his love to the girl's mother, but she told him that it would do him no good, and the best thing he could do was to leave the house; that her daughter was a mere child; that she wanted him to take his clothes and go; that her daughter would not stay at home; that talk was abroad in the neighborhood, and he was trying to keep other folks from going with her daughter. This she told him several months, and the last time about a week before the killing of the daughter. The daughter feared him,—feared that he would poison her. On Friday night he stayed with a neighbor, and there he secretly took a pistol from the drawer. He next day went to a store, and asked for cartridges. The pistol had two loads in it, but he seems to have wanted more cartridges to make sure work. He bought two two-ounce vials of laudanum. On Saturday he returned to the home of Adams, and at the kitchen door called for a drink of water, then walked through it into the front room, and Bettie Adams went into that room, just behind him, to take up ashes, and almost immediately the mother heard a shot, and the exclamation of her daughter, "Oh, ma, Allen has shot me!" and ran to her, took her in her arms, when Bettie sunk to the floor, never spoke again, and died at once. The mother found Harrison in the room, pistol in hand, trying to shoot it again, it being an old pistol, out of order; and she said he had an unusually vicious look on his face. A little sister saw Harrison place the pistol close to the back of the deceased, and fire. He went to the woods close by, threw the pistol by a log, and was found in a few hours, lying down, with coat under his head. He declared he did not know why he had done the act. He wanted them to take an axe and kill him, as he had done so dreadful an act. He said he shot the deceased in the breast as she raised up in raking up ashes, and as she turned he shot her in the back. Afterwards, when being conveyed to jail, he was asked, if it were to do over again, would he do it? and answered, "Yes, I would;" that he was not sorry for it, or ashamed of it, but was ashamed for anybody to see him. The mother requested him to go to see her child's dead body, but he declined to do so. On the way to jail he unloosed the rope with which he was tied, and ran a short distance, trying to escape. Either before or after the act he took laudanum, probably a large quantity, and vomited several times after his arrest, appearing sick and weak. The only defense was insanity. It was a question for the jury, and they found against it, as we think, properly. Here is a ruthless, cruel murder of a child a little over 15 years of age, simply because of unrequited love and jealousy. There is no evidence at all adequate to sustain the plea of insanity. The prisoner had practiced masturbation, and there was evidence tending to show that he was afflicted with melancholia caused by it; but the great volume of evidence is utterly insufficient to show any want of capacity to excuse him. The attempt to commit suicide, if he really attempted it, is the strongest evidence to support the insanity theory, but it does not show insanity necessarily. 1 Whart. & S. Med. Jur. § 686; Coyle v. Com. 100 Pa. 573.

The theory of irresistible impulse was so little borne out by the evidence that it may be questioned whether the instruction based on it, even if correct in law, was relevant to the case. He deliberately and secretly prepared the pistol, hours before the bloody and cruel deed. He knew that the girl did not love him, and that marriage with her was out of the question. It is simply another instance of the many in the annals of criminal law where a man murders a woman because she will not reciprocate his love, and because of intense jealousy, perhaps mingled in this case with malice, because he had been bidden to leave the house on her account.

Solemn as is the judgment, we are compelled to affirm it.

As the day fixed for the execution of the sentence has passed, the case is remanded to the circuit court, with direction to cause the defendant to be brought before it, and to fix another day for the execution of the judgment.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Frank HORNISH, Pff. in Err.,

v.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois.

(.....III.....)

1. Lunacy or insanity to take away accountability must be of such degree as to obliterate the sense of right and wrong as to the particular act done.

NOTE.—The above case is reported in connection with the preceding one to illustrate still further the test of insanity by knowledge of right and wrong. See the notes on this subject at the foot of the preceding case.

2. Reasonable doubt of sanity is not a proper test of the sufficiency of evidence to convict, but the reasonable doubt must be as to the whole evidence and not as to a particular fact in the case.

(November 2, 1892.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Coles County to review a judgment convicting defendant upon an indictment for assault with intent to commit murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wiley & Neal, for plaintiff in error:

If at the trial of a person charged with crime

it shall appear from the evidence that the act was committed as charged, but at the time of committing the same the person so charged was a lunatic or insane the jury shall so find by their verdict.

Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 88, § 284.

The instructions on behalf of the people make the test of accountability different from that authorized by our supreme court.

Hopps v. People, 81 Ill. 385; Dacey v. People, 116 Ill. 555.

There are two objections to the modifications made by the court:

1st. The court directs and confines the attention of the jury to the evidence only upon the question of insanity which was erroneous.

Mullins v. People, 110 Ill. 42.

2d. After restricting the attention of the jury to evidence upon the question of insanity instead of saying to the jury if they have a reasonable doubt of his sanity they should acquit, the word "sanity" is erased and "guilt" substituted, and the jury are told that if after considering all the evidence as to the insanity of the accused (they have a reasonable doubt as to his guilt they are to acquit. Their consideration of the evidence is restricted to the one question of insanity, but their "reasonable doubt" is enlarged to the question of guilt.

Messrs. J. H. Marshall, J. W. Craig, and George Hunt, Atty-Gen., for the People.

Bailey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Frank W. Hornish was indicted in the circuit court of Coles county for an assault upon Horace S. Clark, with intent to commit murder, and on trial before a jury was convicted and his punishment was fixed at imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of five years. The court thereupon, after denying his motion for a new trial, pronounced sentence upon him in accordance with said verdict, and the record is now brought to this court by writ of error. The evidence shows that, on the 15th day of December, 1891, at about 7 o'clock in the evening, the defendant met Clark in a public street in the city of Mattoon, and fired four shots at him, from a 32-caliber revolver, two of which took effect in the person of Clark, inflicting upon him wounds of considerable severity. The fact that defendant made said assault is not denied. The only evidence in relation to it, and the circumstances under which it was committed, consists of the testimony of the people's witnesses, no rebutting testimony being offered on the part of the defendant. On that question, therefore, there was at the trial, and is now, no dispute. The only defense interposed is insanity, and to the issue thus raised most of the evidence on both sides was directed.

The first contention now made is that, in view of the evidence as to the defendant's insanity at the time the assault was committed, the verdict of the jury finding him guilty was unwarranted and should be set aside. We do not feel called upon to attempt here an analysis of the evidence, but, after having given it a careful consideration, we are unable to say that the jury have not deduced from it the correct conclusions. As is not unusual in cases of this character, there is a wide discrepancy in the testimony of the witnesses. Part of them expressed the opinion that he was insane or partially so, while others expressed the contrary opinion. Very few of them, however, are able to testify that, in their opinion, he was so far mentally diseased as to be unable to distinguish right from wrong; and when all the facts and circumstances proved, as well as the opinions of witnesses, are considered, we do not find such doubt as to the correctness of the verdict raised in our mind as would justify us in setting it aside. The questions presented by the defense of insanity were for the jury, and they had the important advantage of seeing the witnesses and hearing them testify. If the jury, then, were accurately instructed as to the law, we ought not to disturb their finding, unless we are clearly satisfied that it is erroneous and unjust. A careful reading of the evidence does not bring our minds to that conclusion.

On the question of the defendant's insanity, the court, at the instance of the people, instructed the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that at the time of committing the alleged acts the defendant was able to distinguish right from wrong, then you cannot acquit on the ground of insanity. If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant committed the crime, in manner and form as charged in the indictment, and at the time of committing such act was able to distinguish right from wrong, you should find him guilty. If from all the evidence in the case you believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant committed the crime of which he is accused, in manner and form as charged in the indictment, and that at the time of the commission of such crime the defendant knew that it was wrong to commit such crime, and was mentally capable of choosing either to do or not to do the acts constituting such crime, and of governing his conduct in accordance with such choice, then it is your duty, under the law, to find him guilty, even though you should believe, from the evidence, that at the time of the commission of the crime he was not entirely and perfectly sane."

The first two of these propositions are criticised upon the ground that they made the test of accountability, where insanity is set up as a defense, different from that laid down by the court in Hopps v. People, 81 Ill. 385, and Dacey v. People, 116 Ill. 555. In the Hopps Case it was said: "A safe and reasonable test, in all such cases, would be that whenever it should appear from the evidence that, at the time of doing the act charged, the prisoner was not of sound mind, but affected with insanity, and such affection was the efficient cause of the act, and that he would not have done the act but for that affection, he ought to be acquitted. But this unsoundness of mind or affection of insanity must be of such degree as to create an uncontrollable impulse to do the act charged, by overruling the reason and judgment, and obliterating the sense of right and wrong as to the particular act done, and depriving the accused of the power of choosing between them." The same rule, in substance, was repeated in the Dacey Case. We are unable to perceive any necessary repugnancy between the test thus laid down and that adopted by the instructions above quoted. By the very terms of said test, before criminal accountability ends, the affection of insanity, or the irresistible insane impulse thereby created, must be of such a degree and character as to obliterate the sense of right and wrong as to the particular act done; and it follows, as held in said instructions, that if the accused, at the time of committing the criminal act charged, was capable of distinguishing right from wrong, the defense of insanity is not made out. The third of said instructions further recognizes, as a test of want of criminal accountability, the mental incapability of the defendant to choose to do or not to do the act constituting the crime, as well as want of knowledge that it was wrong to do it. But it is sufficient, for the purposes of this decision, to refer to Dunn v. People, 109 Ill. 635, in which these identical instructions were given, and where it was held that they were proper and were not in conflict with the Hoppe Case, or other cases following that decision.

The following instruction, asked on behalf of defendant, was modified by the court by inserting therein the words in italics, and was given as modified: "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the act charged against the defendant in the indictment was committed by him as therein charged, but that, at the time of committing the same, the defendant was a lunatic or insane, to the extent of obliterating the sense of right and wrong as to the particular act done, you should so find by your verdict," etc. Two other instructions of the same general character asked by the defendant were modified by the insertion therein of the same words. There was no error in this modification. As asked, these instructions held that lunacy or insanity, whatever its degree or character, was sufficient to take away criminal accountability, while, as we have already seen, to have that effect, it must be of such degree as to obliterate the sense of right and wrong as to the particular act done.

The following instruction asked by the defendant was modified by the court by striking out the word in brackets, and inserting in lieu thereof the word in italics, and given to the jury so modified: "That to warrant a conviction in this case, it is incumbent on the people to establish, by evidence, to the satisfaction of the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, the existence of every element necessary to constitute the crime charged; and if after a careful and impartial examination of all the evidence in the case bearing upon the question of sanity or insanity, the jury entertain any reasonable doubt of the [sanity] guilt of the defendant, at the time of the alleged offense, they should give the defendant the benefit of that doubt and acquit him." Three other instructions were asked on behalf of the defendant, by which it was sought, in various forms, to submit to the jury the issue as to the defendant's sanity, as a separate issue, and to instruct them that if, on consideration of the evidence, they had a reasonable doubt as to his sanity, they should find a verdict of acquittal. These instructions were all modified in the same manner as above, and such modifications are assigned for error. We are of the opinion that this assignment of error cannot be sustained. Mr. Bishop, in his treatise on Criminal Procedure, in discussing the defense of insanity and the mode in which it may be availed of, says: "Where the defendant sets up that he was insane when he did the act whereof he is accused, he simply declares that he had not the criminal intent which is one of the indispensable elements in every offense. The defense is, in principle, precisely the same as when he declares that he had not the requisite age, or that he acted under an innocent mistake of fact, or where a wife sets up coercion from her husband. It is a bare denial of a part of the prosecuting government's case." 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. 3d ed. § 669. And again: "The doctrine of principle, sustained by a large part of our courts, and rapidly becoming general, is that, as the pleadings inform us, insanity is not an issue by itself, to be passed on separately from the other issues, but, like any other matter in rebuttal, it is involved in the plea of not guilty, upon which the burden of proof is on the prosecuting power; the jury to convict or not according as, on the whole showing, they are satisfied or not, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the defendant's guilt." Id. § 672. The precise question now before us was decided by the Texas court of appeals in Webb v. State, 9 Tex. App. 490. There, the defendant being on trial for murder, and the defense of insanity having been set up, the court charged the jury, in substance, that it was their province to determine, from all the evidence in the case, whether the defendant was sane or insane; that every defendant in a criminal case is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established, by legal evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, and in case of a reasonable doubt as to his guilt he is entitled to be acquitted; that if the jury had therefore any reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, under the evidence in the case and the law as given them, they should acquit him. The court was thereupon asked to charge the jury specially that, if they entertained a reasonable doubt of the sanity of the accused at the time of the commission of the homicide, they should acquit him. This charge the court refused to give, and its ruling in that respect was sustained. In the opinion the court says: "It will not do to say that the reasonable doubt, independent of the whole case, applies and must be given to each and every element going to make up the corpus of the crime, and, failing to do so, that the charge would be insufficient; because such a rule would lead to unnecessary, and perhaps interminable, confusion, and in case of circumstantial evidence, for instance, it would be necessary to charge it with reference to each isolated fact in the chain of facts essential to the existence of the main fact. . . . In the case at bar, the evidence of insanity was no defense, save as it tended to rebut or destroy the criminal intent with which Webb shot and killed Foster, and it should only be given such weight as would produce upon the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt, not of Webb's insanity, but of the fact affirmed by the state, which was that Webb killed Foster with criminal intent, and under circumstances constituting the crime of murder. . . . Our conclusion of the whole matter is that the charge of the court was a sufficient exposition of the law of insanity, and that, having fully charged the law of reasonable doubt, as to the whole case, the court did not err in refusing the special requested instruction." See Lawson, Defenses to Crime, 885.

The foregoing decision is quite in harmony with the rule laid down in repeated decisions of this court. Thus, in Mullins v. People, 110 Ill. 42, where a defendant, on trial for robbery, attempted to prove an alibi, we said: "Nor is it proper for the court to designate any particular branch of the case, and tell the jury, unless it is proved beyond a reasonable doubt, they should acquit. The reasonable doubt the jury is permitted to entertain must be as to the whole evidence, and not as to a particular fact in the case." In Oreus v. People, 120 Ill. 817, the court refused to instruct the jury that if they had any reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant, at the time of the shooting, was under reasonable apprehension and honest fear that deceased intended and was about to inflict upon him great bodily harm, and that he fired the shots under that belief and in self-defense, they should acquit. In sustaining this ruling we said: "The fact that a jury may entertain a reasonable doubt in regard to some particular fact required to be proved, in order to convict a defendant of crime, will not, of itself, authorize an acquittal, as is implied in the instruction, but a reasonable doubt, which will authorize an acquittal, is one as to the guilt of the accused on the whole evidence, and not as to any particular fact." See also Leigh v. People, 118 Ill. 372; Davis v. People, 114 Ill. 86.

It follows from what we have said that the court was justified in refusing to give the following instruction asked on behalf of the defendant: "To constitute the crime charged, there must be a union of fact and intent; and if, from all the evidence, you have a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's having the intent to commit the crime charged, or a reasonable doubt as to his having a sufficiently sane mind to form the criminal intent, your verdict should be for the defendant." Certain objections as to the rulings of the trial court in the admission of evidence are urged, but, on careful examination of the record, we fail to find said objections sustained.

We perceive no material errors in the record, and the judgment will therefore be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (3d Div.).

CAPITAL CITY BANK, Appl.,

v.

Adolphus PARENT, Impleaded, etc., Respt.

(.....N. Y.)

1. No debt is created on the part of a bank by the sale of its draft on another bank for cash, which can be levied on under attachment against the purchaser, so long as the draft remains outstanding without default thereon.
2. A creditors' bill cannot be based upon a judgment for money only in an action in which jurisdiction was obtained only by attachment of the property of a nonresident debtor since under Code Civ. Proc., § 707, such judgment can be enforced only against the attached property.
3. A bank which settles in a foreign country with one who has stolen money from it, and to enable him to make such settlement induces a third person to purchase from him a draft which he had procured with part of the stolen money, cannot dispute the purchaser's title thereto.

(October 1, 1902.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Onondaga Special Term in favor of defendant in an action brought to procure the satisfaction of a claim which plaintiff had against one, Charles C. Nelson, out of an alleged credit consisting of an unpaid bank draft. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. Nottingham for appellant.

Mr. Frank H. Hiscock, for respondent: Plaintiff had not placed itself in a position, by the recovery of a valid judgment against Nelson, or Lee, and the issue of an execution thereon, to institute this action.

Such an action can be maintained by a judgment creditor only when it has obtained a valid judgment upon which an execution has been properly issued and returned.

N. Y. Code, §§ 1871, 1872; Dunlevy v. Tallmadge, 82 N. Y. 457; Adair v. Butler, 87 N. Y. 585.

It would have been impossible to make a valid levy upon the draft if the sheriff had obtained possession of it, the legal title thereto having been transferred before the warrant was issued.

Thurder v. Blanck, 50 N. Y. 86; Castle v. Lewis, 78 N. Y. 181; Anthony v. Wood, 96 N. Y. 186.

The judgment in question being void for want of jurisdiction could be attacked collaterally in this action.

Osterhout v. Hyland, 27 Hun, 167; Lange v. Benedict, 78 N. Y. 12, 29 Am. Rep. 80; White v. Bogart, 73 N. Y. 256; Bartlett v. Spicer, 75 N. Y. 584; Schwinger v. Hickok, 58 N. Y. 280, Gilmore v. Ham, 29 N. Y. S. R. 751.

Attachments are proceedings in rem, giving no rights except as against the very property seized and brought within the jurisdiction of the court, and a judgment rendered in an attachment suit against a nonresident, served by publication only, must follow the same theory. It cannot be a general one. It must be in rem and not in personam.

NOTE.—As to validity of personal judgment rendered upon constructive service of process, see note to Moyer v. Bucks (Ind.) 16 L. R. A. 231, 13 L. R. A.

As to relief from judgment rendered on publication of process, see note to Dunlap v. Steere (Cal.) 16 L. R. A. 331.

Cromwell v. Gallup, 17 Hun, 49; Schwinger v. Hickok, supra; Bartlett v. Spicer, 8 N. Y. Week. Dig. 227, 12 Hun, 896, 75 N. Y. 528; Bartlett v. McNeil, 60 N. Y. 58.

A judgment thus obtained, therefore, being in rem and special, would not afford a proper foundation for a creditor's suit.

Landon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in the nature of a creditors' bill. It is based upon an execution returned unsatisfied upon a judgment for money only, entered in an action in the supreme court in favor of this plaintiff against Charles O. Nelson, who was a nonresident, was served by publication, and did not appear, but in which a warrant of attachment was issued, and proof by affidavit produced and filed upon the motion for judgment that the attachment had been levied upon property of the defendant, which levy, it was shown upon this trial, was never made. We think the complaint was properly dismissed. The only attempt to levy under the attachment was as follows: Nelson, who had been a resident of Atlanta, in the state of Georgia, on June 30, 1888, by fraudulent practices, which under our laws would amount to larceny, obtained $6,500 of the plaintiff, a banking corporation in Atlanta, and also $4,600 of two other banks of the same place, and then absconded. July 6, 1888, he bought of the defendant the First National Bank of Syracuse its draft for $5,000 upon another defendant, the First National Bank of New York, and paid $5,000 in cash for the draft. The draft was payable to the order of W. C. Lee, a fictitious name which Nelson assumed. Nelson then fled to Canada, taking the draft with him, and there, July 2, 1888, transferred it for value to the appellant, who then became the owner of it in good faith, and still is its owner and holder. July 26, 1888, the sheriff of Onondaga county, holding the warrant of attachment, assumed to levy upon the $5,000 paid by Nelson to the First National Bank of Syracuse, by serving a notice upon the bank that he thereby levied the warrant of attachment upon the moneys in its hands belonging to the defendant, and all deposits and moneys deposited by him with the bank, and debts owing by the bank to him. The bank thereupon gave the sheriff a certificate stating the facts respecting the purchase of the draft. The draft being outstanding, and no default having been made upon it, the Syracuse bank was not indebted to Nelson or to the holder of the draft. It was not the depository or bailee of the money paid for the draft. It sold the draft for cash in the usual course of business, and that ended the transaction, unless the draft should be dishonored upon presentation, or unless plaintiff's moneys could be identified, payment of the draft stopped, and the moneys reclaimed before the rights of third parties intervened, which would be a very different proceeding from a judgment for money only as upon contract, and an action in the nature of a creditors' bill to secure its payment. The draft itself was not attached. Thus the attachment was not levied, and hence no jurisdiction to enter a judgment against Nelson existed.

The Code (§§ 1216, 1217) requires that in a case where the defendant is a nonresident, and the summons has not been personally served upon him within the state, and he has not appeared, and a warrant of attachment has been issued, proof by affidavit that the warrant of attachment has been levied upon property of the defendant must be produced and filed upon the application for judgment. Like the proof of the personal service of a summons in other cases, this is jurisdictional. True, the proof by affidavit was produced and filed, but this is not conclusive, and is overcome where, as in this case, proof of the actual facts shows the contrary. Ferguson v. Crawford, 70 N. Y. 253, 26 Am. Rep. 589. Besides, a judgment for money only, rendered against a nonresident, who has not appeared, and upon whom service of the summons is made by publication, and an attachment issued and levied, "can only be enforced against the property which has been levied upon by virtue of the warrant of attachment at the time when judgment is entered." Code, § 707. The execution is limited to the property attached. Section 1870. Jurisdiction of the person is not obtained, but of the property attached. McKinney v. Collins, 88 N. Y. 216; Schwinger v. Hickok, 53 N. Y. 280; Bartlett v. McNeil, 60 N. Y. 58; Bartlett v. Spicer, 75 N. Y. 528; Cromwell v. Gallup, 17 Hun, 49. If, therefore, anything was levied upon under the attachment, the plaintiff's remedy was limited to it, and whatever action in aid of the attachment was proper should have been brought by the sheriff under section 655 of the Code. See Backus v. Kimball, 62 Hun, 123. As the judgment against Nelson would affect only the attached property, it follows that the plaintiff was in no position to bring the present action. Plaintiff could, in the first action, only exhaust its legal remedies against the property attached, and not its legal remedies generally. It could issue no execution against Nelson's other property. If, indeed, a valid levy was made under the attachment, it seems to have been abandoned; if it was not made, the plaintiff's case rests upon its failure to take any legal remedy. The findings of the trial court which have been approved by the general term show that with respect to this appellant the case was properly disposed of upon the merits. The plaintiff procured the arrest of Nelson in Canada, and then, before the action in which the attachment was issued was commenced, upon being advised that he was not extraditable, made a settlement with him, and acknowledged full satisfaction of all demands in consideration of $6,000, which Nelson then paid, less $320 to be paid afterwards by the appellant. This was by him tendered when due, but its acceptance refused. The appellant was present at such settlement, and for the purpose of furnishing Nelson part of the money with which to effect the same, and at the procurement and solicitation of the plaintiff, and upon its representation that it was perfectly proper and safe for him to do so, purchased the draft of

Nelson for its face value, less $50, and paid $8,825.85 upon the purchase price, besides the $320 tendered to and refused by the plaintiff. The evidence amply sustains the findings of the trial judge. If we assume that the plaintiff settled with a thief, and was not bound by its acquittance of its whole demand made upon only part payment of it, yet it was bound by its representations to the appellant upon the faith of which he parted with his money, and it cannot dispute the title which it induced him for its benefit to accept. There may be a small surplus in the appellant's hands as between him and Nelson, but, if so, it cannot be reached in this action.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

C. Gray BOLTON et al., Appts.,

v.

William SCHRIEVER et al., Repts.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. The decision that a testator was an inhabitant of the county, made by a surrogate to whom a will is presented for probate, is conclusive against collateral attack independent of any statutory provision, at least where the surrogate had jurisdiction of the subject-matter by reason of the fact that testator was an inhabitant of the state at the time of his death.
2. An extra allowance of costs is not precluded by the fact that on a former trial of the same case an extra allowance had been granted and the costs paid as a condition of a new trial.

(October 4, 1902.)

NOTE.—Collateral impeachability of findings as to jurisdictional facts on which administration of a decedent's estate is based.

Inhabitancy of county.

Of the decision in Bolton v. Jacks, 6 Robt. 166, that if a surrogate admits to probate a will of a testator not at the time of his death an inhabitant of his county he acts without jurisdiction and that his proceeding is void and open to collateral attack, Barl. J., in Roderigas v. East River Sav. Inst., 68 N. Y. 460, 469, 20 Am. Rep. 555, says, "I believe the decision to be unsound in this respect."

In direct support of the main case as against the doctrine of Bolton v. Jacks, supra, it has been held in numerous cases that the fact that a decedent was not at the time of his death a resident of the county or district in which an administrator was appointed is not a ground of collateral attack on such an appointment. Coltart v. Allen, 40 Ala. 155, 38 Am. Dec. 757; Barcliff v. Freece, 77 Ala. 528; Irwin v. Scriber, 18 Cal. 499; Re Griffith, 84 Cal. 107; Tant v. Wigfall, 65 Ga. 412; Johnson v. Beazley, 65 Mo. 250, 27 Am. Rep. 276; Bumstead v. Read, 31 Barb. 661; Morrell v. Dennison, 8 Abb. Pr. 401, 17 How. Pr. 422; Bolton v. Brewster, 32 Barb. 389; Re Harvey, 3 Redf. 214; Rollins v. Henry, 84 N. C. 569; Burnley v. Duke, 2 Rob. (Va.) 102; Thornton v. Baker, 15 R. I. 558; Holmes v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 7 Sawy. 380, 9 Fed. Rep. 229; Smith v. Munroe, 23 N. C. 345; Eller v. Richardson, 89 Tenn. 575.

Neither is nonresidence in the state. Record v. Howard, 58 Me. 225.

But there have been some decisions in conflict with those above cited which hold that an appointment of an administrator may be attacked collaterally on the ground that the intestate was not at the time of his death a resident of the county or district in which the appointment is made. Olmstead's App. 43 Conn. 110; Cutts v. Haskins, 9 Mass. 347; Holyoke v. Haskins, 5 Pick. 20, 9 Pick. 259, 16 Am. Dec. 373; Collins v. Turner, 2 Taylor's 18 L. R. A.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York, affirming a judgment of a trial term in favor of defendants, in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Edward C. Perkins, for appellants:

The probate of the supposed will of Dr. Talmadge was void, and as there was no other evidence of the existence of a will, the plaintiffs, as his heirs, have title to the premises in question.

Bolton v. Jacks, 6 Robt. 192.

The surrogate had no jurisdiction to prove the will of an inhabitant of another county.

N. Y. Laws 1837, chap. 430, § 1.

The probate record may be impeached collaterally.

The Roderigas Case, 63 N. Y. 460, 20 Am.

Repos. (N. C.) 541; overruled in effect on this point by Smith v. Munroe, supra; Miltenerberger v. Knox, 21 La. Ann. 399; Re Williamson, 3 La. Ann. 261; Griffith v. Wright, 18 Ga. 173; McChord v. Fisher, 13 B. Mon. 138.

But some of these cases at least are distinguishable from those in which the collateral attack is denied on the ground that the appointment was made without any finding of the jurisdictional fact of residence in the county. Thus in the Georgia case of Griffith v. Wright, supra, the decision is put expressly on the ground that the letters do not recite such facts, while the later Georgia case of Tant v. Wigfall, supra, in which the administration is upheld against collateral attack, puts the decision on the ground that the fact of residence was adjudicated and is expressly recited.

And in Moore v. Moore, 38 Neb. 509, letters of administration were held void where the petition therefor did not show the jurisdictional facts that the deceased was an inhabitant of the county in which letters were granted, or that he was a non-resident of the state.

Also in Miller v. Swan, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 632, where the statute makes probate of a will conclusive "except as to the jurisdiction," and residence in the county is necessary to give jurisdiction to probate a will, it is held that the probate may be collaterally questioned on an application for probate in another county, at least if the question of residence was not raised in the first proceeding.

The Massachusetts cases holding that the appointment of an administrator may be attacked collaterally on the ground that the decedent was not a resident of the county have been rendered obsolete in that state by Mass. Pub. Stat., chap. 156, § 4. Cummings v. Hodgdon, 147 Mass. 21.

The great weight of authority is now in favor of holding an appointment of an administrator valid against collateral attack on the ground merely that the decedent was not a resident of the county

Rep. 555, 78 N. Y. 316, 32 Am. Rep. 809, was an attempt to impeach letters of administration issued by the surrogate of New York county, on the ground that the supposed decedent was not dead.

It was admitted that the surrogate was not given jurisdiction to issue letters upon the estate of a living person, and the question before the court was, whether he was given jurisdiction to decide that a living person was dead.

Earl, J. (63 N. Y. p. 466), says: "While the statute gives him no jurisdiction to administer upon the estate of a living person, it imposes upon him the duty of inquiry," etc.

The Jacks Case was, and the case at bar is, an attempt to impeach the probate of a will, on the ground that the supposed testator was not an inhabitant of the county where the will was proved.

It was decided in the Jacks Case that the surrogate had no jurisdiction to admit to probate the will of Dr. Talmadge, he not being an inhabitant of the county; and the question is whether the surrogate had jurisdiction to decide that he was an inhabitant.

The ground of the Roderigas decision is, that the surrogate did have jurisdiction to decide that the supposed intestate was dead, because, and simply and solely because, the statute imposed on the surrogate the duty of determining whether he was dead or not. Consequently it does not follow from that decision that the surrogate had jurisdiction to decide whether Dr. Talmadge was an inhabitant of New York county, unless the statute imposed on him the duty of determining that fact, which it does not.

See 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 74, § 23, relative to letters of administration, and N. Y. Laws 1887, chap. 350, § 1, relative to wills.

Probably no case in the New York Reports has been so severely criticised as the Roderigas Case. Much of this criticism is due to overlooking the fact that the decision turned on the peculiar language of the statute. It shows, however, that so far as a case is concerned to which, like that at bar, no such statute applies, the universal consensus of opinion is, that the jurisdiction can be questioned collaterally.

Thomas v. People, 107 Ill. 517, 47 Am. Rep. 458; Devlin v. Com. 101 Pa. 213, 47 Am. Rep. 710; Lancaster v. Washington L. Ins. Co. of New York City, 62 Mo. 12; Lavin v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank, 18 Blatchf. 5; Administration of Estates of Living Persons, 21 Alb. L. J. 65; D'Arusment v. Jones, 22 Alb. L. J. 281; Melia v. Simmons, 45 Wis. 384; Redfield, Surrogates, 48, 49 note 1; Jochumsen v. Suffolk Sav. Bank, 8 Allen, 87; Holyoke v. Haskins, 5 Pick. 20, 16 Am. Rep. 372; 9 Pick. 259; Duncan v. Stewart, 25 Ala. 408, 60 Am. Dec. 527; Morgan v. Dodge, 44 N. H. 259, 83 Am. Dec. 213; Cutts v. Haskins, 9 Mass. 547; Griffith v. Frazier, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 9, 3 L. ed. 471.

The subject-matter over which each surrogate had jurisdiction in 1841 was the probate if the fact of such residence is expressly or impliedly found as a condition precedent to making the appointment.

But if it appears on the records of the court that the necessary fact of residence did not exist the appointment is void on collateral attack. Moore v. Philbrick, 32 Me. 102, 52 Am. Dec. 642.

Existence of assets in county.

On substantially the same grounds as residence in the county stands the jurisdictional fact of assets in the county. On this question also most of the decisions hold that a finding of the court as a condition of the appointment of an administrator that there are assets in the county is not subject to collateral attack. Epping v. Robinson, 21 Fla. 36; Weir v. Monahan, 67 Miss. 424; O'Connor v. Huggins, 113 N. Y. 512; Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh, 119, 53 Am. Dec. 227; Andrews v. Avory, 14 Gratt. 229, 73 Am. Dec. 355; Re Shoenberger's Estate, 139 Pa. 133; Lees v. Wetmore, 58 Iowa, 170; Murphy v. Creighton, 45 Iowa, 179.

But to the contrary it has been held in other cases that the appointment of an administrator of a non-resident may be attacked collaterally on the ground that there were no assets within the jurisdiction. Thumb v. Gresham, 2 Met. (Ky.) 306; Crosby v. Leavitt, 4 Allen, 410.

But in the last case the lack of assets was apparent on the records.

Administration of the estate of a living person.

Almost without exception the decisions of the courts have declared that administration on the estate of a live man as that of a decedent is utterly void. Duncan v. Stewart, 25 Ala. 408, 60 Am. Dec. 527; Stevenson v. San Francisco City & County Superior Ct. 62 Cal. 60; Thomas v. People, 107 Ill. 517, 47 Am. Rep. 458; D'Arusment v. Jones, 4 Lea, 251, 40 Am. Rep. 12; State v. White, 29 N. C. 116; Devlin v. Com. 101 Pa. 213, 47 Am. Rep. 710; Jochumsen v. 18 L. R. A.

Suffolk Sav. Bank, 3 Allen, 87; Lavin v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank, 18 Blatchf. 5; United States v. Payne, 4 Dill. 387; Melia v. Simmons, 45 Wis. 384, 30 Am. Rep. 748; Moore v. Smith, 11 Rich. L. 559, 73 Am. Dec. 122.

In Roderigas v. East River Sav. Inst., 63 N. Y. 459, 20 Am. Rep. 555, a decision was made by four judges against three that the grant of letters of administration under the New York statute giving the surrogate power to determine the fact of death was not void on collateral attack although the supposed decedent proved to be alive. This decision attempts to distinguish other cases to the contrary on the ground that the New York statute required an express determination of the fact of death by the surrogate. But as substantially the same is required by statutes in other states the sharp conflict between the New York decision and those in other jurisdictions is not explained by statutory provisions.

The later Roderigas Case, 76 N. Y. 316, 32 Am. Rep. 309, held that letters of administration were subject to collateral attack on the ground that the supposed decedent was alive where there had been no actual determination of the fact of death by the surrogate but the letters were issued by the clerk on a blank signed by the surrogate without any such protection.

But even where such determination is judicially made by the surrogate it is held by the circuit court of the United States that such determination is not due process of law as to the supposed decedent who is not a party to the proceedings; and therefore that such adjudication cannot deprive him of his property, and vest it in an administrator. Lavin v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank, 18 Blatchf. 5.

Here seems to be a valid ground of distinction between the effect of a judicial determination of the fact of death and that of other jurisdictional facts. Considered merely as findings of jurisdic-of wills of deceased persons, inhabitants of his county, or otherwise coming within one of the subdivisions of section 1 of the Act of 1887.

The Revised Statutes in force at the time of Dr. Talmadge's death appointed separate and entirely independent courts, one for each county, and they provided that each of them should have power "to take proof of wills of real and personal estate in the cases provided by law," (N. Y. Rev. Stat. 28th ed. p. 153, pt. 3, chap. 2, title 1, § 1); and these cases are provided in the Act of 1887, which further adds, that in such cases the jurisdiction shall be exclusive of that of any other surrogate.

The statute, therefore, prescribes that "certain facts" (in this case the fact of inhabitancy) "must exist before jurisdiction can attach," and there is no room for implication that it attaches to any more general subject, and includes the power to pass upon those "certain facts" itself.

tional facts there is no clear and satisfactory distinction to be made between a finding of the fact of death and that of residence or of the existence of assets within the jurisdiction. But when a supposed intestate is in fact alive, the finding by the probate court that he was dead and administration of his estate based thereon made in proceedings to which he was not a party and of which he had no notice seem clearly void as to him because depriving him of his property without due process of law.

The Roderigas Case stands alone so far as it holds administration on the estate of a live person to be valid as against him, but in Plume v. Howard Sav. Inst., 46 N. J. L. 211, a decree appointing an administrator after a judicial determination of the fact of death is held to be valid as against any collateral attack on the ground that the decision is not justified by the evidence where the objection is raised by a savings bank against which the administrator brings an action for money due the estate.

So in Louisiana it is held that a judicial determination that a person is dead made on appointing an administrator for him is not subject to collateral attack by a third person in a suit by the administrator. Davis v. Greve, 82 La. Ann. 420.

And the fact that an administrator has been appointed is not conclusive proof of the death of a person in an action to recover insurance upon his life. Lancaster v. Washington L. Ins. Co. of New York City, 61 Mo. 121; Tisdale v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 28 Iowa, 170, 96 Am. Dec. 136.

In Re Napier, 1 Phillim. 83, on the appearance of a supposed intestate for whom letters of administration had been granted the administrator voluntarily surrendered the letters and the court revoked the appointment.

Conflict of jurisdiction.

By the grant of probate the jurisdiction of a court is exhausted for that purpose and a second grant of general letters of administration of the same state is utterly void. Ryno v. Ryno, 27 N. J. Eq. 522.

Letters of administration a. t. a. are held void when granted in another county after the first letters had been granted in the county of the testator's residence. Johnson v. Corpenning, 30 N. C. 218.

The court in this case declared that letters would be void if granted in any county except that of the testator's residence. But see Smith v. Munroe, 23 N. C. 345.

Administration "shall be void if granted by an incompetent authority."

Residence was jurisdictional.

The United States courts take cognizance of certain causes by reason only of the fact that the parties are residents of different states or counties.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 493.

In Voss v. Morton, 4 Cush. 27, 50 Am. Dec.

One valid assumption of jurisdiction by the court in respect to administration makes the subsequent appointment of an administrator by another court void. Oh Chow v. Brookway, 21 Or. 440.

The appointment in another county is the bar to the appointment of an administrator in the county of the decedent's residence. Coltart v. Allen, 40 Ala. 155, 88 Am. Dec. 757.

So probate in another county cannot be collaterally attacked even in the county in which the proceedings should have been taken. Johnson v. Gaines, 1 Coldw. 238.

And the pendency of probate proceedings in another county will defeat the jurisdiction of a surrogate. Re Buckley, 41 Hun, 106.

After administration has been closed the second grant of administration to another person is void. Withers v. Patterson, 27 Tex. 491, 86 Am. Dec. 643.

The grant of ancillary letters to a nonresident on the representation that the decedent was a nonresident of the state but was a resident of the state in which the original letters were granted will not defeat the jurisdiction of the court in another county in which the decedent actually resided at the time of his death to appoint an administrator. Frick's App. 114 Pa. 29.

Lapse of time.

A grant of administration contrary to the express terms of a statute more than twenty years after the death of a person is void. Rice v. Henly, 90 Tenn. 69; Wales v. Willard, 2 Mass. 120.

But in the absence of any such statute such appointment is not open to collateral attack because of the length of time that had elapsed. Martin v. Robinson, 67 Tex. 368.

Miscellaneous.

The jurisdiction of the register in Pennsylvania to probate a will may be attacked collaterally if the so-called will probated was not executed. Wall v. Wall, 123 Pa. 545.

The want of interest in the proponent of a will is not a ground for collateral attack of the probate. Morford v. Dieffenbacher, 54 Mich. 593.

In Vermont the general doctrine is declared that the jurisdiction of a court to appoint an administrator cannot be collaterally attacked. McFarland v. Stone, 17 Vt. 165, 44 Am. Dec. 825; Driggs v. Abbott, 27 Vt. 580, 65 Am. Dec. 214; Abbott v. Coburn, 28 Vt. 663, 67 Am. Dec. 735.

The ground of attack in the two cases last cited was that the decedent was a nonresident of the state.

R. A. R.

750, Shaw, Ch. J., held a judgment of the United States circuit court to be void, because he found as a matter of fact that the parties were not citizens of different states.

Mr. Edward W. S. Johnston, for respondents:

The decree of the surrogate admitting this will to probate cannot be attacked collaterally in this proceeding.

The rule laid down in Bolton v. Jacks, 6 Robt. 166, that a finding of the surrogate in the proceedings presented to him as to the residence of the said testator is not judicial, and that the judgment founded upon such findings can be attacked collaterally in this respect, has been overruled expressly in Roderigas v. East River Sav. Inst. 68 N. Y. 460, 20 Am. Rep. 555.

See also Boller v. New York, 8 Jones & S. 533.

The supreme court in Monell v. Dennison, 8 Abb. Pr. 401, passing upon the Law of 1837 and upon the identical facts in issue here, has held that where the jurisdiction of a subordinate tribunal having cognizance of the general subject has attached by the presentation of a verified prima facie case and by appearance of the parties, e. g., in the case of proceedings before the surrogate's court attacking probate of the will even upon a quasi jurisdictional fact such as that of inhabitation, its decision is conclusive unless reversed on appeal.

The supreme court also in Bolton v. Brewster, 82 Barb. 389, passes upon the identical facts in issue herein, and holds that general jurisdiction being given to the surrogate's court (vide Laws 1837, chap. 460, pp. 1, 5, § 1), jurisdiction depends upon facts which must be brought before the court for its determination upon evidence, and it is required to act upon such evidence (Laws 1837, chap. 460, § 5), its decision upon the question of his jurisdiction is conclusive until reversed, revoked, or vacated, so far as to protect its officers and all innocent persons who act upon the faith of it.

See also Bumstead v. Read, 81 Barb. 661.

If the surrogate had refused upon the petition before him to admit the will to probate, the executor upon applying could have procured a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the surrogate to admit the will to probate.

The surrogate having made a finding of fact that the testator was an inhabitant of the county of New York, this decree cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding of this kind, the remedies for the parties being solely in the surrogate's court.

Kelly v. West, 80 N. Y. 144; Harrison v. Clark, 14 N. Y. Week. Dig. 136; Re Harvey, 8 Redf. 216.

eral proceeding resolves itself into two classes; first, cases where the evidence offered to attack a judgment shows that the evidence or facts upon which such judgment was rendered could not by any possibility have existed; then such judgment is void; and, second, where the evidence offered goes merely to contradict the evidence upon which the judgment was rendered, in which case the judgment cannot be attacked collaterally, the remedy being by appeal or by motion in the court where the judgment was entered to vacate the same.

In the case at bar the evidence here goes merely to contradict the evidence submitted by the verified petition before the surrogate.

Where the jurisdiction of an inferior court depends upon the existence of a fact which it is required to settle by its decision, such decision is conclusive against the collateral attack.

Montgomery v. Wasem, 116 Ind. 343.

In Power v. Speckman, 126 N. Y. 354, and O'Connor v. Huggins, 113 N. Y. 512, it is expressly held that the appointment of executors and administrators cannot be attacked collaterally.

An order of a probate court granting administration in the county in which it sits, although erroneous by reason of the nonresidence of the decedent, is not for that reason void, but voidable only, and can only be attacked by a direct proceeding for that purpose in the court in which it was granted, or upon an appeal from such order.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of a lot of land on Tenth avenue between Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth streets in the city of New York. The land belonged at the time of his death to one Theodore B. Talmadge, who died in January, 1841. Mr. Talmadge is the common source of title, the plaintiffs claiming as his heirs-at-law, while the defendants claim through his will, which in May, 1841, was proved before the surrogate of the county of New York, and letters granted to the executor named therein. It is claimed by plaintiffs that Mr. Talmadge died in the county of Columbia, and that at the time of his death he was not an inhabitant of New York county, and the surrogate of that county had no jurisdiction to take proof of the will, or to grant letters testamentary thereon; and, as there was no other proof of the execution of the will, the defendants made out no title to the land, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover it as heirs-at-law of Talmadge. There was a hearing before the New York surrogate, and a judicial investigation, and the result was the judgment or decree admitting the will to probate. The infant daughters of the testator appeared on this investigation by guardian appointed by the surrogate. This judgment, now over 50 years old, is assailed by the plaintiff, and, if it can be successfully attacked in this collateral manner, it may follow that the defendants, by reason of this great lapse of time, will have no means of proving the will, and thus will have no defense to interpose to the plaintiffs' claim, although they have relied upon the sufficiency of a judgment over half a century old, decreeing that the will of Mr. Talmadge was properly proved, and under which their mediate grantor (Mr. Talmadge's executor) had power to convey the land in dispute. The petition of the executor named in the will to the surrogate of New York alleged that the deceased was at or immediately previous to his death an inhabitant of the county of New York, by means of which the proving of the will belonged to such surrogate. The surrogate, in admitting the will to probate and issuing letters testamentary to the executor, in effect decided the fact of inhabitancy, for it was a fact necessary for the surrogate to decide before admitting the will to probate or granting letters, and his decision of that fact, based upon evidence having a legal tendency to support it, ought, it would seem, on general principles to stand until reversed or set aside, even though it were erroneous.

Much of the general importance which might otherwise attach to the decision of this question is taken from it by reason of legislation upon the subject. In 1870 an Act was passed which applied to judgments of surrogates' court in New York county, and in 1880 a similar Act was passed in regard to those courts in all the other counties of the state. Laws 1870, chap. 859; Code Civ. Proc. § 2473. These Acts provided, in substance, that the objection to the jurisdiction of such judgments should not be taken collaterally. We are of opinion that in a case like the present the same rule obtains which has been authoritatively declared as to future cases by the statutes cited. Under these circumstances, we do not feel called upon to enter into any detailed and extended discussion of the grounds for our decision. It is unnecessary to go as far in order to uphold the decision of the courts below as the court went in the decision of the first Roderigas Case, 68 N. Y. 460, 20 Am. Rep. 555. This case differs from that in the main and important fact that there was here an estate of a deceased person to administer upon. Mr. Talmadge died in the state of New York and at the time of his death he was an inhabitant thereof. In the Roderigas Case letters were issued to an administrator upon the estate of a living man, but who was, in effect, declared by the judgment to be dead. We think that where the individual died an inhabitant of the state, by reason of which there was in fact an estate to be administered upon, and the only question is which of the surrogates' courts should act, there is in that case jurisdiction over the subject-matter,—that is, over the administering upon the estate of a deceased person dying an inhabitant of the state; and which surrogate is to exercise such jurisdiction depends upon the fact as to which county deceased was an inhabitant of at the time of his death. The decision of such question where evidence is given, and upon a hearing of the parties, ought to be, and, we think, is, conclusive upon any collateral attack. Under our statute as to proof of wills, although it does not in terms provide that the petition shall state, or that the surrogate shall inquire and decide, as to the fact of inhabitancy, yet we think the fair implication arising from a perusal of the whole statute upon the subject is that the surrogate has power, and is bound, before admitting the will to probate or issuing letters, to institute the inquiry, and to decide upon the fact of inhabitancy. Laws 1887, chap. 460, §§ 4, 5 et seq. As the surrogate is directed to inquire as to the names and places of residence of the heirs of the testator, the implication is a necessity that he must first inquire whether there was a testator. Within the meaning of this statute, there could be no testator if there were no deceased person; neither could there be any heirs of one who was then alive. The surrogate is to take proof of these facts where the testator died an inhabitant. Section 1 of above cited Act. He must, therefore, as part of his statutory duty, inquire as to that fact of inhabitancy before taking the proof of the will. Another statute authorizes the surrogate to issue subpoenas, and take testimony in all matters material to any inquiry pending in his court. 2 Rev. Stat. p. 221, § 6. The duty to investigate and decide upon the fact of inhabitancy is necessarily and naturally to be implied from the whole provisions of the statute relating to wills and their probate, and such duty is to be performed before the will is admitted, or letters issued. If no contest is made, and there is no evidence upon the subject of the inhabitancy of the testator, one way or the other, except the sworn allegation in the petition, I do not see why the surrogate may not rely upon the fact so stated. Whether, when the fact thus appears in the sworn petition addressed to the surrogate, such fact shall be re-sworn to by the petitioner, or some one else, upon an oath administered by the surrogate himself, is a matter which, as it seems to us, is not of a jurisdictional nature. The surrogate may regard the oath taken to the petition as sufficient prima facie evidence, although the statute does not in terms require the fact of inhabitancy to be stated in the petition. If it be so stated and sworn to, and no evidence is offered on the other side, and no issue raised as to the truth of the allegation in any manner or form, the decision of the surrogate should be regarded as conclusive, subject only to attack by a direct proceeding to review it. It might happen that, where there is evidence pro and con., the decision would appear to be erroneous, and for that reason it ought to be reversed; but unless a direct attack be made upon it, the judgment should remain. This is upon the principle that the surrogate must decide upon some evidence the fact of inhabitancy before he can go further, and when he does so decide, although erroneously, the decision must stand until reversed.

The nature of a judgment which admits a will to probate is somewhat similar to that of one in rem. The res which the court takes into its hands for purposes of administration as representative of the state is the property which was once possessed and owned by the deceased, who died an inhabitant of the state. Civilized states have for generations past recognized their obligations to specially protect that kind of property. That obligation arises the moment the death occurs. The obligation assumed has been not only that of protection of the property, but also that of the distribution thereof to those who are living, and who come within the rules of law governing the subject. How great the right of testamentary disposition should be, and under what rules and regulations it should be permitted, are questions which have been differently decided by different nations, and by the same nations at different times. Such rights are matters of municipal regulation. The right to inherit from or to receive by gift under the will of a deceased person is recognized and protected by the state, and from the fact of such recognition and protection the state owes the duty to see to it that the estate of a deceased person shall pass in accordance with the law which obtains in the state when the death occurs. To prevent contention, and to achieve a peaceful distribution of the estate under the rules of law, and to protect the rights of the creditors of the deceased, all civilized states have created tribunals of a judicial nature, whose function and duty it is to represent and exercise the powers of the state in the course of administration, and whose judgments determine the rights of the respective parties interested in the property as such rights are made to appear. The general jurisdiction over matters of this nature belongs to the state itself by reason of its general sovereignty. The practical exercise of the jurisdiction is vested in the so-called courts of probate or surrogates' courts. In construing the language of the statute creating such courts, the fact must continually be borne in mind that the state is creating a tribunal or tribunals for the purpose of fulfilling its general obligations to all its inhabitants to protect and distribute according to law that which was once the property of one of their own number. That obligation is as broad as the sovereignty of the state itself. In the organization of the tribunals which are to exercise this jurisdiction, although the language of the statute may create a separate and distinct tribunal for each county in the state, and upon certain facts grant jurisdiction to one of them to the exclusion of all others, yet the facts upon which the jurisdiction is given to the court of one county instead of to another are merely incidental, partaking somewhat of the character of matters of procedure, the main fact being the actual death of an individual who at the time of his death was an inhabitant of the state. That is the jurisdictional fact upon the existence of which is founded the duty of the state to protect and distribute the property according to law. Whether one or the other of the surrogates' courts in the various counties shall administer upon the estate, and thus fulfill the obligation which lies with the state itself, is a question which the Legislature has provided for, and it depends, among other things, upon the fact of inhabitancy. This fact the surrogate to whom the matter is presented must decide, and if he decide that it exists, and upon evidence which legally tends to support his decision, under such circumstances we think it ought to stand until reversed. This is believed to be the general rule. It is a matter of very trifling importance, except upon the mere question of convenience which of such surrogates' courts shall take the proof as to the due execution of the will, and grant letters testamentary thereon. For the purpose of the orderly administration of the estates of deceased persons who died inhabitants of our state the Legislature has provided certain rules governing the subject, and has also provided certain conditions upon which the power of a surrogate to take jurisdiction of the matter depends. The subject-matter, however, of the jurisdiction is the administration of the estates of deceased persons, and over this subject-matter the state has granted to the surrogate of each county general jurisdiction. It is to be exercised upon various conditions, as was said by Church, Ch. J., in the second Roderigas Case, 76 N. Y. 816, 32 Am. Rep. 309, dependent upon the residence and the like; and the decision of the surrogate of one county, after a hearing of the parties upon the question whether the case calling for the exercise of the jurisdiction of his court or the surrogate's court of some other county exists or not, should be conclusive in all collateral proceedings. The jurisdiction to administer is bestowed upon each surrogate to the exclusion of all others where the facts exist which are named in the statute. It is granted to him, however, out of the general and complete jurisdiction resting with the state over the entire subject of administration upon the estates of deceased inhabitants, and that general jurisdiction has been exercised by the state in the creation of a tribunal in each county for such purpose of administration; and when the question of jurisdiction arises before one of such courts where the deceased died an inhabitant of the state, and the right of administration attaches to the surrogate's court of some county, it must, in the nature of things, be decided by the surrogate before whom it comes; and, being matter incidental only in its nature, the decision of the surrogate, founded upon some evidence, must be conclusive, even though erroneous, except upon a direct review. I am aware that much has been written by the courts of the various states upon these questions of jurisdiction of courts of probate and the conclusiveness of their judgments. Decisions both ways have been reached. Criticisms have also been made in regard to the decision of the first Roderigas Case. It is not needful to refer to them or to again renew the discussion, which, as to this state, was ended by the decision in that case. The question is alluded to and the various cases cited in the first volume of the treatise on the American Law of Administration by I. C. Woerner, § 208 et seq., and notes.

There is, in the nature of things, a broad distinction between the case of the granting of letters of administration upon the estate of one not in fact dead, and the granting of letters upon the estate of one who was at the time of his death an inhabitant of the state, but not of the county where the will was proved, although the surrogate, upon some evidence, erroneously decided that he was. It is quite unnecessary and wholly unprofitable to enlarge upon it here. We do not intend by this decision to attack the principle or to shake the authority of the first Roderigas Case, supra, for we simply say it is not necessary to here go so far as that case goes. In the opinions delivered in the two Roderigas cases will be found much of the learning on this subject, and a citation to most of the decided cases then reported and bearing upon the question. In this record we think it appears that there was evidence enough to call upon the surrogate of New York to decide upon the question of the inhabitancy of Mr. Talmadge, and the surrogate, by admitting the will to probate, and issuing letters testamentary, did in fact decide that Mr. Talmadge was at the time of his death an inhabitant of New York county, and this conclusion must, in such an attack as this, be a bar to a reopening of that question. This view of the main issue involved in this case calls for the affirmance of the judgment. In Bolton v. Jacks, 6 Robt. 166, a contrary result was arrived at by the superior court of New York in a very elaborate and learned opinion. With many of the views therein expressed as to the right to question a judgment rendered without jurisdiction we entirely concur, but for the reasons above given we think they are inapplicable to the particular facts of this case.

Upon this appeal the plaintiffs seek to review the order granting an extra allowance of costs to the defendants. The ground of the appeal is that a new trial herein was taken by plaintiffs under the section of the Code (section 1525) granting such right as of course upon payment of costs, and that included in the costs which plaintiffs paid when availing themselves of the right to a new trial was the amount of an extra allowance granted by the court after the former trial. The plaintiffs contend that but one extra allowance can be collected in the same action. This precise question has already been determined adversely to the plaintiffs' view in the case of Wing v. De La Rionda, 181 N. Y. 422.

We have considered the other questions raised by the appellants, but we do not think that any error prejudicial to them appears in the record.

The whole judgment must be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Gray, J., taking no part.

v.

Trustees of GRAND LODGE OF ANCIENT ORDER OF UNITED WORKMEN of the State of Wisconsin et al., Receipts.

(.....Wis.....)

A joint tenancy in the beneficiaries of a mutual benefit society is created where the whole sum without any direction for division is made payable to two persons named, and on the death of one of them during the life of the insured the other takes the whole amount of the benefits.

(November 15, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Eau Claire County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a mutual benefit certificate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wickham & Farr, for appellants:

The death of Ida B. Peck revoked her appointment as a beneficiary, and when no other direction is made the laws of the society control the disposition of the funds.

Given v. Wisconsin O. F. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 71 Wis. 547; Riley v. Riley, 75 Wis. 464.

Mrs. Farr is entitled to the full amount named in the certificate: first, by virtue of the direction in the certificate; and secondly, by virtue of the laws of the society.

If both beneficiaries had survived the insured, both would have been, as against the defendant, entitled to the whole amount, but death having revoked the appointment of one, her name became eliminated from the certificate which now reads that $2,000 "shall at his death be paid to his daughter, May," she being the only person competent to receive it who has been selected by the insured. She is, as against the defendant, entitled to recover the whole amount.

The society contracted to pay the whole amount to both of them—not one half to each of them.

One who is entitled to recover at all must be entitled to recover the whole amount.

As a surviving joint obligee, plaintiff is entitled to recover the whole amount.

The law is analogous to the law relating to legacies and devises, where on the death of a joint legatee or devisee the survivor is entitled to the whole amount.

The constitution of the society provides that in case one beneficiary shall die during the lifetime of the member, the survivor should be entitled to the fund.

Respondents, however, claim that because of the use of the word "shall" this provision was not intended to apply to this case, as Ida B. Peck died before this provision was passed.

In this case Mr. Peck by failing to appoint a new beneficiary signified his satisfaction with this law of the society.

Riley v. Riley, 75 Wis. 464.

Mr. John A. Daniels, for respondents:

The common law favored title by joint tenancy, by reason of the right of survivorship. Its policy was adverse to the division of tenures, because it tended to multiply the feudal services, and weaken the efficacy of that connection.

But Lord Hardwicke observed, in the case of Hawes v. Hawes, 1 Wils. 165, that the reason of that policy had ceased with the abolition of tenures.

In this country the title by joint tenancy is very much reduced in extent, and the incident of survivorship is still more extensively destroyed, except where it is proper and necessary as in the case of titles held by trustees.

4 Kent, Com. 12th ed. 361.

Survivorship on the principle of joint tenancy is contrary to the genius of our institutions, and was in effect, abrogated by the course of descents prescribed by the ordinance of 1787, organizing this great northwestern territory.

Sergeant v. Steinberger, 2 Ohio, 305, 15 Am. Dec. 553.

In cases of policies of insurance, or benefit certificates, issued by mutual benefit societies, the beneficiary has no vested interest in the certificate until the death of the insured member.

Sabin v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 28 N. Y. S. R. 45; Clark v. Durand, 12 Wis. 223; Foster v. Gile, 50 Wis. 603; Richmond v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 447.

Now, if Mrs. Ida B. Peck, being a sole beneficiary and dying before her husband, did not have such an interest in the certificate as would go to her administrator and form a part of her estate, how could she, under the same conditions, being a beneficiary joined with another, have such an interest as would go to her co-beneficiary?

Unless the policy points out to whom the insurance money shall be paid in case the beneficiary dies before the insured, the appointment of the beneficiary is revoked by his death.

Given v. Wisconsin O. F. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 71 Wis. 550; Foster v. Gile, supra; Riley v. Riley, 75 Wis. 464; Arthur v. Odd Fellow's Ben. Assn. 29 Ohio St. 557.

There is no direction in the constitution or by-laws under which Mr. Peck's certificate was issued, as to how or in what manner the fund shall be distributed in case the direction made by the insured shall have been for any cause revoked.

Therefore, the $1,000 in dispute here, after the death of the wife Ida B. reverted back to Mr. Peck freed from any beneficial appointment, and at his death became a part of his estate and should go to the administrator.

The revision of the constitution made ten years after the certificate issued, cannot govern and control the disposition of the fund to be paid on this certificate.

Morrison v. Wisconsin O. F. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 59 Wis. 165; Riley v. Riley, supra.

A corporation has not capacity, as the legislative power from which it derives its existence has not competency, by laws of its own enactment, to disturb or divest rights which it has created, or to impair the obligation of its contracts, or to change its responsibilities to its members, or to draw them into new and distinct relations.

If this new article could affect or control this certificate at all, it must lay hold of and act upon it in precisely the condition in which it stood at the time of adopting that article.

Mrs. Peck was dead and her interest had gone back to the source from whence it sprang. To make her a joint beneficiary with the daughter, it would be necessary to bring her to life again which the article was powerless to do even if Mr. Peck had contracted it might be done.

The new rule could not be retroactive.

State v. Atwood, 11 Wis. 423.

Orton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 28th day of March, 1879, A. C. Peck became a member of the subordinate Banner Lodge No. 17, at the city of Eau Claire, by virtue of a certificate of insurance duly issued by the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen of the State of Wisconsin to the said A. C. Peck, by which said grand lodge promised and agreed, for a valuable consideration, to pay at the death of said A. C. Peck, according to the laws of the order, the sum of $2,000 to Oda B. Peck, the wife, and to Anna May Peck, the daughter, of said A. C. Peck, (since intermarried with the co-plaintiff J. F. Farr.) On or about the 8th day of March, 1881, the said Oda B. Peck died. After her death the said A. C. Peck intermarried with the defendant Mary E. Peck, by whom he had one child, now living; and on the 1st day of March, 1891, the said A. C. Peck died. The defendant the grand lodge paid to the plaintiff Anna May Farr one half of said $2,000 on her giving bond, but refused, on demand, to pay her the other half of it; and she now demands the $2,000 by right of survivorship, on the death of her mother, as a joint tenant, or joint beneficiary of the insurance. This being the controlling question in the case, no other need be considered. It will be observed that the whole insurance of $2,000 is made payable to both Oda B. and Anna May Peck as an entirety. Since the death of Oda B., the grand lodge has so changed and amended its constitution and laws that the whole insurance in such a case shall go and be paid to the surviving beneficiary. It is claimed by the learned counsel of the appellants that such amendment has the legal effect to control the direction of this insurance. Although it is not necessary to consider that question, it may be said that the grand lodge has at least approved in this way the policy of such a principle of law. The learned circuit court, after finding the facts, found as a conclusion of law that upon the death of Oda B. Peck before the death of the insured the appointment of her as a beneficiary became and was revoked, and the interest in the fund she would have been entitled to receive if she had survived the insured lapsed and reverted to the estate of A. C. Peck at his death, no other direction having been made by him. Judgment was entered dismissing the plaintiff's action with costs, without prejudice to the right of the administrator of the estate of Alderson C. Peck to recover the amount remaining unpaid of such insurance.

presented unusually able briefs on the important questions involved in this case, and the court is greatly aided by their cogent arguments and the authorities cited in deciding the question upon which the case depends. The question whether this benefit insurance is made payable to the wife and daughter as an entirety or in severalty as tenants in common or as joint tenants is somewhat difficult of solution. It must be determined by its analogy to the terms "tenancy in common and joint tenancy" in respect to realty and at common law. They may be said to have the same nature and incidents. There may be joint tenancy of personalities, and, like the properties of a joint estate, they are derived from its unity, which is fourfold,—of interest, title, time, and possession. Each of the joint tenants must have the entire possession as well of every parcel as of the whole. Where a horse is given to two persons, they are joint tenants. Martin v. Smith, 5 Binn. 18, 6 Am. Dec. 395. "A joint tenancy is where they have the same interest, arising from the same conveyance, commencing at the same time, and held by one and the same undivided possession. On the death of one, the entire tenancy remains to the surviving cotenants, and not to the heirs of the deceased." 2 Bl. Com. 180. This insurance, payable to two persons, has all the essential characteristics of a joint tenancy, without any words or reasons appearing to indicate an intention to make it payable in severalty, or to have it go to heirs, or to revert to the assured or to his estate, on the death of one of the beneficiaries. The assured lived about ten years after the death of his wife,—one of the beneficiaries,—and made no change in the direction as to whom the insurance should go, but in the mean time procured another insurance of $5,000 for the benefit of his second wife, Mary E. Peck, his present widow. He must be presumed to have known the law, and that his daughter was entitled to the whole insurance on the death of his wife, and assented to such a construction of the policy. In a majority of the old states the jus accrescendi or right of survivorship in such a case has been abolished by statute without any exceptions. Most of the cases at common law relate to estates and devises. The unity of possession is the essential feature, so that, if an estate has been conveyed in parcenary, and one of the tenants seeks to destroy the unity by a conveyance of his interest, it is a question whether such a deed is not a nullity. White v. Sayre, 2 Ohio, 116. "Where an estate is given to several persons jointly, without any expressions indicating an intention that it shall be divided among them, it must be construed a joint tenancy." Martin v. Smith, supra. "When by the terms of a will there is an estate in joint tenancy at common law, and one or more of the tenants die in the lifetime of the testator, the principle of the common law applies, and the survivor takes the whole estate." Ball v. Deas, 2 Strobb. Eq. 24, 49 Am. Dec. 651. Such is the law in all cases of devise or bequest. Downing v. Marshall, 23 N. Y. 386, 80 Am. Dec. 290.

This is sufficient to show the strictness of the doctrine at common law, especially as to devises. This leads us to the consideration of our own statute on the subject of joint tenants. Our statute (Rev. Stat. § 2068) provides that "all grants and devises of lands made to two or more persons, except as provided in the following section, shall be construed to create estates in common, and not in joint tenancy, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy." The following section is that "the preceding section shall not apply to mortgages, nor to devises or grants made in trust, or made to executors or to husband and wife." It will be seen that our statute makes many important exceptions, which save the doctrine of the common law in respect to the subjects named. This shows at least that there is nothing in our principles of government or policies of law opposed to the principle or doctrine of survivorship in joint tenancy in such cases. We are more immediately concerned with joint tenancy in devises. On the principle of analogy, if devises to joint tenants with the ius accrescendi are lawful, so are legacies of personalities. They are substantially alike, and within the same reason, and they have been decided to be within the doctrine of the common law. Jackson v. Roberts, 14 Gray, 546; Stires v. Van Rensselaer, 2 Bradf. Sur. 172; 2 Redf. Wills, 175.

We may say, therefore, that legacies come within the exceptions of our statute, and that, when made to two joint legatees, without any words to indicate a severance of their interests, if one die, the survivor takes the whole legacy. The analogy between legacies and the benefits secured by a certificate or policy of a benefit insurance company or of a common life insurance company, when the insurance is payable to two or more persons jointly on the death of the assured, is still closer. The assured, like a testator, makes provision in writing for his wife and children, to be enjoyed on his death. He can change the direction of his bounty during his life. So far as the doctrine of joint tenancy and survivorship are concerned, they are strictly within the same reason. And so it has been held in respect to life insurance, if made for the benefit of a wife and children, the last survivor takes the whole. Robinson v. Duvall, 79 Ky. 83, 42 Am. Rep. 208. And so as to a fire insurance policy, made to two persons jointly. Northrup v. Phillips, 99 Ill. 449. The same doctrine is held in respect to benefit insurance similar to that of this case. Day v. Case, 43 Hun, 179; Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Hoffman, 110 Ill. 603. See also Bacon, Benefit Societies, § 264. And so we conclude that this insurance in joint tenancy with the right of survivorship is within the exception of our own statute in analogy to devises, and that the doctrine of the common law governs it. This is a new question in this state, but we are satisfied that the application of this doctrine to this case is within reason and the authorities. We are not called upon to vindicate the policy of this doctrine, any more than to vindicate the exceptions of our own statute. This being decisive of the case, no other question will be considered. The question of interest, we think, was properly disposed of by the circuit court. There was no unreasonable delay of payment, as found by the court, and there is no fund to meet any such demand. The costs will go with the reversal of the judgment.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to render judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in accordance with this opinion.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

BUCKEYE MARBLE & FREESTONE CO., Appt.,

v.

James W. HARVEY.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A purchase of shares of a domestic corporation by a foreign corporation

NOTE.—Power of corporation to deal in the stock of other corporations, or in its own.

1. Power to deal in the shares of other corporations.

In England it is now settled that one corporation may deal in the shares of another without express authority to do so, unless where expressly prohibited, or the nature of its business renders it improper so to deal. Re Barnard's Bkg. Co. L. R. 8 Ch. 105; Re Asiatic Bkg. Co. L. R. 4 Ch. 252; Green's Bkce, Ultra Vires, 92.

And this rule has been followed in Maryland. Elysaville Mfg. Co. v. Oksko County, 1 Md. Ch. 392, affirmed on appeal in 5 Md. 152; Booth v. Robinson, 55 Md. 434.

But in most of the states in this country the rule 18 L. R. A.

(October 31, 1892.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Knox County dismissing its bill filed to compel defendant to comply with his agreement to satisfy a portion of the judgments obtained against the McMillan Marble Company. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Green & Shields for appellant.

Mr. W. C. Kain for appellee.

Lurton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant is an Ohio corporation, and was organized, under the general incorporation law of that state, "for the purpose of cutting, dressing, manufacturing, selling, and disposing of marble, stone, slate, granite, and other substances, with such other incidental and necessary powers essential to carrying on said business." This company, with its place of business in Cincinnati, Ohio, has acquired the entire issues of shares made by a Tennessee corporation engaged in a similar business, and under a similar charter, and known as the McMillan Marble Company. Its last acquisition of shares was under a contract with the defendant, who was president of the Tennessee company, and who owned at the time of the sale 25 shares, being one half of the entire stock of the company. These shares he conveyed to a trustee selected by the purchasing corporation, for its use and benefit. The consideration for the sale was the payment of $6,000, the defendant assuming and agreeing to personally pay and discharge one half of all liability which might be fixed upon the McMillan Marble Company as a result of certain suits against that company then pending in the courts of this state. The bill alleges, and the evidence establishes, that the complainant company has been compelled, in order to protect the property of the McMillan Marble Company, to pay out about the sum of $3,000 in the settlement and satisfaction of the claims in suit at time of its contract with defendant. The relief sought is a decree against defendant for one half this sum, being the proportion he agreed to pay under the agreement of sale. The defense is that the contract of sale to the complainant company was unlawful and void,—that is to say, that the purchase of these shares was outside the object of its creation, as defined in its charter, and is therefore such a contract as is not only voidable, but wholly void, and of no legal effect; that it is not a case of excessive use of power granted, but that no power whatever was conferred to deal in or hold the shares of another corporation; that the suit is one upon a void contract, and in furtherance of it, and it should not be entertained by a court of law and equity.

"The rule in the United States is," says Mr. Green, the American editor of Brice's Ultra Vires, "that a corporation cannot become a stockholder in another corporation unless by power specially granted by its charter or neces-

In Talmage v. Pell, 7 N. Y. 843, it was held that a banking corporation had only authority to carry on its business in the manner and with the powers specified in the Act, and that therefore it had no power to purchase stocks for the purpose of selling them for profit.

In Franklin Co. v. Lewiston Sav. Inst., 68 Me. 43, it was said that, upon principle as well as authority, the trustees of a savings bank had no authority, outside of the charter, or public laws, to invest funds of the bank in manufacturing corporations.

Dealing in stocks by national banks is not expressly prohibited by the National Banking Act; but such a prohibition is implied from the failure to grant the power. First Nat. Bank of Charlotte v. National Exch. Bank of Baltimore, 92 U. S. 122, 23 L. ed. 679.

And a national bank is not authorized to act as broker for the purchase of bonds or stocks. First Nat. Bank of Allentown v. Hoch, 89 Pa. 324; Fowler v. Scully, 73 Pa. 463.

In Sumner v. Marcy, 3 Woodb. & M. 105, recovery was refused on notes given by a manufacturing corporation for the purchase of shares in a bank.

A corporation cannot in its own name subscribe for stock, or be a corporator under the General Railroad Law, nor can it do so by a simulated compliance with the provisions of the law through its agents as pretended corporators and subscribers of stock. Central R. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 31 N. J. Eq. 475.

A railway company may not purchase stock in another railway company with intent to hold it, and especially with intent to use the power thus acquired to secure an interest in the management of the latter. Pearson v. Concord R. Corp. 63 N. H. 537; Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582, followed in Hazelhurst v. Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. 43 Ga. 18 L. R. A.

13; Milbank v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 64 How. Pr. 20.

A corporation engaged in business of a public character will not be allowed to gain control of the stock of other corporations engaged in the same business and so create a monopoly. People v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 8 L. R. A. 497, 150 Ill. 363.

A corporation formed for the purposes of creating or operating gas-works and manufacturing and selling gas, has no power to purchase and hold or sell shares of stock in other gas companies as an incident to such purpose of its formation though such power is specified in its articles of incorporation. Ibid.

In the course of the opinion in Hodges v. New England Screw Co., 1 R. L. 812, 53 Am. Dec. 624, it was said that religious and charitable corporations, and corporations for literary and scientific purposes, may properly invest in the stock of other corporations. Insurance companies may invest in the stock of banks and railroads and the like. Such investments are in the line of their business.

And so in Pearson v. Concord R. Corp., 63 N. H. 537.

But in Berry v. Yates, 24 Barb. 190, it was held that an insurance incorporation may not invest its moneys to sustain another corporation, in a similar or dissimilar business.

In State v. Butler, 86 Tenn. 614, it was held that an insurance company had no power by purchase to vest in itself the stock and franchises of a bank, there being no express authority to do so either in the charter, or by additional legislative grant.

a. May take stock in payment of debts.

Under extraordinary circumstances it may be necessary for a national bank, or a manufacturing corporation, or a railroad corporation, to acquire sarily implied in it." Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 91, note b, and American cases cited. "A corporation has no implied right to purchase shares in another company for the purpose of controlling its management, nor may a corporation hold shares in another company as an investment, unless this be the usual method of carrying on its proper business. A corporation must carry on its business by its own agents, and not through the agency of another corporation. It is clear, also, that a corporation has no implied right to speculate in shares, unless this be the kind of business for which the company was founded." 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 431.

The evidence shows that the declared purpose of complainant in buying in the shares held by the defendant was to enable it to manage and control the business of the Tennessee company in the interest of the Ohio company. There is no pretense that it had any express power to purchase shares in another company, and it is too clear to need argument or further citation of authority that it had no implied authority to purchase and hold shares, either in its own name or in that of a trustee, for the purpose of controlling another corporation. That these corporations were engaged in a similar business does not help the case. The purpose and intent in granting a charter is that the corporation shall carry on its business through its own agents, and not through the agency of another corporation. The public policy of this state will not permit the control of one corporation by another. Especially is this true when a foreign corporation thus undertakes to control and swallow up a domestic company. Such control of one corporation by another in a like business is unlawful, as tending to monopoly. The result is that this purchase of shares for the express object of controlling and managing another corporation was ultra vires, and therefore unlawful and void. Being void, it was of no legal effect, and no rights result from it, enforceable by or through the courts of this state, when such aid is invoked in furtherance of the unlawful agreement.

But it has been insisted very earnestly by the able and learned counsel for complainant that, when the contract had been fully executed by the plaintiff, the defendant should not be permitted to invoke such defense to a suit brought to compel performance; that to permit such a defense would work injustice, and enable defendant to repudiate his liability while holding on to the price he has received. There are cases where, the contract being fully executed on both sides, the court in the interest of justice, has refused to aid either in obtaining a rescission. Whitney Arms Co. v. Barlow, 68 N. Y. 62, 20 Am. Rep. 504, is one of this class. So there are cases where the defense of ultra vires has not been entertained when the defect was in the mode of executing the contract or in the power of the agent. So there are many cases holding the party relying upon the defense of ultra vires to an accountability for the benefit received. Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 717, and note at end of chapter. Again, there are cases where the courts have refused to entertain suits to recover property from corporations which is held in excess of charter capacity. In such cases the courts have held stock in another corporation, as in satisfaction of a valid debt, or by way of security, but with a view to its subsequent sale or conversion into money. First Nat. Bank of Charlotte v. National Exch. Bank of Baltimore, 62 U. S. 123, 23 L. ed. 681; Fleckner v. Bank of United States, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 351, 5 L. ed. 634; First Nat. Bank of Charlotte v. National Exch. Bank of Baltimore, 39 Md. 600.

One manufacturing corporation may take stock in another for the payment of a debt. Howe v. Boston Carpet Co. 16 Gray. 495.

It was held in Hodges v. New England Sewing Co., 1 R. 1, 312, 58 Am. Dec. 624, that a sewing company might have rightfully taken stock in an iron company in payment for property if it had been taken with a view to sell again.

In Franklin Bank v. Commercial Bank, 36 Ohio St. 361, both corporations were organized under an Act providing that no banking company should hold or purchase any portion of its stock, or of the stock of any other company, unless such purchase should be necessary to prevent loss upon a debt previously contracted in good faith. It was held that the refusal of the defendant to permit the transfer upon its books, to the plaintiff, of certain shares of stock taken by the latter as security at the time of loaning a sum of money, did not amount to conversion of the stock.

A statute forbidding one corporation to subscribe for or purchase stock or securities of another corporation, except in payment of a bona fide debt, does not apply to a case where one corporation, which made advances to another on the security of its mortgage bonds, which it is unable to redeem, makes further advances secured by its bonds and stock. Taylor County Ct. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 161.

2. Power to deal in its own stock.

A corporation may, if it acts in good faith, buy and sell shares of its own stock. Republic L. Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 12 L. R. A. 323, 136 Ill. 150; Clapp v. Peterson, 104 Ill. 25; Chetlain v. Republic L. Ins. Co. 86 Ill. 223; Chicago, P. & S. W. R. Co. v. Marseilles, 84 Ill. 145; Johnson County Comrs. v. Thayer, 94 U. S. 651, 24 L. ed. 133; Re Republic Ins. Co. 3 Biss. 452; First Nat. Bank of Salem v. Salem Capital Flour Mills Co. 39 Fed. Rep. 89; Blalock v. Kernersville Mfg. Co. 110 N. C. 99.

A corporation to which power is given to purchase all kinds of property that may be deemed desirable may purchase its own stock. Iowa Lumber Co. v. Foster, 49 Iowa. 25.

But corporations cannot buy in or deal with their stock to the prejudice of creditors. Heggie v. People's Bldg. & Loan Assn. 107 N. C. 581.

And the purchase will be declared illegal at the instance of creditors injured thereby. Fraser v. Ritchie, 3 Ill. App. 554; Heggie v. People's Bldg. & Loan Assn. supra.

Business corporations cannot exchange their goods for their capital stock so as to reduce or retire the latter. St. Louis Carriage Mfg. Co. v. Hilbert, 24 Mo. App. 338.

In Barton v. Port Jackson & U. F. Pl. Road Co., 17 Barb. 407, the company was organized under an Act giving it power to hold, purchase, and convey such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation should require, and it was held not to have authority to purchase its own stock.

A sale of its own stock to a bank was held in Farmers & M. Bank v. Champlain Transp. Co., 18 Vt. 181, to remove the disability of the stockholder on the ground of interest and make him competent to testify for the bank.

that the defect in the power could not be set up in a collateral way, and that the state only could complain of such violation. To this effect were our own cases of Barrow v. Nashville & C. Turnp. Co., 9 Humph. 803, and Heiskell v. Chickasaw Lodge, 87 Tenn. 668.

The question here is not like any of these. The complainant sues upon its contract, and in affirmance of it seeks to have the defendant perform an agreement which sprung from, and was collateral to it. It has received the shares it purchased, and holds onto them. It simply asks that the defendant be further compelled to perform its contract, by contributing, in accordance with his agreement, his proportion of the liability paid off by complainant in protection of the property of the McMillan Marble Company. The suit is clearly in furtherance of the original unlawful and void contract. That the contract has been executed by the plaintiff does not make it lawful, or entitle it to an enforcement of it. This proposition was very plainly put in Pittsburgh, U. & St. L. R. Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co., where it was stated, as a result of all the previous discussions of that court upon this subject, that "a contract made by a corporation, which is unlawful and void, because beyond the scope of its corporate powers, does not, by being carried into effect, become lawful and valid; but the proper remedy of the party aggrieved is by disaffirming the contract, and suing to recover, as on a quantum meruit, the value of what the defendant has actually received." 131 U. S. 389, 38 L. ed. 163. The case of Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. is an exceedingly interesting case, as it involved a consideration of the circumstances under which a defendant may interpose the defense of ultra vires, notwithstanding full performance by the plaintiff. In that case the Central Transportation Company had leased and transferred all its property of every kind to the defendant company, which was engaged in a similar and competitive business. The lessee company undertook to pay all of the debts of the lessor company, and to pay to it annually the sum of $264,000 for a term of 99 years. Possession was taken, and the installments paid for a number of years. The suit was for a part of the installment for the last year before suit. The defense of ultra vires was interposed and sustained. The court held that the sale was unauthorized and in excess of the power of the selling company. It was urged for the plaintiff, as in this, that even if the contract was void, because ultra vires and against public policy, yet that having been fully executed on the part of the plaintiff, and the benefits of it received by the defendant for the period covered by its duration, the defendant was estopped to set up the invalidity of the contract as a defense to an action to recover the compensation agreed on for that period. After reviewing its own decision on this branch of the case, the court said: "The view which the court has taken of the question presented by this branch of the case, and the only view which appears to us consistent with legal principles, is as follows: A contract of a corporation, which is ultra vires, in the proper sense, that is to say, outside the object of its creation, is defined in the law of its organization, and therefore beyond the powers conferred upon it by the Legislature, is not voidable only, but wholly void, and of no legal effect. The objection to the contract is not merely that the corporation ought not to have made it but that it could not make it. The contract cannot be ratified by either party, because it could not have been authorized by either. No performance on either side can give the unlawful contract any validity, or be the foundation of any right of action upon it. When a corporation

A water-power company when its business is no longer profitable and its water power has been extinguished by contract with the state may on a sale of its land take its own stock in payment. Dupee v. Boston Water Power Co. 114 Mass. 37.

The charter of a corporation may authorize it to buy and sell its own stock after it has been issued and paid for the same as any other article. Yeaton v. Eagle Oil & Ref. Co. (Wash.) April 22, 1892.

An agreement on certain conditions to retake its own stock may be made by a corporation on selling the stock, if the stock has once been regularly issued and paid for, but such an agreement cannot be made as a part of the original issue of stock. Ibid.

A contract for the surrender of stock to a corporation is valid where its articles of incorporation do not prohibit it but its powers enumerated are broad enough to include such right. Rollins v. Shaver Wagon & Carriage Co. 80 Iowa, 330, 20 Am. St. Rep. 427.

In Coleman v. Columbia Oil Co., 51 Pa. 74, a claim by a stockholder that a purchase of its own stock by the corporation was illegal was rejected on the ground that the stockholder had affirmed the transaction by bringing suit for his share of the stock thus bought.

it outstanding to prevent merger. But it was held that the company could not hold its stock so as to give its directors or trustees a right to vote it in.

In Columbus City Bank v. Bruce, 17 N. Y. 507, it was held that the bank might receive its own stock in payment of debts, and that stock so transferred would not be extinguished without the manifestation of an intent that such a result should follow.

In Taylor v. Miami Exporting Co., 6 Ohio, 176, it was held that a bank might receive its own stock in payment of a debt and hold it as it did its other corporate property.

And stock so taken may be sold for the benefit of the corporation. Chillicothe Branch of State Bank of Ohio v. Fox, 3 Blatchf. 431.

In Union Nat. Bank v. Hunt, 7 Mo. App. 42, it was held that a national bank could purchase its own stock to prevent loss upon a debt although it must sell it again within six months.

On the sale by a national bank of its own stock which it has taken to prevent a loss upon a debt it may receive some of its own stock as collateral security for the purchase price. Union Nat. Bank v. Hunt, supra.

b. Donations.

In Illinois a corporation may receive a donation of shares of its own stock. Eggmann v. Blanke, 40 Mo. App. 516.

And in Rivanna Nav. Co. v. Dawsons, 3 Gratt. 19, 46 Am. Dec. 123, a bequest to a corporation of its own stock was held good. A. P. W.

is acting within the general scope of the powers conferred upon it by the Legislature, the corporation, as well as persons contracting with it, may be estopped to deny that it has complied with the legal formalities which are prerequisite to its existence or to its action, because such requisites might in fact have been complied with. But when the contract is beyond the powers conferred upon it by existing law, neither the corporation, nor the other party to the contract, can be estopped by assenting to it, or by acting upon it to show that it was prohibited by those laws. . . . A contract ultra vires being unlawful and void, not because it is in itself immoral, but because the corporation, by the law of its creation, is incapable of making it, the courts, while refusing to maintain any action upon the unlawful contract, have always striven to do justice between the parties, so far as could be done consistently with adherence to law, by permitting property or money, parted with on the faith of the unlawful contract, to be recovered back or compensation to be made for it. In such case, however, the action is not maintained upon the unlawful contract, nor according to its terms, but on an implied contract of the defendant to return, or, failing to do that, to make compensation for, property or money which it has no right to retain. To maintain such an action is not to affirm, but to disaffirm, the unlawful contract." 139 U. S. 60, 85 L. ed. 68. This seems to us to fully and clearly state the rule.

The passage cited by counsel from Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 287, 24 L. ed. 695, "that the doctrine of ultra vires, when invoked for or against a corporation, should not be allowed to prevail when it would defeat the ends of justice or work a legal wrong," is misleading, and, if literally construed, would result in an erroneous practical extension of the powers of corporations. We do not understand that a result required by adherence to the law would be either unjust or a legal wrong. The learned judge doubtless intended to be understood that the defense would be a legal wrong only when the law did not require its consideration by the court. This passage, and one of similar character in San Antonio v. Mehaffy, 96 U. S. 312, 24 L. ed. 816, was uncalled for in the case in which it was used, and in Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co., supra, characterized as a mere passing remark. To sustain the suit as now presented would be in affirmance and furtherance of an unlawful and void contract. It is in no sense a suit in disaffirmance. Whether complainant could tender back the shares received, and maintain a suit to recover the money paid for the shares upon an implied agreement to return money which the defendant had no right to retain, is a question not presented upon this record.

The decree dismissing the bill must, upon the grounds herein stated, be and accordingly is affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

City of NEW HAVEN, Apph.,

v.

NEW HAVEN & DERBY R. CO. et al.

(.....Conn.....)

1. An agreement by a city not to oppose a railroad company's closing certain of its streets crossed by the latter at grade in consideration of the making of compensation solely to private individuals is void as against public policy.
2. The invalidity on the grounds of public policy of a contract by a city with a railroad company will be considered by the court in an action to enforce it although such invalidity is not pleaded.
3. A municipal corporation cannot become a trustee to collect in its own name, especially at its own expense, separate sums of money due to some of its citizens for damages from the closing of streets by a railroad.
4. A contract between a city and a railroad company by which the former consents to the closing of certain streets upon the consideration that the latter shall pay certain damages to thirty-five different property holders, if enforceable at all, can be enforced only by such property holders.

5. A demurrer to a complaint by a city upon a contract between it and a railroad company by which it consents to the closing of certain streets on condition that the company pays to thirty-five different property holders injured thereby the damages sustained must be sustained even if such property holders have a right of action thereunder, since such rights would be several and not joint and the court is not required to select and substitute one of the thirty-five claimants in place of the city.

(September 12, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due under a contract by which defendants were alleged to have undertaken to recompense certain property holders for damages caused by closing certain streets over which defendants' road extended. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. T. Driscoll, C. S. Hamilton, Edmund Zacher and David Callahan, for appellant:

If anybody has a right of action upon this

NOTE.—The power of a municipal corporation to act as a trustee, which has been affirmed in numerous cases cited in a note to Dalley v. New Haven (Conn.) 14 L. R. A. 60, although denied in that case, 18 L. R. A.

was extended by those cases only to trusts which were for charitable purposes, none of them going so far as to uphold such a trust as that asserted in the main case above.

contract or for the acts done by the defendants whereby the property owners suffered the damages which the arbitrators have found that they have, there was manifest error in rendering the judgment dismissing the complaint.

Where there is a legal right, there is a legal remedy by suit, whenever it is invaded.

State v. Bulkeley, 14 L. R. A. 675, 61 Conn. 287.

The law and sound justice have very little respect for the plea of ultra vires, when first urged after the party who pleads it has obtained all the advantage of the performance of the contract which he claims to be ultra vires.

But the plea of ultra vires should not as a general rule prevail, whether interposed for or against a corporation, when it would not advance justice, but, on the contrary, would accomplish a legal wrong.

Beach, Priv. Corp. § 222.

If the other party has had the benefit of a contract fully performed by the corporation, he will not be heard to object that the contract and performance were not within the legitimate powers of the corporation.

One who has received from a corporation the full consideration of his engagement to pay money, either in service or property, cannot avail himself of the objection that the contract thus fully performed by the corporation was ultra vires, or not within the chartered privileges and powers.

The New Haven & Derby Railroad Company is liable for these damages, and the defendants cannot set up as a defense that the city had no power to make this contract.

Burritt v. New Haven, 42 Conn. 174.

But a municipal corporation has the right to affix conditions to its consent to a railroad corporation taking or occupying any of the streets of the city.

And municipal corporations also have the power to submit claims to arbitration.

Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. 478.

Messrs. Simeon E. Baldwin and William Trumbull, for appellees:

The city made the agreement for the benefit of future claimants, whose claims would only come into existence in case of the closing thereafter of parts of three streets. If any such claim had thereafter come into existence, the claimant would have had a right of action on this agreement, if on his demand, the company refused to prepare the papers for or enter into a submission with him.

But the city would have had no right of action for damages then, and has none now.

The city has suffered no damages, and could not suffer any.

No averments are made to put the plaintiff in the position of the assignee and equitable and bona fide owner of a chose in action, under Conn. Gen. Stat., § 981.

Bizby v. Parsons, 49 Conn. 488, 44 Am. Rep. 246; Kinns v. New Haven, 82 Conn. 210, 18 L. R. A.

A municipal corporation has no power to engage in litigation in behalf either of its citizens or of strangers.

Dailey v. New Haven, 14 L. R. A. 69, 60 Conn. 814.

The city, in this case, has no capacity to collect $30,000 damages, and distribute the money among numerous claimants, and the contract never contemplated such a procedure. On the contrary, the contract gave a right of action to any individual injured by its breach.

Coster v. Albany, 48 N. Y. 399.

This suit is brought to collect "awards" made in favor of thirty or forty different persons, on as many different causes of action.

All these parties could not have united in one action to recover a joint judgment for their several awards. The claim of each would be one that did not "affect all the parties to the action."

Conn. Gen. Stat. § 878; Miles v. Strong, 60 Conn. 898.

Fenn, J., delivered the opinion of the the court:

In this action, the defendants, the New Haven & Derby Railroad Company and the Housatonic Railroad Company, having severally demurred to the amended complaint, which demurrers were sustained by the superior court, the plaintiff, by its appeal, has brought before this court the question of the sufficiency of such complaint. The material allegations are as follows: The New Haven & Derby Railroad Company, having operated and located its railroad tracks through a portion of the city of New Haven, which tracks crossed at grade certain streets in the city, the company desired to make changes for its benefit, in order to obtain which they desired, subject to the approval of the railroad commissioners, to close, in part, said streets, and thereby cut off travel on the same where they crossed their tracks. Such changes, if made, would greatly injure, damage, and cut off from public travel and convenience the property of many persons located on or near said streets, among whom are the persons named in the complaint; and the company knew that, unless provision was made by it for recompensing the persons whose property would be so injured by such closing, the city of New Haven, on behalf of such persons themselves, would strenuously oppose such change, and that, with such opposition, it would be impossible to obtain the same, for which it had preferred its petition to the railroad commissioners, notice of which had been given the city, and which application to the commissioners was heard by the court of common council, and was pending before it. In order to obtain and procure from this joint special committee a recommendation to the court of common council of the passage of a vote that the city would make no opposition to the approval by the railroad commissioners of the location and proposed change desired, the railroad company, on February 16, 1888, executed and delivered to the city a written contract, under seal, which was procured, made, and entered into, at the request of the owners of said property, and for their benefit and protection, by which the railroad company, in consideration of the joint special committee having unanimously recommended to the court of common council the passage of the vote that the city would make no opposition to the approval by the railroad commissioners of said location, did covenant and agree to and with the city that it would refer any and all claims for damages arising from the discontinuance of the streets, as described in said location, which might be made by any party or parties against the company, whether the parties did or did not own real estate abutting on said parts of the streets, to the final decision and award of three disinterested arbitrators, to be appointed by any judge of the superior court on due notice to the parties claiming such damages, and would prepare all necessary papers to secure any such arbitration at its sole expense, free of charge to the parties claiming damages, and would abide by and perform whatever award might be adjudged to any party for any excess of damages over benefits that he might sustain according to such award within thirty days from the award, together with the fees of the arbitrators, as directed by the award. The committee did recommend the passage of such vote. The report was accepted by the common council, and approved by the mayor. Afterwards, on October 15, 1888, the railroad commissioners did, upon the application of said company, approve in writing, with a single alteration, an amended location, pursuant to which the company closed two of the three streets named, and bridged the other. By reason of these changes certain property owners, named in the complaint, were, and their property was, greatly damaged and injured, and cut off from public access and travel, being the property owners for whose benefit and at whose request said contract was made, all of whom had just claims for damages which ought to have been paid by the company, but the company refused to pay upon request, or to submit said claims to arbitration, or to abide by their said agreement. Afterwards, in August, 1889, the company leased its property and franchises to the other defendant, which assumed all its liabilities and obligations, and is now liable therefor. Afterwards, on May 9, 1890, the parties claiming such damages, and at whose request and for whose benefit the contract was made, having demanded payment, the plaintiff preferred its application in their behalf, at their request, and for their benefit, for the appointment of arbitrators, to a judge of the superior court, giving due notice, and said judge made such appointment, and the arbitrators, so appointed, heard the claimants, who proved their claims before them; and afterwards, on November 7, 1890, the arbitrators made their award, awarding to the different persons named in the complaint, some 35 in number, the several sums therein stated, amounting in the whole to the sum of $22,867, the fees of the arbitrators for said service being $384. The arbitrators reported said awards to the court of common council of the city of New Haven, which accepted their report, and the doings of the arbitrators in connection therewith; and thereupon the plaintiff notified each of the defendants, and demanded payment of the several amounts awarded to said several persons, and the said several persons likewise made demand, but the defendant refused to pay. And said several persons and claimants are ready and willing to accept the amounts fixed by the awards, in full satisfaction of their claims, and in full payment, and upon such payment to release the defendants from all further claim and liability on said accounts and matters. The plaintiff has paid the arbitrators their fees of $384.

There can be no doubt but that the performance of a public duty to lay out, make, and maintain necessary streets within its limits is imposed by law and rests upon the plaintiff city; and the interest of the city in such streets is commensurate with the duties imposed. The plaintiff would therefore have the unquestionable right to appear, upon such an application as that made by the Derby & New Haven Railroad Company to the railroad commissioners, as a party in interest, and to be heard in opposition to the same. And it would be proper for the plaintiff to stipulate, as a condition of the withdrawal of such opposition, that the company should do such acts or make such compensation to the plaintiff as should be a reasonable and just equivalent for any added burden, direct or indirect, upon the municipality, in consequence of any such change. That the plaintiff should do this would be a simple measure of justice to its citizens and taxpayers. But this is not the case which the record presents to us. On the contrary, it expressly, and by repeated averments in the complaint, appears that the condition exacted in consideration of the withdrawal of opposition was required at the instance of private parties, and for their sole and exclusive benefit and advantage. The interest of the city is therefore entirely irrelevant to the present consideration, and must be wholly laid out of the case. Indeed, so far is the existence of such interest a justification for the action taken, that it may be truly and forcibly said that, if the proposed change would result in either benefit or injury to the plaintiff, if the former, opposition to it ought not to have been made, and if the latter, ought not have been withdrawn, on any such ground as the complaint and agreement recite. The interest of the city, as such, begins where the interest of adjoining landowners ends, and ends where such private interest begins. Conceding that it is a part of the duty of the city to promote to the convenience of the traveling public, it in no wise alters the proposition. If the change proposed in fact renders the streets of the city less convenient for public travel, compensation to landowners for damages sustained by their property neither lessens such inconvenience, nor furnishes to the public any just equivalent therefor. The case before us, therefore, considered in its true light, is that of the plaintiff exacting, as a condition of the withdrawal of an opposition which neither in its own behalf nor in the interest of the general traveling public it claims to have had any reason to make, matters purely of private advantage to private parties, most of whom were indeed citizens of New Haven, but one of whom is stated in the complaint to be a corporation located elsewhere. It is true that the right of the plaintiff to make such a contract is not questioned in the very numerous grounds of demurrer presented in behalf of the defendants. It may have been thought that such an objection would come with a savor of ill grace from the defendant, who, on the face of the record, appears, for its own advantage, to have induced the making of the contract in question. But, however that may be, since it underlies the decision to be arrived at upon other grounds, which are stated, it is proper for us to consider it; and it would not be proper for us to neglect to do so, if such neglect would lead to the possible inference of approval of action upon the part of a joint special committee of the court of common council of the plaintiff city, which, however pure may have been in fact the motive which inspired it in this particular instance, it would be entirely subversive to public policy to commend. That a public officer should regulate his official conduct by considerations of private benefit to himself or to others can never, as we trust, receive the sanction, either express or tacit, of this court. And, even if we were at liberty to pass this question of the validity of the consideration of the contract in silence, it would not avail the plaintiff. Could the city have a right of action at law for damages resulting from its breach? Clearly not in its own right. It could recover nothing which would go into its treasury and belong to it. Kinne v. New Haven, 83 Conn. 210. But, indeed, the plaintiff does not claim this. The plaintiff claims that, if the contract is valid, it creates the plaintiff the trustee of an express trust, namely, a person with whom a contract is made for the benefit of another, and that such a person may sue without joining the persons represented by him, and beneficially interested in the suit. Gen. Stat. § 886; Rules of Practice, 58 Conn. 561, 562. But the reason stated in Dailey v. New Haven, 60 Conn. 819, 820, 14 L. R. A. 69, applies with equal force in this case, and demonstrates that the plaintiff could not legally become such a trustee, and, if such were the effect of the agreement under consideration, (as we do not think it is, or was intended to be,) we should be compelled to hold it, also for that reason, so far, at least, illegal and void. In the case just cited, in speaking of the rule that "municipal corporations have only such powers as are expressly granted in their charters, or are necessary to carry into effect the powers so granted," this court said: "It is a rule of great public utility, and courts should recognize and enforce it, as a safeguard against the tendency of municipalities to embark in enterprises not germane to the objects for which they are incorporated." The wisdom of these remarks and the utility of this rule receive signal illustration in the case before us. If the position of the plaintiff is correct, the city is to be (and, whether correct or not, it has been) embarked in the enterprise of undertaking to collect, in its own name, and presumably at its own expense, separate sums of money due from one or both of these defendants to some thirty-five private parties for damages, involving expensive and doubtful and protracted litigation, in which it has already expended a considerable sum from its treasury in the one item of arbitration fees, not to speak of other and probably much greater outlays, and in which, in the event of its ultimate success in recovering judgment, and in collecting any sum whatever as damages, it is manifest that, except in the most improbable event of such recovery being commensurate with the aggregate of the several sums claimed, the question of the proper apportionment of the sums collected among the various claimants, none of which are alleged in the complaint to be willing to accept less than the entire sum severally awarded to such claimant, is likely to give rise to further questions, and lead to further litigation. How is it possible that the city can derive any advantage from such litigation, in which the loss must be its own, and the benefit inure to others? Would the court hesitate, at the instance of a taxpayer, to enjoin the continuance of such proceedings; and, if not, would it not be because, even waiving the original invalidity of the contract, its enforcement by the city, as the trustee of an express trust, would be opposed to public policy, and beyond its power? It seems to us that if any right of action could accrue for the breach of the agreement in question, it must reside in the parties severally injured, and be exercised by them, and cannot be by the plaintiff in their behalf.

But the plaintiff further insists that, if any one has a right of action under the agreement in question, the demurrer should not have been sustained, and the present suit dismissed; and the provisions of the practice rules are quoted. It is further said, and truly, that the want of proper parties is not alleged as a ground of demurrer. But, although our decision rests on other grounds, we will add that herein the plaintiff misconceives the true difficulty, which is not the want of proper parties. If the plaintiff is not such a party, there can be none for the cause or right of action alleged. There is no community of interest between the several claimants, and, if each of them would have a cause of action for his separate damage, there can be no joint action maintained by all of them to recover such damage, unless the plaintiff, by reason of the contract, had a cause of action for the whole damage. No one else (there having been no assignment to the plaintiff or any one else) can have it. If the plaintiff has a right of action for the whole, such action is within the jurisdiction of the superior court. As to most of the several claimants, the amount of their several claims would be below the jurisdiction of such court. Clearly it would not have been the duty of the trial court to have required or proposed such an amendment of the complaint as should have substituted one of the thirty-five claimants whose claim was of a sufficient amount to place it within the jurisdiction of the superior court, suing individually and in his own behalf, for the present suit of the plaintiff. There would be but little semblance of similarity between the two. The conclusions reached upon the questions discussed render the consideration of the many other questions presented by the demurrers unnecessary.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

The other Judges concurred.

Appt.,
v.

William H. BOLAND.

(.....Ala.....)

1. It is a matter of common knowledge that the demands and exigencies of commerce require the cars of one railroad company to be hauled over the road of another.
2. The extra hazard to a brakeman by the use of cars with couplings of different patterns some of which have double dead-woods or double buffers is one of the risks or dangers assumed by entering the employment.
3. It is not negligence in a railway company to haul cars of another company with double dead-woods or double buffers while couplings of a different pattern are in use on its own road.
4. A brakeman twenty-six years of age and of average intelligence is sufficiently warned of the increased danger which is open to ordinary observation in coupling cars with double dead-woods or double buffers which sometimes pass over the road by a caution that railroading is dangerous and that coupling cars is specially so requiring very great care, where he is further notified that cars with different coupling apparatus are hauled over the line.

Thorington, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee brought suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to recover damages for an injury sustained by him while in the company's employment as a brakeman. At the time of his employment he was about twenty-six years of age, and without experience in the railroad business. When the injury complained of was received he had been acting as a brakeman on construction trains on appellant's mineral road for about four weeks, and during that time had exhibited skill and dexterity in coupling cars. At the beginning of his employment he was instructed generally that railroading was a dangerous employment, and that coupling cars was specially dangerous, and to be done with great care and particularity. On being transferred from the first construction train, on which he had been employed for about two weeks, to another train of the same class, he was again instructed by his conductor that "coupling cars was a very dangerous business, and that he should use great care in making couplings." He was also informed that "there were cars on the company's line of railroad with different styles of couplings, and that he must be very particular and careful in coupling cars." After appellee had been in service as such brakeman for three or four weeks, he was called upon to couple two cars having double dead-woods or buffers, and which cars belonged to another system of railway, but were then being hauled over appellant's road. These double dead-woods or buffers are horizontal timbers at the end of the car, projecting, one on each side of the drawhead, the latter extending three or four inches beyond the dead-woods. In coupling, the drawhead yields to the impact of the two cars, and the dead-woods or buffers of the opposing cars coming together arrest the force of the blow. The coupling is done by holding the coupling pin with one hand above the dead-woods or buffers, while the link is guided by the other hand underneath the dead-wood or buffer. Coupling cars of this kind is more dangerous, according to the proof, than coupling those without buffers or dead-woods. Appellee had never seen a car with a coupling of this pattern, although the company frequently used such cars on its line; that is, hauled cars of that kind for other railroads. The testimony for appellee showed that he was compelled to make the coupling in a hurry, and that the cars came together quickly, and with force, and that he did not observe that the construction of the cars or their coupling was different from those to which he had been accustomed. On the other hand, appellant's testimony shows that appellee was not hurried in making the coupling, that the dead-woods or buffers were plainly open to his observation, and that the increased danger was patent. Appellee undertook to make the coupling as he would have done with ordinary cars, and his arm was caught and crushed between the buffers, causing permanent injury. The negligence alleged, and on which the right of recovery is based, is the negligence of the company in hauling on its line the cars of another company, so constructed as to render coupling more hazardous than it is with appellant's cars, and in not instructing appellee specially as to the increased danger in coupling cars with double dead-woods or buffers.

The questions reserved for review in this court are the exceptions of appellant to the charge given by the court at the instance of appellee, the refusal of the court to give the general charge for appellant, and the denial by the court of appellant's motion for a new trial. The ruling of the court upon the charges is involved in the correctness of its ruling in denying the motion for a new trial, and we shall address ourselves to the determination of that question without specially noticing the others. It is the duty of the master to furnish his employes, for use in the prosecution of his business, safe and suitable machinery, and to keep the same in good repair. But this duty is not an absolute one, and is discharged when the master exercises reasonable care and prudence in selecting machinery and appliances for the servant's use, in view of the nature of the business or employment and incidental hazards. No rule of law imposes upon the master the duty to select the latest and most approved machinery, but only such as is suitable for the purpose for which it is employed; and in selecting which of several styles of machinery or apparatus he will use in his business the discretion of the master is absolute, subject alone to the exercise of reasonable care and prudence. Kahler v. Schwenk, 144 Pa. 348, 18 L. R. A. 874, and notes; Wood, Mast. & S. §§ 881, 883; Smoot v. Mobile & M. R. Co. 67 Ala. 18.

There is an entire absence of proof showing that the couplings or double buffers to the cars which caused the injury to appellee were defective, or out of repair, or that they were discarded or prohibited on well-regulated railways, or that they were unsuited to the service; but it does appear that they are a style of coupling used on one at least of the great railway systems of this country, and that cars so constructed were frequently hauled or transported over appellant's road. Nor does appellee base the charge of negligence on the fact of the coupling to said cars being defective or out of repair, or unsuited to the business, but on the alleged fact that cars with that style of coupling are more dangerous to couple than those belonging to appellant, and the testimony sustains that charge. The question, therefore, is presented whether it is negligence per se in a railway company to receive from other companies, and haul over its own track, cars having different styles of coupling from those in use on its own cars, and which increase the hazard of coupling. It may be said it is a matter of common knowledge that the demands and exigencies of commerce require in the transportation of freight that the cars of one company shall be hauled over the road of another, and that, in order to meet this demand, the gauge of the tracks of the great trunk lines has been made uniform. This necessity has been recognized and provided for by statute in many of the states, including Alabama. Section 21 of article 14 of the Constitution, and section 1165 of the Code of 1886, carrying the same into effect, make it mandatory on railroads, when required, to transport or draw over its line the passengers, freight, or cars of any intersecting or connecting road, on reasonable terms, provided such cars are adapted to the gauge of its track, are sufficiently strong, and otherwise in proper condition for safe transportation. Probably in no other matter pertaining to the machinery or apparatus used in the railroad business has human ingenuity and invention been so frequently and constantly taxed as in the efforts to improve car couplings, and lessen the danger of that particular employment, which, under the best conditions, is known to be attended with much hazard. As a result of this, the taste and judgment of the managers of railroads in selecting styles or patterns of coupling, it has been said, have been as varied as the ingenuity of others in their invention, and consequently not only do such patterns vary on different roads, but sometimes on the same road. Cars of these different patterns, carrying through freight, so often pass from one road to another that the extra hazard thereby occasioned in handling them by employés ought to be considered, and we may say is one of the risks or dangers necessarily incident to the employment or business, and which the servant must be deemed to have assumed at the time of entering the service. In determining the question of negligence on the part of the company in such cases, the question is not whether the couplings of the cars so received upon its road are different from those on its own cars, or whether they are the best in use, or whether they increase the hazard of coupling cars, but whether they are reasonably suited or adapted to the use to which they are applied. To say that a certain style or pattern of coupling increases the hazard if it is reasonably adapted to the purpose intended, or one that a railway company, in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, would adopt, is simply to say that it requires greater care and skill on the part of the brakeman in using it than a coupling of a different pattern. While, as we have said, the duty rests on the master to provide safe and suitable machinery in the prosecution of his business, the presumption is he has performed that duty, and the burden is on the injured employé to show negligence in the discharge of such duty. So, likewise, it is the duty of a railroad company, under section 1165 of the Code, to which we have referred above, to receive from a connecting line of railway such cars only as are adapted to the gauge of its tracks, that are sufficiently strong, and otherwise in proper condition for safe transportation; and when it receives a car on its line from such other company the presumption is that it meets the above requirements. If it does not, and an employé is injured in consequence thereof, the burden is on him to show negligence on the part of the railway company in receiving or hauling a car not in proper condition for transportation over its road.

We have stated that the proof fails to point out any defect or fault in the coupling apparatus of the two cars in question, or that the pattern of coupling on them was unsuited to the business, and we may now go further, and say the proof also fails to show that such cars were not adapted to the gauge of appellant's track, or not sufficiently strong, or otherwise not in proper condition for safe transportation; but on the contrary, it is shown that they have been frequently hauled over appellant's line. If, therefore, as we have indicated, the mere fact of the cars having couplings of a different construction from those of appellant's cars, and which required greater care and prudence in hauling them, did not per se make it negligence for appellant to haul them on its road, then appellee fails in his proof to support the charge of negligence based on those facts. We have carefully investigated the question arising on these facts, and, with one exception, the authorities hold that it is not negligence in a railway company to haul cars of another company with double dead-woods or double buffers, while couplings of a different pattern are in use on its own road. The cases which support this view are the following: Pittsburg & L. E. R. Co. v. Henly, 48 Ohio St. 608, 15 L. R. A. 384; Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Smithson, 45 Mich. 212; Hathaway v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 51 Mich. 253; Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Flanigan, 77 Ill. 385; Baldwin v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 50 Iowa, 680.

In the case last cited the act of negligence complained of was that the defendant received on its tracks cars of another company on which the "couplings, bumpers, or chafing irons," commonly called "dead-woods," were not the usual ones in use on its road, nor such as had been in use thereon at any time during which the plaintiff had been in defendant's employ, and that the same were of an "old and unusual pattern, not now in use on the cars of the defendant, and were imperfect and defective." The plaintiff had only been working for the defendant three or four days when he was injured while coupling the cars of another company with double dead-woods, which had been taken on its track with through freight. It was held that the defendant was not guilty of negligence in taking upon its track cars of that description, and that the additional danger from such cars "must be regarded as ordinary and incidental to the business." In the case of Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Flanigan a similar question is elaborately discussed, and it is there held that a railroad company will not be liable to an employé for personal injury received while coupling cars having double buffers, simply because a higher degree of care is required in using them than in those differently constructed. Appellee, however, urges further that, if it was not negligence in appellant to have such a car on its track, it was appellant's duty to specially instruct him of the increased danger in coupling cars of that description, he being inexperienced in the business. It is unquestionably a high and binding duty of a master in assigning a young or inexperienced servant to work at or about dangerous machinery to give such servant detailed and special warning or instruction as to all latent dangers not discoverable by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care on the part of the servant, but no principle of law imposes on the master the duty to explain to the servant patent dangers which are ordinarily incident to the service, and which it may reasonably be expected, under the circumstances, the servant can see and appreciate. The duty of the master, in cases of latent defects, to explain, is the same, whether the servant be a minor or an intelligent adult; the difference being, however, that as great diligence in observing and comprehending the dangers is not to be expected of the young and inexperienced. The latter, as much as intelligent adults, are held, on entering a particular service, to have assumed the ordinary hazards incident to such service, including the risks of injury from open defects in machinery and appliances. As to latent risks, the duty of the master is not discharged when he simply instructs the servant in a general way that the service engaged in is dangerous; and especially is this true where the servant is a person who, from inexperience or want of education, would not likely have knowledge of such latent risks. In such cases he should not only be instructed that the service is dangerous, but, where extraordinary risks are to be encountered, he should be warned by the master, as far as possible, of their character and extent, if known to the master, or should be known to him. But, as we have said, this duty is required only as to latent dangers or risks, and we know of no rule or principle of law that requires the master to give any express or particular instructions to guard against such dangers as are manifestly obvious. In Holland v. Tennessee O. I. & R. Co., 91 Ala. 444, 12 L. R. A. 232, this court uses the following language: "Whether the defendant was negligent or not in failing to notify and instruct the intestate and his fellow servants as to the dangers of the work they were directed to do depends upon the further consideration whether the peril involved in it was patent or latent,—such as could be seen and known by ordinary care and prudence in the use of the senses, or such as was obscured, and could not be appreciated. If the former, the law is well settled that the master need not advise his servants of its existence, and instruct them as to the means necessary to its avoidance, since they, equally with himself, are held to know both the fact of peril and how to avoid or escape it. . . . On the other hand, it is the imperative duty of the master to inform the servant of all latent dangers incident to the service, and instruct him as to their avoidance." What we have said on this subject is further supported by the following authorities: Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501; Fones v. Phillips, 39 Ark. 17; Buckley v. Gutta Percha & R. Mfg. Co. 118 N. Y. 540.

In the case we are now considering the plaintiff in the action is not a minor, but was at the time of the injury twenty-six years of age, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it must be presumed that he was of average intelligence. He had been warned more than once that railroading was a dangerous business, and that coupling cars was attended with special risk, and that it was necessary he should use very great care and particularity in that service; and, furthermore, he was notified that the company hauled cars of different construction, and 18 L. R. A.

with different coupling apparatus. The double buffers or dead-woods were so located with reference to the drawhead that it was impossible to see one without the other. They were on each side of the drawhead, and projected to within about three inches of the same length as the drawhead. A view of the buffers and drawhead as attached to the car should be sufficient notice to a man of average intelligence of the risk incident to the coupling of such a car. Ordinary observation could not fail to disclose to appellee the difference between the appliances for coupling these cars and those on appellant's cars, and that a higher degree of care was necessary on his part. In Hathaway's Case, above cited, it is said, in referring to the case of Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Smithson: "In that case the plaintiff claimed the same kind of negligence on the part of the defendant as a ground of recovery as in this, and the plaintiff's own view of the cars, dead-woods, and couplings at the time of the injury was held to be all the notice that was necessary to be given by the company; and that the plaintiff could not recover. The correctness of that decision is not questioned, but admitted, by the plaintiff's counsel in this case, and the only difference claimed between the two cases is that in the Smithson Case the coupler injured had long experience in coupling, and in the present case he had little or none at all. This fact, if admitted, cannot make this an exception to the rule. If the character of any particular danger is so simple that it can as well be ascertained at a single view as at many, it is difficult to see how additional observation could be of any benefit to the party whose duty it is to encounter it." True, there is testimony tending to show that appellee was hurried in making the coupling, and that the two cars were only about four feet apart when he stepped in to make the coupling, and that the engineer brought them together with much force. Without referring to the testimony contradictory of these statements, it may be remarked that the negligence of the engineer cannot be looked to either to defeat or support this action. It is a question of the negligence of the company, and not of appellee's coemployees. If the engineer brought the cars together so hurriedly that the appellee did not have time to observe the particular style or pattern of coupling with which they were furnished, and he was thereby injured, that would not affect the question whether the company was negligent in using or having on its road cars of that particular pattern, or whether plaintiff had been properly instructed as to the risks of his employment. If, as we have shown, it was not incumbent on appellant to specially instruct appellee as to these particular couplings because such risk was open to ordinary observation, the act of the engineer in depriving the plaintiff of the opportunity to make such observation is not the negligence of the company, although it might, if appellee was himself without fault, support an action under the employés' statute, on proper averment and proof that the engineer sustained towards him such a position as would make the company liable, under the terms of the statute for the negligence of such engineer resulting in injury to his coemployé. The authorities we have cited, with the single exception, we believe, of the case of Missouri Pac. R. & I. & G. N. R. Co. v. White, 78 Tex. 103, cited by appellee are clear and uniform on the propositions discussed, and are in accord with our view of the law applicable to this case.

Our conclusion is that on the undisputed testimony showing the structure, nature, and office of the double dead-woods or double buffers, and that cars of that description were frequently hauled over appellant's tracks, and in the absence of all proof showing that the particular coupling apparatus was defective, or out of repair, or unsuited to the purpose intended, or that the car was unsafe for transportation over appellant's road, it results as a matter of law that it was not negligence in appellant to receive or transport such car over its tracks. And, it likewise appearing that the increased hazard in coupling such cars was open to the ordinary observation of any person using reasonable care and prudence, it further results that it was not negligence on the part of appellant in not instructing or warning appellee specially in regard to the increased risk in coupling cars with double dead-woods or double buffers, such increased risk being, under the circumstances, incident or ordinary to the risks assumed by appellee on entering appellant's employment, and merely calling for the exercise of a higher degree of care and prudence on the part of appellee in discharging his duties than when coupling cars of the style generally in use on defendant's road. The general charge requested by the defendant should have been given, and its motion for a new trial should have been granted.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

M. B. ANGEVINE, Appt.,

Mrs. S. L. KNOX-GOODRICH, Resp't.

(.....Cal.....)

1. A landlord is not liable for damages to an employee of his lessee from illness caused by defective plumbing where he is not charged with fraud or deceit or with any more knowledge of the defects than the lessee had.
2. No implied warranty of the habitable condition of a house leased for a dwelling is created by Civ. Code, § 1941, which provides that the lessor must put it in such condition.

(November 29, 1902.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Santa Clara County granting a new trial after verdict in his favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to his health through the alleged negligence of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jackson Hatch and B. F. Bergen, for appellant:

The first clause of section 1941 of the Civil Code provides that the lessor of a building intended for the occupation of human beings must, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, put it into a condition fit for such occupation.

This section fastens upon the landlord two obligations: first, to put the building into a condition fit for occupation; second, to repair all subsequent dilapidations thereof which render it untenable.

No penalty, however, is provided by the statute for a violation of the obligation of a landlord to put the premises into a condition fit for the occupation of human beings.

Hence the same consequences will follow a violation of this primary obligation of the landlord as will result from a violation of any obligation imposed by statute or common law upon the landlord.

The owner of a building erected by himself, to be let for hire, is responsible to third persons for injuries resulting to them from a nuisance existing upon the premises at the time of the making of the lease; also, he is liable where the structure was in such a condition at the time it was leased that it would be likely to become a nuisance in the ordinary and reasonable use of the same for the purpose for which it was constructed and let, and he fails to repair it; also, where he authorizes and permits the act causing the premises to become a nuisance, occasioning the injury.

The erection of the building and placing therein of a system of sewerage in plain violation of the law made the sewerage system so placed a nuisance in itself.

A tenant complaining of a nuisance may continue to lease the premises after the manifestation of the nuisance, at the same rent, and yet recover damages resulting from such nuisance.

Smith v. Phillips, 8 Phila. 10; Howell v. Mc'oy, 3 Rawle, 256.

Messrs. A. S. Kittredge, H. V. Morehouse and Hiram D. Tuttle, for respondent:

In the lease there is no covenant binding the landlord to repair, or as to its condition as to occupancy. The complaint therefore fails to state a cause of action. The plaintiff was the employé of the lessee, and therefore occupied the relation of tenant to the defendant.

Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58; Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173; Burdick v. Cheadle, 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767; Taylor, Land. & T. 8th ed. § 175, p. 198.

Therefore plaintiff assumed the same risk as the lessee, and the landlord is not liable to the tenant for personal injuries resulting from defective premises leased, when the lease contains no covenant obligating the landlord to make necessary repairs, and no covenant of warranty as to the condition of the premises.

Sieber v. Blanc and Willson v. Treadwell, supra; Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 563; Green v. Redding, 92 Cal. 548; Taylor, Land. & T. 8th ed. § 383; Chappel v. Gregory, 34 Beav. 250.

The lessor is not required to make repairs, except upon an express covenant in the lease, and nothing is implied.

Civil Code, §§ 1941, 1942, do not change the rule so as to enable plaintiff to sue in this action.

Green v. Redding, Van Every v. Ogg, and Sieber v. Blanc, supra; Tatum v. Thompson, 86 Cal. 203.

When the lessee continues the occupancy and possession of the premises, knowing them to be untenable, and pays the rent, he has no complaint or cause of action. He has elected and must stand by his election.

Tatum v. Thompson, supra; Williamson v. Miller, 55 Iowa, 86.

If the action by the lessee is not founded upon a warranty or an express or implied covenant, or upon misrepresentation or deceit or fraud, the action cannot be maintained.

147 Mass. 471; Cook v. Soule, 56 N. Y. 420; Moore v. Logan Iron & Steel Co. (Pa.) Oct. 4, 1886.

The employé of the tenant occupies the same position as the tenant, and he cannot sit by, and through his own negligence receive an injury, and the payment of rent by the tenant estops him from claiming the defective condition of the building and as there was no warranty, or fraud, or deceit, or misrepresentation, or covenant, expressed or implied in the lease, the tenant takes the property for better or worse and has therefore no ground for complaint.

McKeon v. Cutter (Mass.) May 10, 1892; Daly v. Wise, 16 L. R. A. 236, 132 N. Y. 306.

FOOTE, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff demanded damages from the defendant for injury to his health, caused by the neglect of the defendant to construct a house with safe and proper sewage pipes and conduits, which house was occupied by the plaintiff as an employé of the lessees of the defendant. Following the verdict of the jury, judgment for $3,500 was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. A motion was made for a new trial upon various grounds, and it was granted, without any specification as to the ground moving the court thereto. The respondent contends that the trial court erred in its rulings upon the demurrer to the complaint, in the admission of evidence, and in the charge to the jury; and in this connection it is urged that the trial court in all these matters took an erroneous view of the force and effect of section 1941 of the Civil Code, in that it was ruled by that tribunal that under such section there was virtually written into every lease of the kind here involved, by operation of the statute, even though not expressed in the lease or a covenant, that the premises leased are habitable, and fit for occupation by human beings, if intended for habitation; and that, as a consequence, if such building or structure is not in such condition, the covenant is broken, and an action for damages such as here instituted will lie. Such evidently was the view taken and expressed by the court in all these matters, and such view is not in harmony with the decisions of the supreme court. It is raised in Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173: "Nor was there any liability arising from section 1941 of the Civil Code, which provides that the lessor of a building intended for the occupation of human beings must put it in a condition for such occupation. In the first place, it is not alleged or found that the building was intended for the occupation of human beings; and, in the second place, it was held in Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 566, as we understand the decision, that the obligation imposed upon the landlord by section 1941 'should be limited by the extent of the privilege conferred upon the tenant' by section 1941; and that, therefore, the only consequence of a breach of the landlord's obligation is that the tenant may either vacate the premises, or expend one month's rent towards the repairs, after notice," etc. There is no fraud or deceit on the part of the landlord charged in the complaint, or proved in the case, as we read the transcript. It is a case where the plumbing of the house as constructed was defective, and the illness of the plaintiff was caused by noxious gases that escaped from sewage pipes by reason of this defective plumbing. It is not alleged or proven that the defendant knew anything more about this defect when the lease was made than the plaintiff or his employer, the lessee. But it is sought to make the defendant responsible under the idea that by the Civil Code (sec. 1941) there is an implied warranty in every lease of a house for the occupancy of human beings that the same is in a habitable condition when leased. This view of the case is not only opposed by the cases we have first cited, but it is in direct conflict with the decision of the appellate court in the case of Green v. Redding, 92 Cal. 548, where this was said about a somewhat similar contention: "This would be placing the burden of looking out for the health of one's family on the landlord, and leaving the husband and father without any responsibility, therefore, in renting a house for them to live in." If this is the extent of the defendant's responsibility to the tenant, it must be the same with reference to an employé of the tenant, as was the plaintiff here. Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 59; Taylor, Land. & T. (8th ed.) p. 198, § 175.

We therefore conclude that the action of the court below was erroneous as to all the matters alluded to as occurring on the trial of the cause, and for these reasons its action in granting a new trial was founded in justice, and was the exercise of a sound judicial discretion. We therefore advise that the order granting a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

(52 Fed. Rep. 439.)

1. That the mode of procedure in a Federal court adopted by an occupying claimant to enforce compensation for improvements placed by him on land which has been adjudged to the true owner does not conform strictly to the requirements of the State Occupying Claimants' Law, will not defeat the action if in the state statute legal and equitable rights and modes of proceeding are confounded, since the Federal courts will enforce the right

NOTE.—Adoption by federal courts of remedies created by state statutes.

Whenever a general rule as to property or personal rights or injuries to either is established by state legislation its enforcement by a Federal court in a case between proper parties is a matter of course and the jurisdiction of the court in such case is not subject to state limitation. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Whitton, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 270, 20 L. ed. 571; Dennick v. Central R. Co. 108 U. S. 11, 28 L. ed. 439.

This applies to a statutory right of action for death. Ibid.

Thus a right of action for death caused by negligence which is created by state statute cannot be limited by such statute to suits in the state courts, but such attempted limitation will be void as against a suit in a Federal court which has jurisdiction by reason of the citizenship of the parties. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Whitton, supra.

A claim for pilotage created by state statute in favor of a pilot who offers his services which are refused can be enforced in a Federal court in admiralty. Re McNiel, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 236, 20 L. ed. 424.

Preservation of equity jurisdiction.

The general doctrine that the equity jurisdiction of the Federal courts is the same in all the states and unaffected by state legislation has been declared in nearly all the cases cited below as well as in many others.

The abolition of common-law forms of pleading and practice does not destroy the distinction in the Federal courts between remedies at law and in equity. Bennett v. Butterworth, 52 U. S. 11 How. 659, 13 L. ed. 859; Jones v. McMasters, 61 U. S. 20 How. 8, 15 L. ed. 805; Basey v. Gallagher, 87 U. S. 20 19 L. R. A.

Wall. 670, 22 L. ed. 452; Thompson v. Central O. R. Co. 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 184, 18 L. ed. 763.

And the ordinary equity practice of Federal courts was early adopted and has been steadily preserved in the Federal courts sitting in Louisiana. Ridings v. Johnson, 128 U. S. 212, 32 L. ed. 401; Bein v. Heath, 53 U. S. 12 How. 163, 18 L. ed. 999; Gaines v. Chew, 48 U. S. 2 How. 619, 11 L. ed. 402; Gaines v. Reif, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 9, 10 L. ed. 642; Story v. Livingston, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 390, 10 L. ed. 200; Ex parte Whitney, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 404, 10 L. ed. 221; Poultney v. Lafayette, 37 U. S. 13 Pet. 472, 9 L. ed. 1161; Livingston v. Story, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 632, 9 L. ed. 226.

Enlargement of equitable remedies.

But while equity jurisdiction is preserved unimpaired in all Federal courts an enlargement of equitable rights by state statutes may be enforced in the Federal courts if they have jurisdiction of the case in other respects as well as in the state courts. Gormley v. Clark, 134 U. S. 333, 33 L. ed. 909; Frost v. Spitley, 121 U. S. 552, 30 L. ed. 1010; Reynolds v. First Nat. Bank of Crawfordsville, 112 U. S. 405, 28 L. ed. 733; Holland v. Challen, 110 U. S. 15, 28 L. ed. 53; Cummings v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 908; Keeley v. McGlynn, 38 U. S. 21 Wall. 503, 22 L. ed. 599; Clark v. Smith, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 195, 10 L. ed. 123.

Thus a statute extending the remedy of a suit to quiet title to any person having both legal title to and possession of the land giving him the right to compel any other person setting up a claim thereto to release his claim was, as early as 1839, held enforceable in a Federal court, in Clark v. Smith, supra.

Almost identical with this is a recent decision that a suit to quiet title and obtain a release of defendant's claim to land authorized by state statute but will preserve the distinction between law and equity.

2. An injunction suit in a Federal court when it has jurisdiction against the execution of the writ of possession is a proper remedy to enforce an occupying claimant's right to compensation for improvements, and it may be instituted at any time before he is dispossessed of the premises after they have been adjudged to the true owner, where the state statute provides for the protection of his rights by the appointment of appraisers after such judgment to ascertain the value of improvements and state the account.
3. Jurisdiction having attached on an injunction against the execution of a writ of possession in favor of an occupying claimant, the court may retain the cause and take and state accounts which are necessary to a final decree.
4. In a suit by an occupying claimant to restrain the execution of a writ of possession a Federal court may in its discretion refer the case to a master or appoint commissioners instead of directing the marshal to summon appraisers in accordance with the state practice, although it is desirable to follow a state practice as near as may be.
5. Statutes providing that the value of improvements by an occupying claimant in good faith may be adjudged to be a lien on the land and that he may retain possession until he has been paid the value thereof are valid.
6. Fixing the uniform date for the valuation of improvements by an occupying claimant in good faith as the date of the occupant's entry upon the land is not a violation in favor of any person having possession and legal title may be maintained in a Federal court if it has jurisdiction of the parties. Land & River Imp. Co. v. Bardon, 45 Fed. Rep. 706.

And a similar extension of the same remedy to persons out of possession has been in several cases held enforceable by Federal courts where the defendant is not in possession claiming adversely. Holland v. Challen and Reynolds v. First Nat. Bank of Crawfordsville, supra; Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Stanley, 49 Fed. Rep. 203; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Sparrow (Mich.) 1 L. R. A. 480, 36 Fed. Rep. 210. But see Whitehead v. Shattuck and United States v. Wilson, infra.

Likewise a suit to restore the record title where the records of real estate have been destroyed by fire, which is a remedy created by state statute, being essentially a cause of equitable cognizance can be maintained in a Federal court which has jurisdiction of the case otherwise. Gormley v. Clark, supra.

The right under a state statute to remove a cloud on title consisting of a lien which may result in a sale and a deed may be enforced in a Federal court if it has jurisdiction of the case otherwise. Chapman v. Brewer, 114 U. S. 158, 29 L. ed. 63.

The power of a court of equity under a state statute to set aside a will obtained by fraud and undue influence or a forged will and any probate obtained by fraud, concealment, or perjury is said in Kieley v. McGlynn, supra, to be probably a case in which an enlargement of equitable rights is created which may be administered by Federal courts as well as by those of the state.

And in Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 10, 28 L. ed. 524, it is held that a suit authorized by state practice to annul a will alleged to be void and to limit the operation of a decree admitting it to probate may be maintained in a proper case in a Federal court.

of any constitutional right of the owner of the fee.

7. An occupying claimant in good faith and the owner of the fee should be regarded in effect as tenants in common in proportion to the value of their respective interests with the sole right of possession in the occupant so long as the joint tenancy continues where the owner does not pay for the improvements and the occupant does not pay for the land as is required by statute, and the statute does not provide for such a contingency.
8. A sale of the property and a distribution of the proceeds according to the rights of the parties may be decreed in an equity case between an occupying claimant and the owner of the fee where by the failure of each to pay to the other the value of his interest in the property they have become cotenants.

Limitation of to enlargement of equity powers.

Where the defendant is in possession claiming adversely an action against him is in effect an action of ejectment, and although a state statute authorizes such suit to be brought in a court of equity no jurisdiction of such suit can be had by a

States for the district of Nebraska against Harriet Leighton and Charles M. Leighton for the land which gave rise to this suit. On the trial of the ejectment suit the land was adjudged to belong to the plaintiff in that suit. The defendants were bona fide occupants and claimants of the land, and entitled to the rights secured to such occupants by the Occupying Claimant's Law of that state.

In answer to an inquiry submitted to them by the court, at the request of the parties, the jury in the ejectment suit returned a special finding to the effect that the land was worth $6,000 without the improvements, and that the improvements were worth $11,000. The statutory mode of proceeding to ascertain the value of the land and the improvements was not observed, and the special finding returned by the jury was not made the basis of any order or judgment of the court in the case. On the 17th day of December, 1888, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the recovery of the land. See 37 Fed. Rep. 46. In this state of the record, the plaintiff in that suit, on the 19th day of March, 1889, without paying or tendering to the defendants the value of their improvements, caused a writ of possession to issue on the judgment in ejectment, and the marshal was about to put the defendants out of possession of the land, when they filed the present bill against the plaintiff in the ejectment suit and the marshal, setting up the foregoing facts, and their rights as occupying claimants, and praying that the execution of the writ of possession be enjoined until the complainants had been paid the value of their improvements on the land. The injunction was granted.

The defendant answered the bill, admitted the special finding of the jury in the ejectment suit, but denied that it was binding on either party as to the value of the land and improvements; alleged that it was merely made "for the purpose of that hearing, and for the purpose of appeal, if necessary;" that the land was worth more, and the improvements less, than was stated in the special finding; admitted the defendant had sued out a writ of possession upon the judgment in ejectment, "and that this defendant desires possession of said property, or that the said plaintiff shall proceed according to law to have the value of said property fixed, and duly tender to this defendant the value of said property."

The cause was heard on the bill, answer, and replication before Mr. Justice Brewer, then circuit judge, and it was decreed that the special verdict did not estop the parties on the question of the value of the land and improvements, and a master was appointed, with directions to ascertain and report (1) the value of the lasting and valuable improvements erected on the land by the complainants before they received actual notice of the defendant's claim; (2) the net annual value of the rents and profits received by the complainants after they received notice of the defendant's title by service of process, which amount was to be deducted from the value of the improvements; (3) the value of the land at the time the complainants went into possession thereof, or when they commenced to pay taxes thereon, as the case might be. On the 8th of November, 1890, the master reported that the value of the lasting improvements put upon the land by the complainants prior to receiving notice of the defendant's claim to the land was $10,868; that the value of the rents since the service of the process in ejectment was $180, leaving $10,188 as the net value of the improvements after deducting the rents; that the value of the land at the time the complainants became the actual occupants thereof, which was on the 28th day of April, 1881, was $1,800. The order of reference to the master embraced only these matters, but the parties stipulated that the master might report the value of the land without improvements at different dates, which he did as follows: The value of the land March 12, 1886, the date of the verdict in the ejectment suit, was $2,000; 12th of December, 1888, the date of the judgment in the suit, $4,500; 27th of December, 1889, the date of the order of reference to the master, $5,000; and at the date of the master's report, 8th of November, 1890, $5,500. No exceptions were filed to the master's report. J. H. McMurtry, having purchased the land from Rowena Young, was, upon his own motion, substituted as defendant. The court below decreed "that the defendant has the right to elect whether he will take the value of the land or shall pay for the improvements; and, the defendant having filed in court his election to take the value of the land, and tendered his deed therefor, and placed the same in the hands of the clerk of this court for future delivery, it is therefore considered and adjudged that, unless said plaintiff within ninety days pay to said defendant the sum of five thousand five hundred dollars, with interest from the date of the master's report, November 8, 1890, at seven per cent per annum, this injunction shall stand dissolved, and this cause be dismissed, at plaintiff's costs." From this decree the complainant appealed.

The sections of the Nebraska statute most material to the consideration of the case read as follows:

"4886. If upon the final hearing there shall be found a balance in favor of the occupant or unsuccessful claimants, the person proving the better title may either demand of the occupant or claimant the value of the real estate without improvements, as shown by the appraisal, and tender a general warranty deed for the real estate in question to such occupant or claimant, or he may pay into court the balance so found due such occupant or claimant within such time as the court shall allow in its final decree.

"4887. If the successful claimant shall elect to pay, and does pay, to the occupant or claimant the balance found due him on the final hearing within such time as the court shall direct, then a writ of possession shall be issued in his favor against such occupant, or decree shall be entered against such unsuccessful claimant, as the case may require.

"4888. If the successful claimant shall elect to receive the value of the real estate without improvements, to be paid by the occupants or claimant within such time as the court shall direct, and shall tender a general warranty deed for such real estate to the occupant or claimant, and such occupant or claimant shall refuse or neglect to pay said sum of money to the successful claimant within the time allowed by the court for that purpose, then such successful claimant shall deposit with the clerk of the court the amount found due the occupant or claimant, and thereupon a writ of possession shall be issued in favor of such successful claimant or decree shall be entered in his favor, as the case shall require.

"4889. The occupant or claimant shall in no case be evicted from the possession, or de-

Messrs. N. S. Harwood, John H. Ames, and T. M. Marquett, for appellants:

The enactment of 1807 by the commonwealth of Massachusetts, which remains in force substantially unchanged, is very nearly like the present statute of Nebraska.

The validity and construction of this statute were drawn in question in Jones v. Carter, 13 Mass. 318, and the validity was sustained.

The statute has since been frequently construed and enforced by the courts of Massachusetts, and its validity has not, to our knowledge, been disputed.

See Wales v. Coffin, 105 Mass. 328; 2 Story, Eq. par. 1:37.

The validity of the Michigan statute was drawn in question in Guild v. Kidd, 48 Mich. 307, and upheld. See also Ross v. Irving, 14 Ill. 171; Claypoole v. King, 31 Kan. 612; Puquette v. Pickness, 19 Wis. 219.

The statute is to be so construed whenever a case comes within its letter, that the person receiving the benefits and advantages of improvements shall make compensation.

Davis v. Powell, 13 Ohio, 308; Longworth v. Wolfington, 6 Ohio, 10.

Plaintiff is entitled to full value of all the improvements and ameliorations which he has made upon the estate to the extent of the additional value which they have conferred upon the land.

Bright v. Boyd, 2 Story, 605.

The Supreme Court of the United States has never held a law similar to ours unconstitutional, but, on the contrary, has repeatedly recognized the validity of such statutes, and also held that it was a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the state courts.

Miles v. Caldwell, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 44, 17 L. ed. 758; New Orleans v. Gaines, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 630, 21 L. ed. 23. See also Griswold v. Bragg, 18 Blatchf. 202; Withington v. Corey, 2 N. The Nebraska Act of 1883 came before the Supreme Court of Nebraska in Page v. Davis, 26 Neb. 675, in which case the court plainly recognizes the validity of the statute.

Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 491, 7 L. ed. 496, determined the correct practice in cases of this kind.

Mr. Joseph R. Webster, for appellees:

Under the Occupying Claimant's Law, upon 18 L. R. A.

a fair construction, the occupying claimant cannot require the successful claimant to pay for the improvements if he elect to accept the value of the land and make a conveyance.

Stephens v. Ballou, 25 Kan. 618.

If the wrongdoer can compel the unwilling owner to purchase the improvements or to abandon his property, then the Act is unconstitutional in that it passes the bounds of legal or equitable interference with the dominion and right of the owner, and by denying him remedy to recover his property in effect deprives him of his property without process of law by depriving him of remedy.

Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 547; McCoy v. Grandy, 8 Ohio St. 466; Nelson v. Allen, 1 Yerg. 383; Childs v. Shower, 18 Iowa, 267; Hearn v. Camp, 18 Tex. 545.

If these provisions are objectionable on constitutional grounds, then the former Act is still in force, as the present Act is a mere re-enactment of the former Act (with these changes), and the present Act is a mere continuation of the original Act of 1873, as is held by the supreme court of Nebraska in similar cases and by other courts.

State v. McColl, 9 Neb. 204; Re Hall, 10 Neb. 638; Fullerton v. Spring, 3 Wis. 871; Wright v. Oakley, 5 Met. 406; Erie Academy Trustees v. Erie, 31 Pa. 517.

As appellant has not sought remedy under the law of occupying claimants but brings original bill without tender of equity to enjoin appellee from obtaining possession of his own property, the dismissal of the bill must be affirmed.

The proceedings can be instituted only by the occupant; the proceedings are by application in the original suit (an action at law in ejectment) and not by bill in equity or yet any original action; the time is to be immediately after overruling of motion for new trial, or filing of mandate from supreme court.

Page v. Davis, 26 Neb. 671; Burlington & M. R. Co. v. Dobson, 17 Neb. 457.

Equity having obtained jurisdiction by complainant's bill, if the decree is not affirmed to its whole extent and the decree dismissing the bill affirmed, then equity will retain jurisdiction to do complete justice and modify the decree by making sale of the property and distribute the proceeds to the parties, according to their respective priorities and interests.

Stephens v. Ballou, 27 Kan. 594.

Caldwell, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is objected by the appellees that the mode of proceeding adopted by the complainants does not conform to the requirements of the Occupying Claimant's Law, and that the suit was brought out of time. Where a state statute creates a right and prescribes a mode of proceeding to enforce it in the state courts, the courts of the United States, in that state, will enforce the right, but not always in the mode prescribed for enforcing it in the state courts. The state courts may be authorized to enforce an equitable right by an action at law, or a legal demand by a suit in equity, or to confound the two jurisdictions in the same suit. But in the courts of the United States the distinction between legal and equitable rights and modes of proceeding must be observed. Those courts will enforce the right by the appropriate remedy, having regard to these distinctions. The Nebraska statute does not contemplate any proceeding to establish the occupant's claim for the improvements until after final judgment has been rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the ejectment suit. Any time after that, and while the occupant remains in possession, he may secure the benefits of the statute by applying to the court for the appointment of three appraisers, who are to assess the value of the land at the time the occupant went into possession, and the value of the valuable and lasting improvements erected thereon by the occupant prior to the time he received actual notice of the owner's claim, and to take and state an account of the rents and profits of the land received by the occupant after he had notice of the owner's title by the service of process. The title to the land is no longer in controversy. That issue has been tried to a jury. What remains to be done is to ascertain the value of the land and improvements, and take an account of the rents and profits as a basis for a decree. If these matters are solely cognizable at common law, then, as they exceed $20 in value, they must, under article 7 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, be submitted to a jury. But they are not, and never were, exclusively cognizable at common law. The mode of procedure prescribed by the statute which creates the right dispenses with a jury, and conforms very nearly to the established chancery practice. That the bill for injunction was well brought is indisputable. Whether the injunction should stand, and what decree should be rendered in the cause, depended upon the taking and stating of several accounts. The jurisdiction having attached on the injunction, the court will retain the cause, and take and state the accounts necessary to a final decree. Ober v. Gallagher, 98 U. S. 190, 28 L. ed. 829; Murray v. Van Gilder, 56 Iowa, 606. It would be no objection to the exercise of this jurisdiction if it called for adjudication upon purely legal rights, and conferred purely legal remedies, for, where the controversy is one in which a court of equity only can afford the relief prayed for, its jurisdiction is unaffected by the character of the questions involved. Preteca v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. 50 Fed. Rep. 674, 4 U. S. App. 826; Holland v. Challen, 110 U. S. 15, 28 L. ed. 52.

Courts of equity always had concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law in matters of account, where they were too complex for a jury to deal with them understandingly, or where, as in this case, the stating the account is in aid of an equity or right not adequately available at law. In the course of the proceeding, orders and decrees have to be passed, which, if not within the exclusive competency of a court of chancery, are undoubtedly within its jurisdiction. It is obvious that the flexible forms and modes of proceeding of a court of equity are much better adapted to the execution of the law than is the machinery of a common-law court. This was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States more than sixty years ago in a similar case. Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 491, 7 L. ed. 496. "It is not enough that there is a remedy at law; it must be plain and adequate, or, in other words, as practical and as efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity." Boyce v. Grundy, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 215, 7 L. ed. 657; Oelrichs v. Spain, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 211, 223, 21 L. ed. 43, 44; Preteca v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. supra.

The case being one of equitable cognizance, the Federal court, sitting in chancery, will execute the law by the customary chancery methods and modes of proceeding, and, if they are not adequate to the purpose, will devise methods that are. The equity practice in the courts of the United States is not regulated by the state statutes. Nevertheless, in the exercise of its chancery powers, the court below might have conformed to the state practice by directing the marshal to summon three appraisers, and this probably would have been the better way, as it is desirable, when a court of the United States is enforcing a right created by state statute, to follow, as near as may be, the practice prescribed by the state statute for the enforcement of the right secured thereby. But it was equally within the discretion of the court to appoint one or more commissioners, or to refer the matter, as was done, to a master. The appellants brought their suit in apt time, (Burlington & M. R. Co. v. Dobson, 17 Neb. 457; Page v. Davis, 26 Neb. 671,) and in the proper forum, (Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley, supra.)

It is now too late to question the constitutionality of statutes which secure to occupying claimants compensation for their improvements. The reasoning by which they are supported as just measures of public policy, and their constitutional validity maintained, is too trite to require or justify repetition. If authority can ever silence contention, then the validity of the Nebraska statute, as the court construes it, is not open to debate. For a list of the cases, see Childs v. Shower, 18 Iowa, 261, 269; Fee v. Coudry, 45 Ark. 410, 55 Am. Rep. 560; 10 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, title, Improvements. The cases cited by the learned counsel for the appellees have no application to the Nebraska statute. In Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 547, an early statute of Kentucky on the subject was held to be in conflict with the terms of the compact between Virginia and Kentucky and void for that reason. Nothing was decided affecting the constitutionality of such laws. In McCoy v. Grundy, 8 Ohio St. 468, it was decided that an Act which gives to the occupant the first option to take pay for his improvements, or to pay for the land and keep it, was unconstitutional. Under the Nebraska statute, the first option is given to the owner to pay for the improvements, and keep the property. And the complaint of the owner, in this case, is not that the statute does not give him the option to pay for the improvements and keep the land,—for it is conceded that the statute does give him that right,—but the complaint is that it does not also give him a further option to compel the occupant to buy the land at its appraised value, or forfeit his possession and all claim for his improvements. In his answers he says that he “desires . . . that the said plaintiff shall proceed according to law to have the value of said property fixed, and duly tender to this defendant the value of said property,” and that failing so to do, he be dispossessed. In the case of Childs v. Shower, supra, a statute which authorizes a general money judgment against the owner in favor of the occupant for the value of the improvements, and a general execution to enforce its action, was held unconstitutional; but under the Nebraska statute the value of the improvements is simply declared to be a lien on the land, and there is no provision for enforcing it, either by general or special execution. Statutes providing that the value of the improvements may be adjudged to be a lien on the land, and that the occupant may retain the possession until he has been paid the value of the improvements, are held valid everywhere. Ibid.; Fes v. Cowdry, supra; Claypoole v. King, 21 Kan. 612; Stephens v. Ballou, 27 Kan. 594; Page v. Davis, supra; Dworak v. More, 25 Neb. 741; Beard v. Danby, 48 Ark. 188.

In Arkansas the land is not valued, but only the improvements,—the value of which must be paid by the owner before he can dispossess the occupant. The value of the improvements is a lien on the land, to satisfy which the land may be sold. Mansf. Dig. Ark. chap. 55, §§ 2644, 2645. This statute, though retrospective in its operation, has always been held to be constitutional. Fes v. Cowdry and Beard v. Danby, supra. And in some states the failure of the owner to pay the assessed value of the improvements upon the land within the time fixed by the statute or the order of the court operates to extinguish his right of property in the land, and vests it in the occupant. Flynn v. Lemieux, 46 Minn. 458; Orsig v. Dunn, 47 Minn. 59; Stump v. Hornback, 94 Mo. 26, 85.

Complaint is made of the clause of the Act which provides that the land shall be valued as of the date of the occupant's entry. It will sometimes occur that the land was more valuable at the date of the occupant's entry than it is at the time of trial. As applied to such cases, is the provision obligatory? And is it only to be set aside when it would advantage the owner to do so? The question comes to this: Has the owner the exclusive right to fix the date for the valuation, and is this a right guaranteed to him by the Constitution of the state? We think not, and, if not, then it is a matter of practice and evidence resting in the discretion of the Legislature or the courts. If the Legislature does not fix the date, the courts must. The courts would probably differ as to what the date should be, and for the sake of uniformity, and to silence contention, it was a wise exercise of legislative discretion to make the rule uniform. The objection that the rule will not always operate equitably, if well founded in fact, cannot affect its constitutional validity; but it is by no means certain that the rule is inequitable. It is a familiar rule that the actual possession of land is notice to the whole world of the occupant's rights. In contemplation of law, the owner has notice of the occupant's entry upon the land, and his right of action accrues at that time. Having this notice, he is silent, and makes no claim. His moral obligation to speak is great. In the mean time the bona fide occupant, who purchased and paid for the land, goes forward, and makes valuable improvements upon it in the honest belief that he owns it. The owner finally breaks silence, and asserts his claim. After obtaining judgment for the land, he declines to pay the value of the improvements and keep his land, but demands of the occupant the value of the land. Is there any injustice in saying to such an owner, as this statute does in effect: “You were silent while the occupant in good faith was improving the land and adding to its value, and if you now decline to pay for the improvements, made under these conditions, you must be content to have the land valued as of the date you ought, in justice and fairness to the occupant, to have made known your claim.” This is but applying to this class of cases a principle as old as jurisprudence itself. The equity of the statute finds support in another view. It is the actual occupants of the lands of the country who lay out and open the public roads, build the schoolhouses, and erect and support churches; and it is these and such like public improvements that are the chief factors in increasing the value of the lands. As a rule, those who recover the lands from the bona fide settlers have contributed nothing towards these public improvements, and have done nothing to add to the value of the lands. As to them, the increase in value from these and such like causes is an unearned increment. But with the settlers on the lands it is otherwise. Their time and money have been expended in making and maintaining these public improvements, which, while they operate to increase the value of the lands, add nothing to the value of the improvements on the lands when they come to be valued separately from the lands. It is not very obvious, therefore, what superior equity the plaintiff has over the occupant to the increase in the value of the land, produced by the money and labor of the occupant. But the statute is impartial. It fixes as a uniform date for the valuation the date of the occupant's entry upon the land, without regard to the question whether the land was worth more or less at that time than at another. In its practical operation it may sometimes make for the occupant and sometimes for the owner, but it probably comes as near working out just results as any other fixed general rule that could be framed on the subject. At any rate, the Legislature thought so, and that concludes discussion.

The fact must not be overlooked that the improvements are valued as of the date when they are least valuable. The occupant is not entitled to their costs, nor to their value when new, but only to their value at the time of the trial, which must be measured by the benefits which the owner will receive from them in their then condition. Story, Eq. Jur. § 799; McMurray v. Day, 70 Iowa, 671; Childs v. Shover, supra. While time may add to the value of the land, it is constantly deteriorating and diminishing the value of the improvements.

The state of Nebraska has legislated twice on the subject of the rights of occupying claimants. The first Act was passed in 1878. That Act provided that the occupant should not be thrown out of possession until he had been paid the assessed value of the improvements, unless he refused, upon demand of the owner, to pay the appraised value of the land. Gen. Stat. Neb. 1878, chap. 51, § 1. The owner was given the option to pay the occupant the value of the improvements or to sell the land to the occupant at its appraised value at the date of the judgment; and, if he elected to sell, and the occupant declined to pay for the land within the time fixed by the court, he forfeited his possession and his improvements. Id. § 819. In practice it was found this Act afforded small protection to many occupants. As a rule, the settlers who improved the lands were not opulent. They were most commonly poor men, who invested all their means in the first purchase of their lands and in improving them, and when their titles failed they were without the means to purchase the lands a second time. This was the plight of most of the occupants who stood in need of the protection afforded by an occupying claimant's law, but under this Act there was no protection for them, unless they had money enough to buy the land a second time, and at its increased value. This they did not have, and as a result of their poverty the Act confiscated the improvements to the use of the successful plaintiff in the ejectment suit. This was the state of the law when the Act of February 23, 1883, was passed. That Act was obviously passed for the purpose of affording to the occupant a larger measure of protection than he enjoyed under the Act of 1878. This was effected by amending the statute in several important particulars. Under the Act of 1878 the land was valued as of the date of the judgment. By the Amendment of 1883 it is valued as of the date of the occupant's entry. Cobbey, Consol. Stat. Neb. 1891, chap. 47, § 4383. The first Act provided there should be a judgment in favor of the occupant for the value of the improvements without defining its nature or effect. By the last Act this judgment is termed a "decree," and it is declared "such decree shall constitute and be a lien on said real estate." Id. § 4385. By the first Act, if the occupant failed to pay the value of the land upon the owner's election to convey, he was dispossessed, and lost his improvements. By the last Act, if the occupant declines to purchase the land when a conveyance is tendered by the owner, the occupant still has the right of possession, and cannot be dispossessed until the owner deposits with the clerk of the court the value of the improvements. Id. § 4388. By the Act of 1883 it is provided that "the occupant or claimant shall in no case be evicted from the possession, or deprived of his right in the premises, except as provided in the two preceding sections. . . ." Id. § 4389. The two preceding sections are sections 4387 and 4388. The first provides that, if the owner elects to pay the value of the improvements, and does so, a writ of possession shall be issued in his favor; and the second that, if the owner elects to sell, and the occupant declines to buy, then the owner must deposit the value of the improvements with the clerk of the court before he can have a writ of possession. The Act as it appears in the general statutes still contains a clause which, taken by itself, would indicate a different policy. Its presence in the statute will now be explained. The Act is a long one. In amending it the old Act was copied in the main, the amendments being effected by striking out short sentences here and there in the sections and inserting others in their place; thus making the changes we have indicated. The last clause of the first section of the Act (sec. 4380) contains an implication to the effect that, unless the occupant pays the value of the land upon demand of the owner, he must be turned out of possession. This clause was in the original Act, and was proper enough there, and in harmony with the other provisions and the policy of that Act; but it is now plainly in conflict with the subsequent sections of the Act as amended in 1883, and with the obvious policy and purpose of those amendments, and was superseded by them.

Briefly, then, the legal effect of the amended Act is to give the occupant a lien on the land for the value of the improvements, and the possession of the land until the improvements are paid for. He does not forfeit his right of possession, or his right to receive pay for his improvements, by declining to accept the owner's offer to sell the land, as was the case under the Act of 1878. Nor does the owner forfeit his land by failing to pay for the improvements. The amended Act was designed to relieve the occupant from a forfeiture of his improvements upon his failure to pay for the land, and not to impose on the owner a forfeiture of his land upon his failure to pay for the improvements. The odious feature which forfeited the interest of one party in the property, if he was unable or unwilling to pay for the interest of the other, is eliminated from the statute. Their rights are reciprocal in the respect that they are nonforfeitable. The owner of the land has the election to pay the appraised value of the improvements and take the property. If he declines to do this within such time as the court shall direct, then the occupant, upon paying into court the appraised value of the land, is entitled to a decree vesting the title in him. Id. § 4389. Beyond this the statute in terms does not go. It makes no provision as to what shall be done when the owner declines to pay the appraised value of the improvements, and the occupant declines to pay the appraised value of the land. Where this is the case, a court of chancery will not decree that either party thereby forfeits his rights. Equity abhors penalties and forfeitures, and will enforce the rights of parties by more rational and equitable methods. A court of chancery may be compelled to enforce a hard bargain, but never makes one itself. Equality is equity, and, in the absence of a statute expressly giving priority to a decree for the value of the land over a decree for the value of the improvements, equity will treat the parties as having rights in the property in proportion to the value of the lands and improvements respectively, and will divide the property, or the fund derived from its sale, accordingly.

The Occupying Claimant's Law of Iowa, which has been in force for more than forty years, makes the occupant and owner, if neither pays the other, tenants in common in proportion to the value of their respective interests. Referring to this provision of the statute, the supreme court of that state says: "And we think the provision of the Act of 1851, making the parties, if neither paid the other, tenants in common, a most equitable way of adjusting the respective rights of the innocent owner of the property and the bona fide improver of the same." Childs v. Shower, supra. We agree with that court that the rule mentioned is an equitable and just method of adjusting the rights of the owner and occupant in such cases. Although what are usually termed "equitable considerations" may have induced the Legislature to enact the statute securing to the occupant the right to pay for his improvements, the right, when once established under the statute, becomes an absolute, vested, legal right, of equal dignity with the right of the owner to be paid the appraised value of the land. Flynn v. Lemieux, 46 Minn. 458; Craig v. Dunn, 47 Minn. 59. Neither is entitled to preference over the other. The statute makes none, and the courts should not arbitrarily discriminate. As was said by the Supreme Court of Arkansas in reference to the Occupying Claimant's Law of that state: "It is a rule for administering justice, and the principle of it is that no one ought to be enriched at the expense of another." Beard v. Dansby, 48 Ark. 183.

The Supreme Court of Kansas, in a general discussion of the Occupying Claimant's Law of that state, holds that, if the owner elects to take the value of the land, and tenders a deed, thereupon "the land, in law and equity, becomes the property of the" occupant, "and all the plaintiff is then entitled to is the value of the land." And the court adds: "In just what way he may recover that value the statute, as it now stands, does not prescribe. . . . Under the statute before it was amended in 1878, if the defendant did not pay the value of the land to the plaintiff within a reasonable time,—to be fixed by the court,—the plaintiff might then have his writ of eviction to obtain possession of the land; but under the law as it now stands he is not entitled to any such writ. Under the law as it now stands the plaintiff would probably be entitled to commence an independent action to subject the land with the improvement to the payment of his claim, and to sell his land with the improvements for that purpose, for undoubtedly his claim is a lien, and a prior lien upon the land.

It is possible, however, that the plaintiff may have some other remedy. It is not necessary, however, in this case, to determine what the plaintiffs' remedy, or their best remedy, is. . . ." Stephens v. Ballou, 27 Kan. 584.

The priority of lien in favor of the owner for the value of the land under the Kansas statute, it would seem, if it exists at all, is obtained by making the occupant an involuntary purchaser of the land, and compelling the owner to foreclose as upon a vendor's lien. We do not think this rule is applicable to the Nebraska statute. The spirit of that statute is what the letter of the statute is in Iowa; and where the owner does not pay for the improvements, and the occupant does not pay for the land, they should be regarded, in effect, as tenants in common in proportion to the value of their respective interests, with the sole right of possession in the occupant so long as the joint tenancy continues. How is this condition of things to be terminated? In a court of chancery the solution of this question is not difficult. The court, upon the motion of either the owner or the occupant, will decree the sale of the property, and distribute the proceeds of the sale to the parties in proportion to their respective interests. We agree with the views expressed in the brief of the learned counsel for appellees, that equity, having obtained jurisdiction, will retain it, to do complete justice, and finally settle the rights of the parties, and that to that end the court may decree a sale of the property and the distribution of the proceeds according to the rights of the parties.

We have sought to follow the view of the Supreme Court of the state of Nebraska in its interpretation of this statute as far as it has been called upon to construe it. We recognize the fact that the judicial department of every government is the rightful exponent of its laws, and especially its supreme law; and, should the Supreme Court of Nebraska hereafter put a different construction on this statute, this court will thereafter conform to that interpretation.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court to enter a decree confirming the master's report, and declaring that the value of the land at the date of the complainants' entry thereon was $1,800; that the value of the lasting and valuable improvements put upon the land by the complainants prior to receiving actual notice of the adverse claim of the defendant, after deducting therefrom the net annual value of the rents and profits of the lands received by the complainants after having received notice of defendant's title by service of process, is $10,180; that said sum constitutes a lien on the land, and that the complainants are entitled to retain the possession of the land until said sum is paid, or the land is sold as provided by the decree; that the defendant has the option to pay the value of the improvements at any time within ninety days after the entry of the decree, and upon the payment thereof into the registry of the court all right and claim of the complainants to the possession of the land and the improvements thereon shall be thereby extinguished, and the defendant shall immediately be let into the possession of said property; that if said defendant shall decline to exercise his option to pay for the improvements and take the property, the complainants shall, for ninety days after the expiration of the defendant's option, have the option to pay the appraised value of the land, and upon the payment thereof into the registry of the court the defendant shall execute and deliver to the complainants, or deposit in the clerk's office for them, a deed for said land, and, failing so to do, the decree shall operate to vest the legal title to said lands in the complainants; that, if the defendant declines to exercise his option to pay the value of the improvements and take the property within the time specified, and the complainants decline to exercise their option to pay the value of the land within the time specified, then, upon the motion of either the said defendant or the complainants, the court will direct said land, with the improvements thereon, to be sold by the master, after giving the usual notice, to the highest bidder for cash in hand. The master shall make the purchaser a deed for the property, which shall have the effect to vest in the purchaser all the right, title, estate, and interest of the said defendant and the complainants in said land and the improvements thereon, and said purchaser shall be let into the possession of the same. After paying costs of the suit, the remaining proceeds of the sale of said land and improvements shall be paid to the complainants and the defendants in the proportion that the value of the improvements bears to the value of the land.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. Damages caused by an injunction erroneously granted in the exercise of jurisdiction where the proceedings have been regular cannot be recovered from the party who obtained and served it, in the absence of an undertaking, unless the prosecution was malicious and without probable cause.

2. Damages resulting from obedience to an injunction which is utterly void, and under which no action has been taken by the plaintiff, cannot be recovered by the defendant, but result from his voluntary and needless act.

3. A person cannot be permitted to allege for one purpose that an injunction was utterly void and in the same action deny such allegation for another purpose.

4. An injunction which merely exceeds the relief demanded by perpetually restraining licensees from manufacturing a patented article without in express

NOTE.—Right to recover damages caused by an injunction.

The law is well settled that no right of action exists for damages sustained in consequence of an injunction except when founded upon an injunction bond or undertaking, unless the injunction was obtained maliciously and without probable cause. Robinson v. Kellum, 6 Cal. 399; Cox v. Taylor, 10 B. Mon. 17; Lexington & O. R. Co. v. Applegate, 8 Dana, 239, 33 Am. Dec. 497; Hayden v. Keith, 32 Minn. 277; Manlove v. Vick, 55 Miss. 567; Keber v. Mercantile Bank, 4 Mo. App. 195; Iron Mountain Bank v. Mercantile Bank, 4 Mo. App. 506; Campbell v. Carroll, 35 Mo. App. 643; St. Louis v. St. Louis Gas Light Co. 32 Mo. 349; Sturgis v. Knapp, 33 Vt. 517.

In St. Louis v. St. Louis Gas Light Co., supra, the court says: "A suit in which no bond or undertaking is provided for by law or executed by the court as to any damages resulting to the defendant from a legitimate prosecution thereof presents an instance of damnum absque injuria, and is like any ordinary suit which leaves the defendant heir to much incumbrance and pecuniary loss, notwithstanding a final judgment in his favor.

For the same reasons the amount of damages, except in cases of malice and lack of probable cause, is limited to the amount of the bond or undertaking. Lawton v. Green, 64 N. Y. 328; Palmier v. Foley, 91 N. Y. 103; Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. Toel, 85 N. Y. 646.

In Gorton v. Brown, 27 Ill. 489, 81 Am. Dec. 245, it is held that where a bond has been given an action thereon is exclusive, and no action for malicious prosecution can be brought.

But this case stands alone against the decisions of various courts upholding an action for malicious prosecution based on an injunction obtained maliciously and without probable cause. Cox v. Taylor, Keber v. Mercantile Bank, and Iron Mountain Bank v. Mercantile Bank, supra; Mitchell v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 398.

So in Newark Coal Co. v. Upson, 40 Ohio St. 17, a malicious injunction is held sufficient to sustain an action for malicious prosecution, although the report does not show whether or not a bond had been given.

In Illinois, New York, Wisconsin, and probably other states, the statutes provide for an assessment of damages in the injunction suit, but it does not appear that in any of these states this statutory provision is construed to change the law as to the right to damages where a bond has not been given; but it seems to be regarded merely as settling the controverted question whether a right to damages could be enforced in the injunction suit, or whether a separate action must be brought therefor.

In some cases it has been said that a court of chancery has inherent power to assess damages in an injunction case, but in no case does this expression seem to have been used with respect to the right to damages, but only with respect to the remedy or proceeding for enforcing the right when it exists.

Right to damages for obeying a void injunction.

In Robertson v. Smith, 15 L. R. A. 273, 129 Ind. 422, it is held, after an elaborate review of the authorities, that the plaintiff in an injunction suit is es-terms merely forbidding it under the license is not wholly void, although it would be in excess of the jurisdiction if regarded as restraining future infringement, but should be construed as a restraint upon manufacture under the contract, and as erroneous simply because open to possible misconstruction, and therefore valid until reversed.

(October 4, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Circuit in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful use by defendants of an injunction to prevent plaintiff from manufacturing under a certain patent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McCarthy & Berier, for appellant:

He who obtains an order from a court of general jurisdiction, and procures the same to be served on his opponent in order to take advantage to himself, is estopped to say that this order ought to be disobeyed.

High, Inj. § 1652; Bigelow, Estoppel, 368; Robertson v. Smith, 15 L. R. A. 273, 129 Ind. 422; Walton v. Develing, 61 Ill. 201; Bowne v. Mellor, 6 Hill, 496; People v. Falconer, 2 Sandf. 81; Sterenson v. Miller, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 310, 18 Am. Dec. 271; Strosser v. Ft. Wayne, 100 Ind. 452; Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415, 26 L. ed. 187; Cumberland Coal & Iron Co. v. Hoffman Steam Coal Co. 39 Barb. 16; Adams v. Olive, 57 Ala. 249; Hanna v. McKenzie, 5 B. Mon. 314, 43 Am. Dec. 122; Carver v. Carver, 77 Ind. 498; Hoy v. Rogers, 4 T. B. Mon. 235.

A void order of a court which contains a command, impliedly sanctioned by a threat, is topped from denying his liability upon his injunction bond on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the person of the defendant in the injunction suit.

This case somewhat criticises but does not directly overrule Jenkins v. Parkhill, 25 Ind. 473, in which an undertaking for an injunction was held void when the injunction was issued without jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

The court, though evidently dissatisfied with the earlier decision, regarded the difference between jurisdiction over the subject-matter and that over the person of the defendant sufficient to distinguish them, and thus to make it unnecessary to pass directly on the question involved in the earlier case.

In Cumberland Coal & Iron Co. v. Hoffman Steam Coal Co., 39 Barb. 16, the want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter of an injunction, which was property situated in another state, while the court had jurisdiction of the parties, was held not to prevent a liability for damages on an injunction undertaking. The injunction plaintiff was held estopped from denying the jurisdiction.

In the same case it is held that one who obeys an injunction before process is served upon him may have relief on his injunction bond the same as if the service had been made.

In other cases the general doctrine has been plainly declared that those who execute an injunction bond on which an injunction is wrongfully issued cannot be released from their obligation upon the bond on the ground that the injunction was issued without authority and might safely have been disregarded. Adams v. Olive, 57 Ala. 18 L. R. A.

a trespass ab initio; persons to obtain the order, and those who execute it, are jointly and severally liable.

Fischer v. Langbein, 103 N. Y. 89.

An injunction order is enforced as soon as it is served, and it carries with it the implied menace of punishment, in case it shall be disobeyed.

Since it comes from a court of general jurisdiction, and is armed with the vulgar terrors of the law, it is as much duress per minas as if the sheriff had locked the defendant's doors, and placed a guard over them.

Koehler v. Farmers & D. Nat. Bank, 21 N. Y. S. R. 361; Bacon, Abr. Actions on the Case, F.; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1; Curry v. Pringle, 11 Johns. 444.

Mr. Henry H. Man, with Messrs. A. P. Man & W. Man, for respondents:

Either the superior court had jurisdiction or it had not. In either case there was no cause of action by Mark, one of the defendants in the superior court, against Mrs. Hyatt.

It is not even necessary that a void mandate should be set aside as a preliminary to bringing an action for what has been done under it. Day v. Bach, 87 N. Y. 56.

Mark need not have obeyed the injunction if void.

People v. Edison, 20 Jones & S. 58; Dickey v. Reed, 78 Ill. 261; State v. Voorhies, 37 La. Ann. 605; Jenkins v. Parkhill, 25 Ind. 473.

Malicious prosecution is the only remedy for unjustly setting a court in motion. This action cannot be maintained as one for malicious prosecution.

Malice and want of probable cause must concur.

Addison, Torts, p. 219; English ed. chap. 7, § 2; Marks v. Townsend, 97 N. Y. 590; Day v.

249; Hanna v. McKenzie, 5 B. Mon. 314, 43 Am. Dec. 122; Stevenson v. Miller, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 303, 18 Am. Dec. 271; Walton v. Develing, 61 Ill. 201.

In Joelyn v. Dickinson, 71 Ill. 25, it is said that it is improper to adjust the payment of damages for an injunction against the collection of a judgment if the injunction was a nullity and imposed no restriction whatever upon the collection of the judgment; but the court allowed attorneys' fees to the defendant in the injunction, and it clearly appears that the basis of the decision was not a denial of the right to recover damages sustained by obeying a void injunction, but merely a denial that in that case any damages had been caused except the attorneys' fees, for which a recovery was allowed.

In the main case above reported it does not appear that any bond or undertaking for an injunction was given, but the injunction complained of was made a part of an interlocutory decree for an accounting and a release or cancellation of a license for a patent. No malice or bad faith on the part of the injunction plaintiff is found; therefore the decision is directly in line with the whole current of decisions, which deny any right to damages caused by an injunction where no bond has been given, and where there is no such malice and want of probable cause as will sustain a suit for malicious prosecution. The hardship imposed by this rule on a defendant in an injunction where no bond is given, by compelling him to decide at his peril on the validity of the injunction, seems very unjust, and can be avoided only by requiring a bond or undertaking in every case as a condition of granting an injunction.

B. A. R.

Back, 14 Jones & S. 460, and cases cited, affirmed 87 N. Y. 56.

Hence, where damage has been caused by an injunction, the only remedy is upon the statutory undertaking unless the plaintiff alleges and proves all the elements of an action for malicious prosecution.

It would have been necessary in order to show want of probable cause to prove that Mrs. Hyatt knew that the superior court had not jurisdiction.

Edred v. Faudroy, 16 N. Y. S. R. 83.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The injury alleged in this action, and for which compensation is sought, originated in the operation and effect of a previous judgment obtained by Elizabeth Hyatt, one of the present defendants. In that action she sued the firm of Mark & Ingalls under a contract to manufacture, as her licensees, a patented article. Her complaint set out the terms of that agreement, which showed a license granted by her for the term of her patents and of any reissues thereof; the licensees binding themselves to pay a specific royalty, and to render due and correct accounts of their manufacture. The validity of the patents, and the consequent right of their owner, were thus recognized; and the licensees, while the agreement stood, could not call in question the title of the patentee. Her complaint further alleged that an account had been refused, and payment of the royalties withheld; that the licensees were wholly irresponsible; and asked as relief an accounting and recovery of the royalties due; that the license granted should be delivered up to be canceled, and the licensees be enjoined from further manufacture under the agreement. Of this action the court had full and undoubted jurisdiction, and all the relief asked was clearly within its authority. The plaintiff sought no decree beyond its admitted power to grant. An answer was served, denying most of the material averments of the complaint, and upon the issues joined the case was heard at special term. The court rendered an interlocutory judgment in favor of the plaintiff, which ordered an accounting before a referee, directed a cancellation and revocation of the license, and awarded an injunction, which exceeded the relief demanded in that it restrained the licensees perpetually from manufacturing the patented article, without in express terms merely forbidding it under the license. That judgment was erroneous in part, but not void for want of jurisdiction to hear and determine the action; that existed both as to the parties and the subject-matter. There was power to grant an injunction, but the power was erroneously exercised in not explicitly limiting its operation. That error is claimed to have been in excess of the jurisdiction, outside of and beyond it, and so the injunction was wholly void; but it was not so treated. A copy of it was served upon the licensees, and they, with full liberty to disregard it, elected not to do so, but to obey it, and deem it valid until reversed. The copy was served upon them on the 1st day of May, 1888. They were not bound to take the risk of disobedience, but, while free to do so, were at liberty to proceed against it by appeal. They chose that remedy. They appealed from the judgment, and on the 5th of June obtained an order staying the effect and operation of the judgment, and leaving them free, pending the appeal, from the restraint of the injunction. They might probably have obtained that order earlier, and so have protected themselves from all substantial loss; but from May 1st to June 5th they claim to have submitted to the injunction, to have discontinued their manufacture, and to have suffered thereby damages, to recover which the present action of trespass was brought. The complaint for that alleged wrong was dismissed on the trial, and the general term have affirmed the dismissal.

It seems to me that the plaintiff founds his argument upon two inconsistent theories, and constructs it by shifting unconsciously from one to the other, as the emergency requires. The judgment against him in the prior suit, so far as it awarded an injunction, was either utterly void for excess of jurisdiction or was merely an erroneous exercise of jurisdiction. It could not be both, for the two things are totally inconsistent, and the truth of the one inevitably involves the falsity of the other. The learned counsel for the appellant argues, first, that he had a right to treat the injunction as operative, as valid, until reversed, and so as merely erroneous, and not wholly void; the consequence following that the damages occasioned were the product of the process, caused by its compulsion, and not by the needless and voluntary act of the party enjoined; that the then plaintiff is bound by that construction, and may not, after having obtained and served the injunction, defend against its consequences by asserting it to have been granted without jurisdiction. To all that I agree, and concede that the authorities cited fully justify the contention. The plaintiff here may hold his adversary to that theory, but in that event must also stand upon it himself, for it cannot be at the same time both utterly void and good until reversed. The result of that reasoning is that, while there may have been damages, there was no trespass. The patentee lawfully and fairly submitted her rights to the decision of the court. While the judgment rendered was in one respect erroneous, neither the party nor the court was therefore a trespasser. Some injury or inconvenience quite often flows from the operation of an erroneous judgment pending the appeal, which ends in a reversal; but there is no trespass, and no trespasser. To some extent the evil is prevented by provisions which stay the execution of the judgment, and authorize a summary restitution; but no action of trespass will lie to recover the damages unless the prosecution is alleged and proved to have been malicious, and without probable cause. We have held that doctrine quite firmly and clearly in cases of injunctions, declaring in substance that, although the restraining order ought not to have been granted, and was set aside for that reason, yet the damages incurred, where the proceedings have been regular, cannot be recovered in the absence of an undertaking, except upon the basis of a malicious prosecution. Lawton v. Green, 64 N. Y. 326; Palmer v. Foley, 71 N. Y. 106. Nothing in this case warrants any such action, and it necessarily follows that upon the theory which plaintiff adopted, and on which his claim for damages rests, and to which he resolutely holds his adversary, there was no cause of action established, and the courts below properly dismissed the complaint.

But here the appellant suddenly shifts his ground, and claims that the judgment, instead of being merely erroneous, and valid until reversed, was never valid at all, so far as the injunction was concerned, but void utterly at the moment of its rendition. If that be true, the damages claimed resulted, not from the void process, but from the voluntary and needless act of the appellant in view of its existence. No action was taken under it by the then plaintiff. Neither the person nor the property of the appellant was touched or seized. When a void warrant of arrest or order of attachment is issued, the granting of the process is not necessarily a trespass, and none may exist until it is in some manner executed. It is the arrest or the levy which constitutes the trespass, and not the mere granting of the process. The injunction, if absolutely void, was a nullity. It could not and did not restrain the manufacture. If the appellant ceased work, the act was his own, and both voluntary and needless. It originated in no compulsion, for there was nothing to compel, and nobody compelling. But he answers that the mere service of a copy of the judgment was a trespass, because the then plaintiff could not be heard to say that the injunction which she caused to be served was void and ineffective. But on the theory now under consideration it is not the defendant who asserts the void character of the process, but the plaintiff himself, driven to it by the necessity of providing some sort of foundation on which to build up a claim of trespass, and he cannot assert it for his purpose, and deny it when it serves hers. But, as already intimated, I do not think the injunction was absolutely void. Jurisdiction in the action was full and complete. This court so held upon the appeal. There was authority to grant an injunction, but the remedy was declared to be needless, and so improper, in view of the revocation of the license by the judgment rendered. Ilyatt v. Ingalls, 124 N. Y. 98.

Regarded as restraining a future infringement, the injunction would have been in excess of the jurisdiction; but, in view of the pleadings, of the findings, and of the general relief awarded, it may and should be construed as a perpetual restraint upon a manufacture under the contract, and was erroneous simply because open to possible misconstruction, and needless and superfluous, when construed, as it should be, as not transcending the jurisdiction. And this view of it as a decree voidable, and not void, and valid until reversed, is the view upon which plaintiff acted, by force of which only he can assert damages suffered by compulsion, and which he ought not to be permitted to allege for one purpose, and at the same time deny for another. We find no error in the record, and the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

RAMSEY COUNTY

v.

MACALASTER COLLEGE.

(.....Minn..... ..)

- *1. A college owns forty acres of land, on which the college buildings are situated. On a part of the tract, near the college buildings, the college has erected several houses as places of residence for the professors or faculty such premises being used for no other purpose. Held, that the premises used for that purpose are within the statutory exemption from taxation.
2. About twenty acres of the land are in a state of nature, partially covered with forest trees and partially swampy, never having been improved or used. It is contemplated that the property will be improved and devoted to the use of the college as a place of recreation at some indefinite future time, such use being, perhaps, needful. Held, that the property is not now exempt from taxation.

(December 1, 1902.)

CASE CERTIFIED from the District Court for Ramsey County to determine the validity of certain taxes which had been assessed against defendant. Decision of the lower court affirmed in part, reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas D. O'Brien, for plaintiff:

Dwelling houses and land are not exempt because gentlemen who hold the positions of college professors live in them.

The evidence shows that the 20.023 acres is simply a tract of land unimproved, owned by the college and contiguous to what may be termed the college grounds proper. This tract

Mr. H. J. Horn for defendant.

Dickinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This matter, certified to this court from the district court pursuant to statute, presents the question of the taxability of a part of a tract of land owned by Macalaster College, upon which tract the college building and other structures are situated. The entire tract to which reference is made is the east forty acres of a certain quarter section of land, being about one half of a mile long, north and south, and about one eighth of a mile wide, east and west. About six acres of this are within the limits of streets, by which the tract is surrounded. The college is an incorporated educational institution, fitly denominated a college, its curriculum being such as is usually pursued in our secular colleges. This forty-acre tract was donated to the corporation for the purposes of the college, being conveyed to it in fee about ten years ago. That part of the tract comprising the south twenty acres (20.023 acres) is mostly covered with forest trees, and, as was shown on the hearing, was in part swampy. It has not been improved, or put to any actual and necessary use by the college. It may be deemed to have been the intention of the trustees to improve and beautify this part of the grounds when they should be financially able to do so, and to make it an attractive place of resort by the students for recreation and pleasure; but the time when this may be expected to be done was not shown, and seems to be wholly indefinite. This part of the tract was taxed, and the district court sustained the taxation, holding that it was not exempt. A part of the tract off the north end, comprising nearly eight acres, (7.867 acres,) was also taxed, and this taxation was sustained by the district court. On this part of the land the college erected five dwelling-houses (four of which are still standing) for the use of its professors or faculty, so that they might be conveniently located near the main college building. These buildings have never been leased or used for profit, but they have been occupied by the professors without charge for rent. The evidence shows that the college pays to its professors stated salaries and the use of a house. The remainder of the tract, comprising about twelve acres, lying between the parts above referred to, was not taxed, being deemed to be exempt under the Constitution and the statute. On this part of the premises there has been constructed and is in use the main college building, with dormitories for students, and a library building; and here also is the campus and grounds used by the students for athletic games. The college has not less than 100 students, a large part of whom occupy the dormitories in the college building. There are no fences or other visible divisions of the forty-acre tract. None of the premises have ever been used for profit.

The Constitution (art. 9, § 3) provides that public burying grounds, public schoolhouses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property used for religious purposes, and houses of worship, . . . shall, by general laws, be exempt from taxation." By statute (Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 11, § 5) it is declared that "all public schoolhouses, academies, colleges, universities, and seminaries of learning, with the books and furniture therein, and the grounds attached to such buildings, necessary for their proper occupancy, use, and enjoyment, and not leased or otherwise used with a view to profit; houses used exclusively for public worship, and the lot or parts of lots upon which such houses are erected,"—shall be exempt from taxation. The question is whether the south twenty acres and the north eight acres, respectively, are within the exemption thus declared by reason of being necessary for the proper occupancy, use, and enjoyment of the college. We will first consider this with reference to the north eight acres, occupied as places of residence by the professors. It is contended that the former decisions of this court in St. Peter's Church v. Scott County Comrs. 12 Minn. 895, (Gil. 280); Hennepin County v. Grace, 27 Minn. 508, and Ramsey County v. Church of the Good Shepherd, 45 Minn. 229, 11 L. R. A. 175, are opposed to this claim of exemption. But those cases are so different from this that they are not of controlling influence as respects the question now presented. The results in those cases were determined by the construction of a different clause of the Exemption Law from that which controls the determination in the matter now before us. The question in each of the cases cited was whether a church, parsonage, or rectory should be construed as included within the language of the exemption statute, "houses used exclusively for public worship," or (as was also considered in the last of these cases) within the language of the Constitution, "church property used for religious purposes." Those decisions might have been different if the language applicable to church property had been, as it is with respect to colleges and institutions of learning, "the grounds attached to such buildings, [churches,] necessary for their proper occupancy, use, and enjoyment." It is, however, settled by these and many other decisions that such exemption laws are to be strictly construed. What, then, is the meaning, as applied to such institutions as are referred to in the law, of the language, "and the ground attached to such buildings, necessary for their proper occupancy, use, and enjoyment, and not leased," etc.? This word "necessary" should not be read in its strictest sense, restricting the exemption to the land actually occupied by such college buildings as are devoted to the purposes of class rooms, lecture rooms, libraries, and the accommodation of students. The language has this broader meaning, viz., "reasonably necessary or appropriate for the proper occupancy, use and enjoyment of the institution." Hennepin County v. Brotherhood of Gethsemane, 27 Minn. 460, 462, 463; Hennepin County v. Grace, supra. What uses may be thus appropriate, within the limits of reasonable necessity, has been left to be determined with reference to the circumstances of each case. Construing the statutory exemption as above indicated, we are of the opinion that it embraces the property in question, devoted to the use of the college as places of residence for the professors. This occupancy by the faculty without rent, and under circumstances rendering their occupancy and use incidental to their relation to the college under contracts for their personal services, the ordinary relation of landlord and tenant was not created. East Norway Lake N. E. L. Church Trustees v. Froislie, 37 Minn. 447. Such occupants acquired no estate or interest in the property. Its appropriation to such purposes seems to have been primarily and directly for the benefit of the college although incidentally this may have contributed to the convenience and benefit of these persons. But even their convenience, as affected by the use of these residences in the immediate vicinity of the college, was associated with the performance of duties in behalf of the institution; duties which would seem to render it highly expedient that they should reside near the college. It is unnecessary to advert to the ordinary duties of the professors as instructors, calling them to the class rooms at various hours of the day. Aside from this, while the facts are not as fully presented as may have been desirable, we understand that, as is the case generally in such institutions, the duties of the professors are not confined merely to instruction in the class or lecture rooms, but that they exercise such supervision and personal influence over the daily conduct and life of the students as is necessary during the period of youth. It appears that the students here are of ages from fourteen years upwards. Aside from what relates to mere educational work in its narrow sense, the duties of those to whom it is committed to guide, superintend, control, and influence youthful students, removed from home surroundings, are not only important but constant. No more need be said to suggest to the mind the reasonable necessity that those upon whom rests the direction of affairs in the ordinary government and work of the college should have the advantage of residence in immediate vicinity to the college. A reasonable means of securing this advantage is for the college to provide residences for its faculty and governing officers. When this institution was founded, a few years ago, as the evidence shows, there were no other houses in the vicinity, and there was an apparent and present necessity for the construction of these houses for the use of the college. If, possibly, the need for maintaining them for the same purpose has now become less imperative, (which is not shown,) it may well be deemed still an appropriate use of the property within the limits of reasonable necessity, so that the college may always have its faculty located in the immediate vicinity of the institution; otherwise it might often occur that professors and tutors would be unable to find residences, except at such a distance as to impair in some degree their usefulness. We therefore hold that such property is exempt. There is no claim made that the amount of property so used is unreasonable, but only that the use of it is such as not to bring it within the exemption. The following authorities go to sustain the views we have expressed: Hennepin County v. Grace, supra; State v. Ross, 24 N. J. L. 497; Pierce v. Cambridge, 2 Cush. 611; Grinnold College Trustees v. State, 46 Iowa, 275. While the case of Pierce v. Cambridge was not like this, the court expressed the opinion that, under circumstances such as are here presented, the property would be exempt.

As to the twenty acres of unoccupied land, we have come to the conclusion that it is not within the declared exemption. The cases in which the question of the direct taxability of railroad property has been considered, such as Ramsey County v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33 Minn. 537; Todd County v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 38 Minn. 163,—and others involving similar questions, have but little bearing upon the question now before us, for the reason that those cases did not relate to the question of exemption from taxation, but rather to the proper method of taxation, the use of the property, actual or contemplated, being regarded as decisive as to whether it should be subject to direct taxation, or whether the proper contribution to the state on account of such property should be regarded as included in the percentage paid on the earnings of the railroad. The question here is as to the absolute exemption of this property under the statute above recited. It may be that, if the twenty acres of land now referred to had been subjected to actual use for purposes of recreation, it might have been exempt. The question would have been as to the reasonableness of the quantity of the land so used, and that would depend to some extent upon various circumstances. But such is not the case. The land is not occupied, used, or enjoyed, and it can hardly be said that, within the meaning of the statute, it is at present "necessary" for the "proper occupancy, use, and enjoyment" of the college. Even if it is not to be said that such language refers to an existing or present need and use, it is at least to be said that it does not naturally refer to or comprehend cases where the use of the property is to be postponed to an indefinite future time. Hence, observing the principle of strict construction, it should not be construed to embrace all property, however extensive, actually owned by the institution, even though it is needed for present use, if, in fact, not being presently useful, it is only intended to make it so at some indefinite future time. The result might be different if the premises were about to be subjected to the occupancy or use for which they are needful.

The determination of the District Court as to the 8-acre tract, is reversed, and as to the 20-acre tract it is affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

John V. FARWELL et al., Appts.,
v.

Daniel COHEN.

(138 Ill. 216.)

1. A voluntary transfer by an insolvent of certain specified property in trust to sell enough of it to pay certain specified debts and return the remainder is, regardless of the form of the instrument, an assignment, within the meaning of Act May 22, 1877, conferring jurisdiction on county courts to supervise the execution of trusts growing out of voluntary assignments for creditors.
2. A creditor of the assignor may be assignee in an assignment for benefit of creditors.
3. A voluntary assignment which on its face includes only part of the debtor's property and contains no general terms descriptive of property is not converted into a general assignment of all the debtor's unexempt property by Act May 22, 1877, which provides that an assignment for creditors shall not be void for want of any list or inventory, and that a list or inventory shall not be conclusive, but that the assignee shall take title to "any other property not exempt by law . . . comprehended within the general terms" of the assignment.
4. A partial assignment for particular creditors is included within the provisions of Act May 22, 1877, which provides that an assignment shall include "any other property . . . comprehended within the general terms of the same" and that all debts and liabilities are to be paid pro rata "from the assets thereof" and the trust is enlarged by the statute which makes it inure to the benefit of all the creditors.
5. Failure to acknowledge and record an assignment for creditors as required by a statute which contains no negative words declaring it void for such failure will not prevent the assignment from becoming operative.
6. A claim by an assignor and assignee that an assignment for creditors is a trust for certain creditors only as they intended it, estops them from claiming that it is invalid for lack of acknowledgment and recording when it is held to inure under the statute to the benefit of all creditors.
7. A petition by a creditor or some other party in interest is a proper way to call upon the court to declare a deed of trust for certain creditors to be in effect an assignment for all creditors.

(June 10, 1891).*

*A decision was originally reached in this case affirming the decision of the appellate court and an opinion handed down by Chief Justice Magruder embodying the views which appear in his dissenting opinion herewith given. A rehearing was subsequently granted after which the decision was reached as evidenced by the opinion given herewith.

NOTE.—Although the above decision as to the effect of a partial assignment for particular creditors rests upon provisions of the Illinois statute, it is of great practical importance by reason of its subject-matter as well as the establishing of a precedent for the construction of similar statutes elsewhere.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Vermillion County which in turn affirmed a judgment of the County Court sustaining a demurrer to the answer in a proceeding to have a transaction declared to be an assignment for benefit of creditors and to have the assignees removed and another one appointed and to have the court supervise the distribution of the assets in accordance with the provisions of the statute. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Smith & Pence, John Maynard Harlan and Kraus, Mayer & Stein, for appellants:

The debtor being shown to be insolvent, if this instrument be in its nature an assignment and not a mere mortgage, it will, under the statute, vest the entire property of the debtor in the assignee, even though in the deed the debtor has failed to enumerate some of his property.

Freydendall v. Baldwin, 103 Ill. 838.

The transaction is marked by all the indicia of a voluntary assignment.

See Cadwell's Bank v. Crittenden, 66 Iowa, 240.

The Missouri Statute of 1855, which in this respect is the same as ours, was construed in Shapleigh v. Baird, 26 Mo. 825, and it was held that it did not invalidate partial assignments for the benefit of a portion of the creditors of the assignor, but that it had the effect of overthrowing all provisions in such partial assignments, giving preferences among the designated creditors.

The term "voluntary" is applied to assignments to distinguish them from such as are made by the compulsion of the law.

Manny v. Logan, 27 Mo. 528; Burrill, Assignment, 4th ed. p. 8, § 2.

Chief Justice Redfield, in Mussey v. Noyes & Baldwin, 26 Vt. 478, says: "An assignment which includes all one's attachable property, and which is intended to close up one's business, and does so at once, is clearly a general assignment."

Noyes v. Hickok, 27 Vt. 86; Holt v. Bancroft, 30 Ala. 200; Dana v. Lull, 17 Vt. 390.

When a debtor has made a general disposition of all his property and effects, and suspended his whole business in consequence thereof, thereby declaring insolvency, his act in so doing constitutes a voluntary assignment under the statute; and it is immaterial whether that act be effectuated by one or more instruments, provided they are parts of one and the same transaction, in and by which the debtor so disposes of his property. The Assignment Statute is remedial in its nature and intended to prevent preferences, and must be liberally construed, in the very nature of things, in order to accomplish the purposes for which it was enacted. The courts look beyond the edent for the construction of similar statutes elsewhere.

For note on the general question what operates as an assignment for creditors, see Akers v. Rowan (S. C.) 10 L. R. A. 707.

Clapp v. Nordmeyer, 25 Fed. Rep. 71; Pres-ton v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208.

In Englebert v. Blanot, 2 Whart. 240, the court construed a bill of sale to a party to pay himself and three others to be an assignment.

In Miners Bank of Pottsville's App., 57 Pa. 193, the assignor had conveyed or assigned part of his property, to be divided amongst certain creditors named, pro rata, there being other creditors, but not sufficient property to pay them. It was held that the act prohibiting preferences in assignments applied to the case, and that the assignment inured to the benefit of all the creditors.

If the facts are such as to show that at the time of making a mortgage, preferring one creditor over another, the debtor must have known he was insolvent, it will be within the statute.

The requirement that the assignment be recorded, when read in the light of the analogy of our laws in reference to the recording of an instrument, obviously has reference to the protection of subsequent purchasers without notice.

The vesting of the title is as little dependent upon the acknowledgment of the deed as upon recording.

The requirements of acknowledgment and recording are conditions subsequent, not conditions precedent, to the vesting of title in the assignee.

Messrs. Tenney, Bashford & Tenney and E. R. E. Kimbrough, also for appellants;

When an insolvent debtor makes a transfer by which substantially all his property is placed in the hands of one who is to dispose of the same, and from the proceeds pay other creditors of the grantor, the transaction, whatever be its form, is in law an assignment for the benefit of creditors within the true meaning of the statutes regulating such transfers. If its effect upon the debtor's property is substantially what would be accomplished by a regular assignment, it will be held to be one, even though the parties may claim that they intended to have it operate in quite a different manner. The courts give to the transfer the effect which the statute prescribes.

In all the states, which, like our own, merely declare the preferential features void, the courts have been uniform in giving a broad and liberal construction to the statute, in order that its equitable purpose may not be judicially defeated by a narrow and technical reading of its terms.

160; Weil v. Polack, 30 Fed. Rep. 813; Woonsocket Rubber Co. v. Falley, 30 Fed. Rep. 808, and the cases cited.

The word "assignment" is used indifferently, to indicate both the transfer and the written instrument by which the transfer is evidenced, and the clear logic of these decisions, and those of this court in Freydendall v. Baldwin, 103 Ill. 325; Hanchett v. Waterbury, 8 West. Rep. 501, 115 Ill. 220; and Farwell v. Crandall, 8 West. Rep. 702, 120 Ill. 70,—is that in the title to the Act, and in the 7th, 18th, and 14th sections, the word is used in the former sense, and refers to the act of the debtor, and not to the evidence of the act.

To have a transfer come within the legal meaning of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, it need not be evidenced by a formal deed, complete in all its parts, and expressly providing for the payment of all creditors. But in all of them will be found, in one form or another, the following principal characteristics of an assignment, viz.:

1. Insolvency on the part of the grantor.
2. A trust in favor of creditors.
3. Power in the trustee to sell the property and pay debts of the grantor, a power which does not create a mere lien on the property for the security of the debts, but provides for a sale and appropriates the proceeds of the sale to their payment.

Burrill, Assignm. 5th ed. §§ 8, 4.

The fact that the debtor appoints a trustee seems, in most instances, to fix conclusively the character of the transaction as a general assignment.

Hurrows v. Lehnendorf, 8 Iowa, 96.

When a conveyance is made to a creditor under an agreement by which he is to sell the property, and out of the proceeds pay his own and other debts of the assignor, he becomes a trustee, and the transfer is an assignment.

Truitt Bros. v. Caldwell, 8 Minn. 364, 74 Am. Dec. 764; Harkrader v. Leiby, 4 Ohio St. 602; Bloom v. Noggle, 4 Ohio St. 45; Winner v. Hoyt, 66 Wis. 227, 57 Am. Rep. 257; Murphy v. Caldwell, 50 Ala. 461; Bonns v. Carter, 20 Neb. 566; Lucas v. Sunbury & E. R. Co. 32 Pa. 438; Page v. Smith, 24 Wis. 368; Ingram v. Osborn, 70 Wis. 184.

Another distinguishing mark of an assignment is that it does not merely pledge the property as security for the payment of the debts, as in the case of a mortgage; it appropriates it absolutely to their payment by giving the assignee power to raise a fund by sale to pay them.

Burrill, Assignm. § 4; Crow v. Beardsley, 68 Mo. 438; Hoffman v. Mackall, 5 Ohio St. 124, 64 Am. Dec. 637.

No one of these elements of an assignment is lacking in the instrument contained in this record.

The county court has jurisdiction to vacate unlawful preferences in assignments, when the property is in the possession of the assignee.

Freydendall v. Baldwin, 103 Ill. 325.

In Hanchett v. Waterbury, 8 West. Rep. 501, 115 Ill. 220, and Farwell v. Crandall, 8 West. Rep. 702, 120 Ill. 70, it is held that the possession of the assignee is the possession of the court, and that he is the officer of the court. This case, then, meets that test of jurisdiction, 18 L. R. A.

actual custody of the res by the officer of the court.

It is said that the assignment must be a statutory assignment, that is, it must be executed in substantial compliance with the statute.

But the statute is silent as to the form of the instrument.

Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208.

Annexing an acknowledgment to a deed which is not an assignment would not make it one, and the converse of the proposition is also true.

The presence or absence of the acknowledgment can have no effect in determining the character of the instrument.

Although our statute says that every assignment shall be duly acknowledged and recorded, the provision is anything but mandatory in its character.

Where the Legislature requires a thing to be done not in itself essential to the validity of it, and does not in terms specify what shall be the consequence of noncompliance, the court will not make that consequence to be an avoidance of the whole.

Wilberforce, Statute Law, 205; Stayton v. Hutings, 7 Ind. 144; Maxwell, Interpretation of Statutes, 2d ed. 452; Nowell v. Worcester, 9 Exch. 468; Sedgwick, Stat. & Const. Law, 316; Thames Mfg. Co. v. Lathrop, 7 Conn. 550.

The use of the word "shall" is not conclusive; for that word is held to be directory merely when no right or benefit depends on its use in an imperative sense.

Fowler v. Perkins, 77 Ill. 271.

As to recording, the statute is merely directory, and a failure to record the assignment does not affect its validity.

Myer v. Fales Sons & Co. 12 Ill. App. 351.

In Iowa neither acknowledgment nor record is essential, where the property, as in this case, is delivered to the assignee.

Meeker v. Sanders, 6 Iowa, 61; American & Co. v. Frank, 62 Iowa, 202; Munson v. Frazer, 78 Iowa, 177; Dawson v. Coffey, 12 Or. 513.

Mr. J. B. Mann, with Messrs. Moses & Newman, for appellee:

The jurisdiction of the county court is a special statutory and limited jurisdiction. While the powers contended for would require general jurisdiction both at law and in equity.

Smith & K. Implement Co. v. Thurman, 29 Mo. App. 189, shows that inasmuch as the deed did not purport on its face to dispose of all the grantor's property, it is a deed of trust and not an assignment.

See also Caldwell's Bank v. Crittenden, 66 Iowa, 237.

The intention of the parties is the paramount question, whether an assignment shall be established or not.

Carson v. Byers, 67 Iowa, 611; Gage & Co. v. Parry, 69 Iowa, 605.

No general assignment is declared unless all the property of the assignor is included.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John V. Farwell & Co. filed in the county court of Vermillion county a petition, verified by affidavit, wherein it was stated that they were creditors of George Silverman, of that county, and that he was indebted to them for goods sold and delivered in the sum of $1,498.68; and that on December 18, 1887, said Silverman executed and delivered to Daniel Cohen an instrument of writing as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, George Silverman, of the city of Danville, county of Vermillion and state of Illinois, in consideration of the sum of thirteen thousand four hundred and sixty-nine and seventy-hundredths dollars, to me in hand paid by H. B. Claffin & Co., M. Cohen, D. Cohen, Simon and Rosenbloom, Mayer Singer, and Sarah Silverman, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and in consideration of the sum of one dollar in hand paid to me by Daniel Cohen, do hereby sell, assign, transfer, and set over unto said Daniel Cohen all and singular the following goods and chattels, viz.: All the stock of dry goods and carpets, boots and shoes, store fixtures, and every other article of property in and about the store-room known as 'No. 115 East Main Street,' in the city of Danville and state of Illinois, in trust for the uses and purposes following, that is to say: Whereas, I am indebted to the persons hereinafter named in the amount hereinafter mentioned, which are evidenced by sundry promissory notes, as follows: One note dated August 10, 1887, for six hundred and fifty-three dollars, due in six months from date; one note dated August 19, 1887, for seven hundred ninety-two dollars and ninety-two cents, due in four months from date; one note dated August 20, 1887, for six hundred and fifty-four dollars and one cent, due six months after date; one note dated October 2, 1887, for four hundred twenty-one dollars and thirty-six cents, due in three months from date; one note dated October 6, 1887, for seventy-four dollars and fifty cents, due in four months from date; one note dated August 9, 1887, for seven hundred and ninety-one dollars, due in four months from date, all payable to H. B. Claffin & Co.; one note dated December 8, 1887, for five thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars, due one day after date, payable to Moses M. Cohen; one note dated December 8, 1887, for fourteen hundred and fifty dollars, due one day after date, and payable to Daniel Cohen; one note dated December 8, 1887, for seven hundred and forty-one dollars, payable to Mayer Singer, and due one day after date; one note dated December 8, 1887, for nineteen hundred dollars, due one day after date, and payable to Sarah Silverman; also, the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, due on an open account to Simon and Rosenbloom. And whereas, I am desirous of securing the payment of said several sums of money: Now, therefore, the said Daniel Cohen shall take, hold, and receive said goods and chattels hereby conveyed, in trust, to sell the same at public sale, in such quantities as he may see fit, after giving at least ten days' notice of the same, by posting up notices of the same in at least five public places in said city of Danville, and out of the proceeds thereof, after paying the expenses of caring for said property and making said sale, to—First, pay the several amounts mentioned in said several notes payable to H. B. Claffin & Co.; secondly, to pay said note to Daniel Cohen; thirdly, to pay the other indebtednesses above mentioned: provided, however, that said trustee shall not sell any more of said goods and property than is sufficient to pay said indebtedness and expenses aforesaid. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 14th day of December, 1887. George Silverman. [Seal.]"

The petition further stated that the stock of goods so sold, assigned, and transferred to Cohen composed all the property and estate of any value belonging to Silverman, and that the latter at the time of executing the instrument was, and still is, wholly insolvent; that the liabilities of Silverman exceeded $40,000; and that said goods were insufficient to pay such liabilities, their value being not to exceed $20,000. It was alleged that the transfer was in fact and in law an assignment for the benefit of creditors to Cohen as assignee, with preferences in favor of the persons in the instrument named, and that thereby Cohen became assignee of Silverman, and subject to all the duties and liabilities of an assignee; further, that he had seized the property, and held possession of the same, but instead of administering the same according to law, under the supervision and direction of the court intended to wholly ignore the court and administer the property solely for the benefit of the persons named in the assignment as beneficiaries without regard to the rights of petitioners and other creditors of Silverman, and without complying with any of the provisions of the laws of Illinois regulating assignments, and in pursuance of such intention had given notice that he would sell said property on December 26, 1887, etc. It was also alleged that Cohen was not a resident of the state, and not a proper person to act as assignee; that he was one of the preferred creditors in the assignment, a relative of the assignor, and that he would not act impartially in the matter; that he was acting solely in the interest and under the direction of the insolvent and the preferred creditors; and that he had filed in the court no bond as assignee nor any schedule or inventory of the property assigned and that he did not intend to do so until compelled by the order of court. The prayer of the petition was that an order be entered restraining Cohen from disposing of the property without an order of the court, and requiring him to file a schedule of the assigned property, and submit to the jurisdiction of the court, and that he be removed as assignee, and some suitable person appointed to administer the estate under the direction of the court, and that a citation issue against Silverman, etc., and for other relief.

The answer of Cohen to the petition was as follows: "The said respondent, Daniel Cohen, not admitting the jurisdiction of said court in the premises but reserving at all times hereafter the right to question the same, for cause why said petition should not be granted, says that he admits that George Silverman, on the 14th day of December, 1887, executed to respondent the said instrument in said amended petition described. Respondent, further answering, says that he is not sufficiently advised of the financial condition of the said George Silverman to state whether he is insolvent or not, or what the amount of his indebtedness really is or was, but admits that said stock of merchandise does not exceed in value the sum of twenty thousand dollars, nor is he able to say whether said stock constituted all of Silverman's property. Respondent, further answering, denies that either in fact or in law the instrument is an assignment for the benefit of creditors, within the meaning of the laws of the state of Illinois, and denies that the same was by the said Silverman intended to be an assignment, or was by respondent accepted as such, and avers that the same was not acknowledged by said Silverman but, on the contrary, respondent avers that said instrument was executed and delivered by said Silverman, and received by respondent, as a chattel mortgage, or trust-deed in the nature of a chattel mortgage, to secure the payment of the debts therein mentioned. And respondent, further answering, says that at the time of the execution and delivery of said chattel mortgage it was expressly understood and agreed by and between said Silverman and this respondent, and by the creditors mentioned in said instrument, that said Silverman should have the right to redeem said goods and chattels at any time before the expiration of said ten days during which said sale was to be made and at any time before said sale was made, by the payment of said debts in said chattel mortgage mentioned. Respondent, further answering, says that said notes mentioned in said chattel mortgage as due M. Cohen, Mayer Singer, and Sarah Silverman were all and each due, and contained a warrant of attorney, executed on the day of the date of said notes, authorizing the confession of judgments, in term-time or vacation, on said notes, and that said payees of said notes were threatening and intending to cause judgments to be entered up for the amount of said notes, and to issue executions thereon, and levy the same on said stock of merchandise, and that said Silverman was not able to secure a further extension of the time for the payment of said notes, except by the execution of said chattel mortgage. Respondent, further answering, admits that he has entered into possession of said goods and chattels, and has advertised the same for sale, but has not sold the same, and that the said goods are now subject to redemption by said George Silverman, or any person entitled to redeem the same, and that he now claims no interest in said goods, and has never claimed or had any interest in said goods, save as trustee or mortgagee under said chattel mortgage. Respondent, further answering, admits that he does not intend to execute a bond as assignee, or to file an inventory or schedule, but expressly denies all jurisdiction of this court in the premises to either compel him to execute said bond, or to file said schedule and inventory, or to remove him from his trust. Wherefore respondent asks that said citation may be dismissed, and that said restraining order, heretofore issued, may be dissolved, and that he may be hence discharged with his costs." Said answer was verified by the affidavit of Cohen.

The county court sustained a demurrer to said answer. The court then found that said Cohen did not intend to inventory and appraise the property assigned to him and enter into bond, and that he refused so to do, and that he had failed and neglected for the period of twenty days after the making of the assignment to file an inventory and valuation and give bond; and thereupon said court removed Cohen as assignee, and appointed John G. Thompson assignee. Upon an appeal to the circuit court, that court sustained a demurrer to the answer of Cohen, and in all things affirmed the judgment and order of the county court. The case was thereupon taken to the appellate court, and there the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition. The petitioners John V. Farwell et al. have brought the record to this court by appeal, and have assigned errors.

The material question in this case is whether or not the instrument which on December 18, 1887, was executed and delivered by Silverman to Cohen is such a voluntary assignment as will, under the Act of May 22, 1877, (Laws 1877, p. 116,) confer jurisdiction and authority upon the county court to supervise the execution of the trusts created by or growing out of such instrument, and the administration of the property thereby conveyed. By the Act, its provisions are made applicable "in all cases of voluntary assignments hereafter made for the benefit of creditor or creditors." In the late case of Farwell v. Nilsson, 188 Ill. 45, it was said: "The word 'assignment' had, at the time this statute was adopted, a well-defined meaning, understood by all the people, and it has no different meaning in said Act. According to the common acceptation of the term, it is a transfer, without compulsion of law, by a debtor of his property to an assignee, in trust to apply the same, or the proceeds thereof, to the payment of his debts, and to return the surplus, if any, to the debtor." And in the same case it was said: "The mere form of the instrument is no doubt immaterial, provided the operation of it is to create a trust in the property conveyed for the benefit of creditors, and, if such are the purpose and design of the instrument, then any preference in it, or which, by construction of law, forms a part of it, is in fraud of the statute, and void." In Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 217, it was said: "The statute is silent as to the form of the instrument or instruments by which an insolvent debtor may effect an assignment;" and in one of the earlier cases that arose under the statute, Hanchett v. Waterbury, 115 Ill. 220, 8 West. Rep. 501, it was said "that the right and power of a failing debtor to pass the title of his effects to an assignee remain as they did before the statute." In the case of Weber v. Mick, 181 Ill. 520, in speaking of the subject of a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, we said that such an assignment was and "always had been understood to be, an instrument voluntarily executed by a failing debtor, by which he assigns to some third person, as assignee or trustee, the whole, or sometimes the bulk, of his property, to be by such trustee distributed among the assignor's creditors in satisfaction of their demands." In Schroeder v. Walsh, 120 Ill. 408, 8 West. Rep. 501, this court, in speaking of such assignments and of the Statute of 1877, said: "That Act applies only to conveyances of property to an assignee or trustee, in trust to convert the same into money for the benefit of creditors of the assignor;" and to this statement was added the further clause, "which can now only be made under that law." Since the right and power of the failing debtor to pass title to an assignee remain as they did before the statute, and since the mere form of the instrument is immaterial, provided it operates to create a trust for the benefit of creditors, and since the word "assignments," found in the Act, has no different meaning than that which it had at the time the statute was adopted, and prior thereto, it would seem that the expression, "which can now only be made under that law," signifies, merely, that all voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors must be carried into execution in conformity with the principles and rights established by that Act and that administration of the trusts may be enforced by the court to which the Act gives jurisdiction over the particular subject-matter of such voluntary assignments.

Waiving for the present the question of the capacity of Silverman to make a voluntary assignment, and the fact that the instrument executed purported to assign certain specified property, and contained no general term that would include other property, and waiving, also, various matters of supposed non-compliance with statutory requirements, we think it manifest, as well from the citations above made from former decisions of this court as from the doctrine laid down in the books, and in cases adjudicated in other courts, that said instrument was an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and not a mere mortgage security or pledge. By it Silverman sells, assigns, transfers and sets over unto Daniel Cohen the goods and chattels therein mentioned; and it provides that said Cohen shall take, hold, and receive the goods and chattels thereby conveyed, in trust to sell the same at public sale in such quantities as he may see fit, and out of the proceeds pay expenses and certain debts in a certain specified order of payment; and it contains a proviso that the trustee shall not sell any more of said goods and property than is sufficient to pay said indebtedness and expenses. Some of the specified debts were due, and some were not due. The instrument, on its face, was an absolute transfer of the whole interest, legal and equitable, in the property. In express terms it created a trust in favor of certain creditors of Silverman other than Cohen. The fact that a debt due Cohen was also provided for did not take from the instrument its character of an assignment for the benefit of creditors. A creditor of the assignor may be the assignee in such an assignment. There is no condition of defeasance providing for the return of the property upon the payment of the debts mentioned. At most, there was express provision for a resulting trust for any excess of assets over liabilities, and that much the law itself implied. A correct definition of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, as we understand the law, is given in the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, and it is this: "A voluntary transfer by a debtor of all or a part of his property to an assignee or assignees, in trust to apply the same, or the proceeds thereof, to the payment of some or all of the assignor's debts, and to return the surplus, if any, to him." See volume 1, pp. 845, 846, and authorities cited.

Since appellee claims title under the instrument of December 14, 1897, and appellants have no case in court except as based thereon, it would seem that the capacity of Silverman to execute the same must necessarily be admitted by both parties, and that the only issue between them in regard thereto can be in respect to its legal effect. The Assignment Act of 1877 is not, in express terms, confined to debtors who either are in fact insolvent or contemplate insolvency. The expression, "assignment for the benefit of creditors," implies insolvency, and an inability on the part of the debtor to provide for the claims of his creditors in the usual way. It is to be presumed that a debtor who is, or thinks he is, solvent, will not transfer his estate, and yield up all dominion over it, for the purpose of having it administered upon under the supervision of a court; and it is unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature contemplated or intended that the provisions of the Act should be applicable to a solvent debtor. In Hanchett v. Waterbury, 115 Ill. 220, 8 West. Rep. 501, this court held that said Act was, in its framework and detail, essentially a general insolvent law, and that it was so intended by the Legislature. In Gardner v. Commercial Nat. Bank of Providence, 95 Ill. 298, it was held that a solvent debtor could not make a valid deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors. It follows that the allegation of the assignor's insolvency contained in the petition is material to the case made by the petition, but we think that the statements of the answer, they being taken most strongly against the pleader, sufficiently admit such insolvency.

The questions whether a parol assignment of property, or a constructive voluntary assignment of property, for the benefit of creditors, is a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, within the contemplation of the Assignment Act, are discussed at great length in the briefs and arguments. But, since here the assignment was by deed, though not in the usual form, duly signed, sealed, and delivered, and a trust for the benefit of creditors was created therein in direct and express language, no such questions are involved in the record, and we must decline to consider them.

The instrument here in question transferred to the assignee certain specified goods and chattels, and it contained no general terms which would embrace other property. A general assignment of all property is the most usual species of voluntary assignments. From the fact that the Act of 1877 provides that the debtor shall annex to the assignment "an inventory, under oath or affirmation, of his, her, or their estate, real and personal," an implication, more or less strong, arises that the statute contemplates general assignments only. This assignment is not upon its face a general assignment. If, from the implication above noted, and from any implication that might arise from the use of the term "voluntary assignments," or otherwise from the provisions of the Act, it were deducible that general assignments alone are within the statute, yet the absence of general terms in the deed could be holpen by an averment and proof. In United States v. Howland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 108, 4 L. ed. 526, Chief Justice Marshall said: "The deed, then, conveys only the property contained in the schedule, and the schedule does not purport to contain all the property of the parties who made it. In such a case the presumption must be that there is property not contained in the deed, unless the contrary appears. The onus probandi is thrown on the United States. . . . The depositions do not aid the deed. The question whether the whole property is assigned is still left to conjecture; and this, being the fact on which the preference of the United States is founded, ought to be proved. Not being proved, the court is of opinion that it is not a case in which it can be claimed." In United States v. Langton, 5 Mason, 280, Justice Story said: "I agree at once to the reasoning at the bar, that if the assignment be in fact of all the debtor's property, although it does not so appear upon the face of the instrument, the priority of the United States attaches. The same rule applies if a small part be left out for the purpose of fraudulent evasion of that priority." In the case at bar the petition avers that the stock of goods sold, assigned, and transferred to Daniel Cohen composed all the property and estate of any value belonging to George Silverman. The answer neither admitted nor denied this allegation, but stated that the defendant, Cohen, was not "able to say whether said stock constituted all of Silverman's property." Without the statute itself operated to convert the partial assignment into a general assignment, the chancery rule which is applicable to the case made it incumbent upon the petitioner to prove said averment, before it could make in his favor; and he did not do so.

Is a voluntary assignment, which upon its face is but a partial assignment, so enlarged by the statute as to make it a general assignment? It would be entirely competent for the Legislature to provide that every voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, whether a general assignment on its face, or purporting to be a partial assignment merely, should be deemed and taken to include all the property and estate of the assignor not exempt by law. This statute does not so provide in express terms, and the question arises whether or not it so provides by implication. There are several provisions of the Act which seem to be somewhat indicative of such an intention; but these and all other provisions of the statute must be so interpreted, if it is reasonably possible, as that due effect shall be given to all the provisions of the Act. Section 1 provides that "in all cases of voluntary assignments" the debtor or debtors "shall annex to such assignment an inventory, under oath or affirmation, of his, her, or their estate, real and personal, according to the best of his, her, or their knowledge; . . . but such inventory shall not be conclusive as to the amount of the debtor's estate." Since the statute uses the words "all cases," and predicates of "all cases" the annexing of "an inventory, under oath or affirmation, of his, her, or their estate, real and personal," it affords plausible ground for the claim that by force of the statute all voluntary assignments are general assignments, and cover all property of the assignor or assignors that is not exempt by law. But it is to be noted that section 8 of the Act provides "that no assignment shall be declared fraudulent or void for want of any list or inventory as provided in the first section of this Act." This latter provision, and the omission of any negative words in the clause of section 1 under consideration, indicate that the provision in said clause for a sworn inventory, "in all cases," of "his, her, or their estate, real and personal," is directory only. What is, however, of much more moment is that in section 1, and in the last clause of the same sentence in which is found the provision for such inventory "in all cases," it is expressly stated that "such assignment shall vest in the assignee or assignees the title to any other property, not exempt by law, belonging to the debtor or debtors at the time of making the assignment, and comprehended within the general terms of the same. This is a legislative declaration of the legal effect of, and of the limitation to be placed upon, a voluntary assignment. The expression of one thing is the exclusion of another. It is very manifest that a deed of assignment passes the title of all property specified in the deed, or in the inventory annexed thereto. What other, if any, property or estate does it transfer? Said last clause answers this question by saying, "any other property not exempt by law, belonging to the debtor or debtors at the time of making the assignment, that is comprehended within the general terms of the assignment." It must be presumed that if it had been the legislative intention that, by force of the Act, the title to all property of the assignor or assignors, not exempt by law, should vest in the assignee or assignees, such intention would have either been expressed in plain and apt words, or that, at the very least, language would have been used which by a liberal interpretation, could be construed to include all such property. Hereafter the Legislature had said, "such inventory shall not be conclusive as to the amount of the debtor's estate, but such assignment shall vest in the assignee or assignees the title to any other property, not exempt by law, belonging to the debtor or debtors at the time of making the assignment," it was not satisfied with the language employed, and added these words of limitation, "and comprehended within the general terms of the same." These words of restriction cannot be ignored. It must be presumed that they were used intentionally and, for a purpose. Their natural and necessary effect is to limit the scope of every voluntary assignment to the property that is either named in the deed, or mentioned in the inventory, or comprehended within the general terms of description found in the assignment.

An argument that the Act makes every voluntary assignment, though partial on its face, a general assignment of all property, is deducible from the provisions in section 8 that the county court may, compel the debtor or debtors "to answer under oath, such matter as may . . . be inquired of him, her, or them," and that "such debtor or debtors may be . . . fully examined under oath as to the amount and situation of his, her, or their estate." But a few suggestions will effectually dispose of such argument. Said provisions are merely permissive, and simply give to the county court a discretionary power, to be exercised only in a case wherein the circumstances of such particular case demand or call for its exercise. When property covered by the particular description found in the deed or the inventory, or comprehended within the general terms of the assignment, is not discovered or delivered to the assignee, the authority delegated in this section 8 may properly be invoked. That under this section the county court is not authorized, in the case of a partial assignment, and in the absence from the terms of the assignment of general descriptions of or calls for property, to hold the assignment to be a general assignment of all property not exempt by law, is plainly indicated by the concluding clause of the section, "that the county court may compel the delivery to the assignee or assignees of any property or estate embraced in the assignment." Upon a careful consideration of all the various provisions of the Act of 1877, we are of opinion that a voluntary assignment, which is upon its face a partial assignment, and which does not in fact purport to transfer all the property of the debtor, and which contains no general terms descriptive of property, is not, by force of the Act, converted into a general assignment of all the property of the debtor that is not exempt by law.

It not appearing that the assignment at bar is a general assignment, the question necessarily arises, is a partial assignment an assignment within the purview of the Voluntary Assignment Act? In Weber v. Mick, 181 Ill. 520, in discussing said Act, we quoted from Burrill on Assignments (sec. 8) this language: "Assignments may be made either to the whole body of the creditors or to particular creditors, or they may be of all or a part of the debtor's property; but, unless a trust is thereby created by the assignor in favor of creditors, such conveyances are not within the class of instruments known as 'assignments for creditors,'" In section 1 of the Act are found these expressions: "In all cases of voluntary assignments," and, "Any other property . . . comprehended within the general terms of the same," (i. e., the assignment). In section 8 occurs this expression: "And may compel the delivery to the assignee or assignees of any property or estate embraced in the assignment." Section 9 provides for an additional inventory of property "under said assignment." Section 11 gives authority to the assignee or assignees "to dispose of all estate, real and personal, assigned." The power delegated by section 12 to the new assignee who succeeds to the trust is, "to execute the trust embraced in such assignment." By section 18 all debts and liabilities are required to be paid pro rata "from the assets thereof," (i. e., of the assignment.) These and like expressions in the Act, taken in connection with the context in which they are found, indicate that the General Assembly recognized the fact that in some cases of assignment an assignor would have "other property" which was not comprehended within the terms of the assignment. It is conceded by counsel upon both sides that almost all of the sections of our Assignment Act are literal copies of sections in the General Assignment Law of Iowa. In the Iowa statute, however, the words found in the first section are these: "General assignment of property by an insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, for the benefit of creditors." In our statute, in lieu of said language, these words were substituted: "In all cases of voluntary assignments hereafter made for the benefit of creditor or creditors." It must be presumed that these changes in phraseology were for a purpose, and indicative of the legislative will. The Iowa Act operates upon general assignments, and makes every general assignment void that is not for the benefit of all creditors in

"That in all cases of voluntary assignments hereafter made for the benefit of creditor or creditors the debtor or debtors shall annex to such assignment an inventory, under oath or affirmation, of his, her, or their estate, real and personal, according to the best of his, her, or their knowledge, and also a list of his, her, or their creditors, their real-proportion to their claims. Our statute regulates "all cases of voluntary assignments," whether such assignments purport to be made for the benefit of all creditors, or only some of them, or merely "one" creditor, and it operates upon the estate, real and personal, that is designated in the instrument of assignment, or in the inventory annexed thereto, or that belongs to the debtor, is not exempt, and is "comprehended within the general terms" of the instrument, and upon such property only; and, instead of rendering the assignment void for preferences, it avoids the preferences, and distributes the assets assigned, pro rata, upon all debts and liabilities of the assignor.

Since the Act of 1877 regulates "all cases of voluntary assignments," the assignment now at bar, even if but a partial assignment, is, if otherwise a valid voluntary assignment, to be governed by and administered under the provisions of that Act. This conclusion seems to necessarily follow from a consideration of the provisions of the Act. There is reason and justice and equity in the rule thus established by the statute. To illustrate, if A. is in failing circumstances and insolvent, and is owner of a store-house and fixtures, and a stock of merchandise therein, and of notes and accounts growing out of the business carried on there, and is also the owner of a farm, and of the live-stock and agricultural implements and machinery connected therewith, and of the crops growing thereon, no reason is perceived why he may not be permitted to assign the estate and property first mentioned, and have it converted into money, and the proceeds distributed, under the supervision of the county court, pro rata, upon his indebtedness, and he still retain title to the farm and property connected therewith, and continue his business of farming. Of course, the property retained, so far as not exempt by law, would still be liable to sale on execution, if his creditors, or any of them, saw fit to avail themselves of their legal rights in that behalf. An arrangement such as suggested might in very many instances, where there was trust and confidence, be for the pecuniary advantage of both the debtor and his creditors. The disposition made of that portion of the property assigned would, in such case, be eminently just and equitable, and in exact conformity with the substantial principles established by the Voluntary Assignment Law, i. e., that the administration should be under the supervision of a court, and the distribution pro rata upon all debts and liabilities. It is difficult to see how the execution of such an assignment is in fraud of the statute or in derogation of its substantial requirements; and, if an insolvent debtor, in fraud of the Act, and for the purpose of creating illegal preferences, assigns a portion of his property to a trustee, he is bound to know that under the law the as-ignment will work for the benefit, pro rata, of all his creditors. That the county court has jurisdiction and authority to administer in case of a partial assignment is consistent with prior announcements of this court that the right and power of a failing debtor to pass the title of his effects to an assignee remain as they did before the statute, but that the power to control the distribution and beneficial enjoyments of his property upon such a transfer of the title is essentially different from what it was before the statute and other like announcements of the law, is in conflict with no former decision of the court, and is also consistent with and justified by the language of the Act itself, and tends to advance the remedy provided by that Act, and effectuate the legislative intention. On the other hand, if a partial assignment to a trustee for creditors is not within the purview of the Act, then, an insolvent and failing debtor may, prior to his retirement from business, transfer a moiety or some substantial part of his property to a trustee, and for the benefit of only one or a few of his creditors, and leave the other moiety or part of his assets subject to process of the courts at the instance of his other creditors, and thus, in reality, make an assignment with preferences, and successfully and with impunity evade and defraud the statute. Our conclusion, then, is that the mere fact that it does not affirmatively appear that the assignment embraced all the property of Silverman does not prevent the jurisdiction of the county court from attaching, or prevent the estate being distributed in that court in conformity with the rule of equality established by the statute.

It is urged that section 1 of said Act provides in express terms that "every assignment shall be duly acknowledged and recorded," etc., and that this assignment was not acknowledged, and was not recorded; and that by reason of such failure to record, and want of acknowledgment, the instrument did not become a voluntary assignment under the statute, and the jurisdiction of the county court to compel the due execution of the trusts supposed to be created by the instrument, and by force of the statute, did not attach. It is to be noted that no negative words are used in the Act declaring the invalidity of assignments not acknowledged and recorded. The general rule applicable, where no negative words are employed in the statute, is thus stated in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, *78: "Those directions which are not of the essence of the thing to be done, but which are given with a view merely to the proper, orderly, and prompt conduct of the business, and by a failure to obey which the rights of those interested will not be prejudiced, are not commonly to be regarded as mandatory; and if the Act is performed, but not in the time or in the precise mode indicated, it may still dence and place of business, if known, and the amount of their respective demands; but such inventory shall not be conclusive as to the amount of the debtor's estate, but such assignment shall vest in the assignee or assignees the title to any other property, not exempt by law, belonging to the debtor or debtors at the time of making the assignment, and comprehended within the general terms of the same. Every assignment shall be duly acknowledged and recorded in the county where the person or persons making the same reside, or where the business in respect to which the same is made has been carried on; and in case said assignment shall embrace lands, or interest therein, then the same shall also be recorded in the county or counties in which said land may be situated."

be sufficient, if that which is done accomplishes the substantial purpose of the statute." The Iowa statute, from which our Act was largely taken, is much more definite than ours in respect to the matters of acknowledgment and recording; and prior to the adoption of our statute the supreme court of that state held that it was not necessary that a deed of assignment conveying personal property should be acknowledged and recorded, where possession accompanied such conveyance. Meeker v. Sanders, 6 Iowa, 61. In Zimmerman v. Willard, 114 Ill. 864, the assignment was in fact acknowledged, and the question here at issue was not in the case, and it was merely held that the certificate of acknowledgment then before the court was in substantial compliance with the Act relating to voluntary assignments. In Myer v. False Sons & Co., 12 Ill. App. 351, it was held that an assignment of personal property takes effect at the time of the delivery to the assignee of the deed of assignment and the property; and it was there said by Casey, J.: "When the insolvent debtor makes and acknowledges the deed of assignment, and delivers it with the property to the assignee, what more can he do or is he required to do? He does not retain the deed of assignment in his possession, he has no control over it, and he could not have it recorded. That duty devolves upon the assignee. If the latter is guilty of misconduct or bad faith, or is tardy in the performance of his duty, it should not be said that the rights of the insolvent debtor or the creditors are thereby changed or prejudiced." The Assignment Act was intended mainly for the benefit of the creditors of the insolvent. The creditors of Silverman are not here objecting to the want of a certificate of acknowledgment, or because the deed was not recorded. On the contrary, they are seeking to obtain, under the deed, the beneficial interests that the Legislature intended should be conferred upon them by the statute. The petitioners are creditors of Silverman to a considerable amount; and the record shows that some 21 different firms and individuals, also creditors of Silverman, joined in a supplemental petition, in which they "prayed as in the petition of John V. Farwell & Co." Silverman and Cohen are the defendants to the petition. Silverman executed the deed of assignment to Cohen, as assignee, and delivered it to him, and with it delivered possession of the assigned property; and Cohen took and retained the property by virtue of the deed, and is even now claiming title under it. They have affirmed, and are affirming, the validity of the deed as against the creditors. They cannot be allowed to blow both hot and cold with one breath. They are equitably estopped from now saying the instrument is not the deed of Silverman, or from objecting to it because it was not acknowledged and recorded. No matter what they call the instrument, the law makes it a voluntary assignment. Nor is it a matter of any moment that they supposed it was an instrument for the benefit of a few chosen creditors; for the statute enlarged the trust, and made it inure to the benefit of all the creditors. It was the statutory duty, then, of Silverman to acknowledge it, and the statutory duty of Cohen, before accepting it, and taking possession of the property, and assuming the trust created thereby, to see that it was properly acknowledged, and have it recorded. Having failed in the performance of their bounden and statutory duties in that behalf, they should not now be allowed to plead their own shortcomings to the detriment of the rights and equities of the beneficiaries in the trust. The deed made appellee a trustee, and he accepted the trust, and reduced the trust property to his own possession. Under the statute, the creditors were the beneficiaries in that trust. It is manifest that the trustee cannot now set up his own culpable negligence or willful disregard of duty, for the purpose of despoiling his cestuis que trustent of their interest in the trust-estate. Suppose the provisions of the statute in respect to the execution, acknowledgment, recording, etc., of the deed of assignment have not been complied with, what then? The creditors are not complaining on that account. The claims of no execution creditor or attaching creditor or stranger to the deed are involved. Who, then, is authorized to take advantage of the acts of omission of the insolvent and his assignee? In Farwell v. Crandall, 120 Ill. 70, 8 West. Rep. 702, this court said: "It is an error to suppose that the jurisdiction of the county court depends upon the validity of the deed of assignment. For the purpose of jurisdiction, it is sufficient that there has been an assignment, in fact, for the benefit of creditors. This is conclusively shown by the well-recognized doctrine that a fraudulent assignment is voidable at the election of the creditors only; hence, if the latter do not object, the court may nevertheless go on and administer the assets." Like doctrine should be held in the case now at bar. An assignment already made is a preliminary requisite to the exertion of any jurisdiction whatever by the county court. The sole power of the court is to supervise and regulate the administration of a trust previously created by the act of the assignor. In Hanchett v. Waterbury, 115 Ill. 220, 3 West. Rep. 501, it was held by this court that upon the making, filing, and recording of the assignment, with the lists and schedules annexed, the county court wherein such assignment is filed and recorded, by operation of law at once acquires jurisdiction over, and becomes possessed of all the property and estate embraced within the assignment. The duty of filing and recording the assignment, and an inventory and a valuation of the estate assigned, is imposed upon the assignee. But suppose he fails or refuses to perform any or all these duties, does the assignment fall still-born on that account? We think not. The assignee is not the only party interested in the assignment. The assignor has an interest that the property assigned should be paid in satisfaction of his debts. All the creditors of the assignor are interested in the matter of the assignment, and have a legal right to receive their proportionate share of the assets.

Section 14 of the Act confers upon the county court "full authority and jurisdiction to execute and carry out the provisions," of the Act; section 7 provides that the assignee, in the execution of assignments, shall at all times be subject to the order and supervision of the county court, and that said court may by citation and attachment compel the assignee to file reports of his proceedings, and of the situation and condition of the trust, "and to proceed in the faithful execution of the duties required by this Act;" and section 12 provides that in case any assignee shall fail and neglect, for the period of twenty days after the making of any assignment, to file an inventory and valuation, and file bond, as required by the Act, it shall be the duty of the county judge of the county where such assignment may be recorded, on the application of any person interested as creditor or otherwise, to appoint one or more discreet and qualified person or persons to execute the trust embraced in such assignment, etc. The provision of section 1 of the Act is that "the assignment shall be recorded in the county where the person or persons making the same reside, or where the business in respect of which the same is made has been carried on." The expression in section 12, "where such assignment may be recorded," means the county where it is recorded, or if not recorded, then the county where it is legally permissible to record it. The county court referred to in the Act, and the county judge referred to in section 12, are the county court and the county judge of the county in which the assignor resides or in which the business in respect of which the assignment is made has been carried on; and if the residence happens to be in one county, and the situs of the business in another, then the jurisdiction attaches to such one of said county courts, and to such one of said county judges, as first obtains jurisdiction of the subject-matter. It may be said, in answer to suggestions made, that there is no intimation in the record or otherwise that the circuit court or chancery court, or any court other than the Vermillion county court, had or claimed jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the assignment here under consideration either before or since the institution of this proceeding, except upon the appeal prosecuted herein to the circuit court from the judgment of the county court, and therefore no question of a conflict of jurisdiction arises, and it will be time enough to dispose of that matter when it does arise. It may also be said that courts are not accustomed to take jurisdiction or to act of their own motion; and it is not to be presumed that the county court or county judge will act in a matter which is not properly brought before it or him. No reason is perceived why the presentation of a petition, such as that found in this record, made by a creditor of the insolvent debtor, or by some other party in interest, is not a proper and competent way in which to call upon the court to act in the premises; that an assignment in fact for the benefit of creditors has been made, that a period of twenty days has elapsed since the making of such assignment, and all other facts deemed essential to put the court in motion, many properly enough be shown, prima facie, by such petition, verified by affidavit. Assuming that the assignee named in the deed of assignment is a necessary party to any proceeding instituted for the purpose of establishing the trust, and removing him from office, and appointing another assignee in his place and stead, we think a citation may properly issue against him. If, as appears in this record, he has entered upon the execution of the trust to the extent of accepting the deed of assignment, and taking and holding possession of the assigned property, and assuming to exercise the power of selling and disposing of it, he may, although he has not become an assignee de jure, under the statute, by complying with its requirements, nevertheless be regarded as an assignee de facto or assignee de son tort, and brought into court by citation or attachment, under the provisions of section 7 of the Act. This Act, as we have frequently held, is remedial, and should be liberally construed, and so as to remedy the evils intended to be cured, and advance the remedy. When a voluntary assignment is made, and the property assigned has passed into the possession of the assignee, such property is thereby brought within the jurisdiction and under the administrative control of the county court. Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208. It is true, the making of the assignment must precede the exercise of jurisdiction; but, when a prima facie case of a voluntary assignment is exhibited to the court, it then devolves upon such court to judicially investigate such case, and determine whether or not a voluntary assignment has in fact been made, whether or not the particular instrument in question is such an assignment, and whether or not it was executed by the supposed assignor; and in the event it is judicially ascertained that it is such an assignment, then the duty is imposed upon the court to execute and carry out the provisions of the Voluntary Assignment Act in respect thereto. In the very nature of all judicial proceedings, the court in which any such proceeding is instituted must, at the very threshold, meet and determine, either expressly or by necessary implication, this question of jurisdiction.

Our conclusions upon the whole matter are that in the findings, judgments, and orders made and entered by the county and circuit courts there was no substantial error, and that they should be affirmed. Inasmuch as the appellate court reversed the same, such judgment of reversal is erroneous, and should be, and is, reversed. And the cause is remanded to the county court for further proceedings.

Magruder, Ch. J., dissenting:

George Silverman, of Danville, Vermillion county, signed a written instrument, which recited that he was indebted to certain persons and was desirous of securing the payment of such indebtedness and which purported to sell, assign, and transfer a stock of goods and certain personal property in a store building in Danville, to Daniel Cohen, in trust, to sell the same, and out of the proceeds of sale, pay the indebtedness. Cohen assumed the trust and was proceeding to execute it as directed. The instrument, however, under which he acted, was not acknowledged or recorded, as required by sections 1 and 3 of the Act in reference to voluntary assignments, passed by the Legislature of this state and approved May 22, 1877, and he did not file an inventory and appraisal with the clerk of the county court, nor enter into bond before the clerk of such court, as required by section 3 of the Act. Thereupon appellants, as creditors of Silverman, applied to the county court for the appointment of a new assignee under section 12 of said Act, and obtained an order removing Cohen, and appointing John G. Thompson as assignee in his place.

The instrument in question may be conceded for the purposes of this case to be an assignment, but inasmuch as it was not acknowledged or recorded, either in the recorder's office or the county court, it was not such an instrument as called for or justified the exercise of the power of appointment conferred upon that court by section 12.

A voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, as spoken of in the Act of 1877 has no other or different meaning than it had before the passage of that Act. Long before 1877 such an assignment had a well-defined signification in this state and in all other states. According to the common acceptance of the term it is a transfer without compulsion of law by a debtor of his property to an assignee in trust, to apply the same or the proceeds thereof, to the payment of his debts, and to return the surplus, if any, to the debtor. As to the form and contents of it, it has always been understood in this state to be a written deed of conveyance, executed by the assignor as party of the first part, to the assignee, as party of the second part, reciting the grantor's indebtedness and inability to pay, and conveying his property, real and personal, by apt words of sale and transfer to the assignee in trust, to take possession of and sell the same, and to collect the outstanding debts, and out of the proceeds to pay the creditors. Sometimes it provided for preferences, and sometimes not. Schedules were generally attached to the deed, describing the property and naming the creditors.

That such was the understanding as to its general form and character, will appear from an examination of the following cases decided by this court: Cross v. Bryant, 8 Ill. 86; Conkling v. Carson, 11 Ill. 508; Kimball v. Mulhern, 15 Ill. 205; McIntire v. Benson, 20 Ill. 500; Wilson v. Pearson, 20 Ill. 81; Bowen v. Parkhurst, 24 Ill. 257; Sackett v. Mansfield, 26 Ill. 27; Myers v. Kinzie, 26 Ill. 86; Finlay v. Dickerson, 29 Ill. 9; Pierce v. Brewster, 32 Ill. 268; Whipple v. Pope, 33 Ill. 354; Field v. Flanders, 40 Ill. 470; Gibson v. Rees, 50 Ill. 383. Such a deed of assignment as is above described, is referred to and held good in Cross v. Bryant, supra, and in Sackett v. Mansfield, supra, such an one is thus spoken of by this court: "This deed made an exhibit in the cause, fulfills, in our judgment, 18 L. R. A.

all the requirements of a valid deed of assignment. . . . It is for the benefit of the assignor's creditors," etc.

The first sentence of the first section of the Act of 1877, assumes that the meaning of a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors is already well understood and, therefore, no new definition of the term is attempted. A study of the language, in which the various provisions of the law are expressed, will demonstrate that its framers intended to designate just such a deed of assignment as is described in the foregoing decisions.

The assignment contemplated by the Act must be in writing. This is so, because it is required to be acknowledged and recorded, and it is so, whether the requirement to acknowledge and record be directory or mandatory, because the fact that it is spoken of as an instrument that may be acknowledged and recorded shows that it must be in writing.

The assignment contemplated by the Act must be one single instrument of transfer. It is so treated and spoken of in almost every section. The debtor is required to annex to it an inventory of his property, and a list of his creditors, and although the absence of these does not make it fraudulent or void, yet an instrument, to which an inventory and list may be attached cannot very well be constructed out of a number of acts done by the debtor or out of a number of notes, mortgages, or other documents signed by him, and passed out of his hands into the possession of different parties. The assignee is required to give notice of the assignment, by mail, and by publication, to the creditors, and it would hardly be possible to write or print a notice of an assignment which does not come into existence until it is constructed out of acts and circumstances by the determination of a judicial tribunal.

The contents of the assignment mentioned in the Act must be substantially the same as those of the ordinary deed of assignment referred to in the text-books and judicial decisions. It is spoken of in sections 2 and 12 as an instrument in which an assignee is "named" and in section 1, as an instrument by the terms of which title to property becomes vested in the assignee. If it vests title to property not named in the attached inventory, but "comprehended within the general terms of the" assignment, it must certainly contain apt words by which a grantor therein named transfers to a grantee therein named the title to property described in specific terms in the assignment, or in the inventory attached to it. It is spoken of in sections 8 and 12 as an instrument, by which a trust is "confided" and in which a trust is embraced, and in sections 1 and 3 as an instrument made for the benefit of creditors and authorizing the collection of debts and the sale of property.

The Act contemplates no such thing as a constructive assignment.

The thing about the Act, which is new, is the relation which it brings about between the assignment and the county court. By section 18 of article 6 of the Constitution county courts are made courts of record and are given original jurisdiction in certain specified matters, of which the subject of voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors is not one, "and such other jurisdiction as may be provided for by general law." Under the latter clause of said section 18, as thus quoted, the Act of May 22, 1877, was passed by the Legislature. Therefore county courts derive their power to deal with voluntary assignments from an Act of the Legislature and not from the specific mention of that subject in the Constitution itself. Hence, the jurisdiction conferred upon them by the Act of 1877 is a special statutory jurisdiction, and must be exercised in the mode prescribed by the statute.

The Act in question makes a previously executed assignment the basis and foundation of the jurisdiction of the county court. An assignment already made is a preliminary requisite to the exercise of any jurisdiction whatever by that court. The sole power of the court is to oversee and regulate the administration of a trust, which has been created independently of it, and without its aid. It acts upon an instrument which has been prepared for it in advance.

The county court is mentioned for the first time in section 8, after the mode of executing the assignment is provided for in section 1, and after the assignee is directed by section 3 to notify the creditors to present their claims to him. The person who is required by section 8 to file an inventory and appraisal with the clerk of the county court is the assignee. An assignee is defined by Bouvier in his law dictionary to be "one to whom an assignment has been made." The existence of an assignee presupposes the existence of an assignment, to which he owes his appointment. He is to file an inventory, etc., of "said estate." The words "said estate" refer back to "the debtor's estate" mentioned in section 1, to which the assignee had obtained title through an assignment made before the time for filing the inventory had arrived. The form of the assignee's bond prescribed by section 8 speaks of a trust that had theretofore been confided to the assignee.

Section 7 provides that assignees shall be subject to the order and supervision of the county court "in the execution of assignments," that is to say, in the performance of the duties imposed by the assignment. The assignment, specifying and defining the duties to be performed, must have been previously executed. The power to decide whether any creditor whose claim is questioned may or may not share in the assigned funds, and to determine how and when such funds shall be distributed, is conferred upon the county court by sections 5 and 6 merely for the purpose of enabling the assignee to carry out more fully and fairly the provisions of the assignment theretofore made. The object of the Act is to secure a more public and honest distribution of assigned effects by placing the assignee under the control of a judicial tribunal, while he is engaged in administering a trust, originally confided to him, not by the court but by the assignor. Section 14 confers full authority and jurisdiction upon county courts "to execute and carry out the provisions of this Act." Those provisions do nothing more than point out the mode in which the supervisory control here referred to is to be exercised.

Such being the object of the Act, and such being the character of the jurisdiction conferred by it, it nowhere provides that an assignment can be made under the direction of the county court, and nowhere confers upon that court the power to determine whether a particular instrument is an assignment or not, or whether an instrument admitted to be an assignment has or has not been executed by the assignor. That the county court should stop to hear evidence and determine such matters as these was never contemplated by the Act. The delay, created by such a course of procedure would be wholly inconsistent with the summary character of the jurisdiction intended to be conferred. It would hinder that expeditious conversion of the assets into money and that speedy distribution of the funds, which it is the design of the law to secure.

It follows from the views herein expressed that, when the assignment is first brought under the supervisory control of the county court, it should be accompanied by proper evidence of its execution. The court cannot afford to lay its hands upon an instrument alleged to be an assignment, if it be doubtful whether it was made by the debtor or not, or if the fact of its execution must be established by testimony and after a litigated contest. Inasmuch as the making of the assignment must precede the exercise of jurisdiction, proof that the assignment has been made must be present when the jurisdiction attaches, and as soon as it attaches. The certificate of acknowledgment is the best and highest evidence of the execution of the assignment, and is attached to and goes along with it, so that its execution is apparent at once upon the inspection of it.

For this reason the requirement contained in the last sentence of the first section of the Act must be construed to be mandatory and not directory. That requirement is as follows: "Every assignment shall be duly acknowledged and recorded in the county where the person or persons making the same reside, or where the business in respect of which the same is made, has been carried on; and in case said assignment shall embrace lands, or any interest therein, then the same shall also be recorded in the county or counties in which said lands may be situated." The word "shall" is not held to be directory where an advantage is lost, a right destroyed, or a benefit sacrificed, either to the public or to any individual, by giving it that construction. Wheeler v. Chicago, 24 Ill. 105, 76 Am. Dec. 786. The advantage to be derived by the creditors from an expeditious administration of the trust created by an assignment will be less apt to be lost, if the assignment is brought into the county court, with a certificate of acknowledgment to show that the debtor made it, and a certificate of record to afford prima facie evidence of its delivery to the assignee. Himes v. Keighlingher, 14 Ill. 469.

The absence of negative words in the requirement above quoted is not conclusive that the statute was not designed to be mandatory. Cooley, Const. Lim. *75. Affirmative language may be so strong as to imply a negative. Potters' Dwarr. Stat. p. 68; 1 Kent, Com. *467, note B; Dubuque Dist. Twp. v. Dubuque, 7 Iowa, 262. The use of the word "every" in the requirement that "every assignment shall be duly acknowledged," is broad enough to imply a negative of any other mode of proof, so far, at least, as the assignment is to be used as the basis of the jurisdiction of the county court. A similar requirement in a New York statute has been held to be mandatory. Hardemann v. Bowen, 39 N. Y. 196; Britton v. Lorens, 45 N. Y. 51; Fairchild v. Gwynne, 16 Abb. Pr. 28.

If an affirmative statute, which is introductory of a new law, direct a thing to be done in a certain manner, that thing shall not, even although there are no negative words, be done in any other manner. Potter's Dwarr. Stat. p. 72; Hardemann v. Bowen, supra. That the Act of 1877 introduced an entirely new law as to the mode of carrying out the provisions of voluntary assignments, and as to the character of the jurisdiction to be exercised by county courts, there can be no question. But the particular requirement now under consideration introduced a new rule in regard to the acknowledgment and recording of assignments. Its language is, that, in case the assignment embraces lands, it shall also be recorded in the county where the land is situated. By implication, therefore, an assignment which does not embrace lands but personal property only, as in the case at bar, must be acknowledged and recorded.

For the first time in the history of the legislation of this state, a transfer of personal property not designed to be a mortgage or to have the effect of a mortgage, was required by the Act of 1877 to be acknowledged and recorded. Mortgages of personal property had theretofore been required to be acknowledged in a specified manner under the Chattel Mortgage Act, but such had not been the requirement in regard to any other kind of instrument transferring personal property except a chattel mortgage, or trust deed in the nature of a chattel mortgage, etc. Rev. Stat. chap. 95, § 1. A voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, which embraces nothing but personal property, is neither a chattel mortgage nor a trust deed in the nature thereof. (Crow v. Beardsley, 68 Mo. 498,) and yet it must be acknowledged and recorded. Such acknowledgment may be taken anywhere, the limitation in section 1 as to the residence or place of business of the assignor having application to the recording only, and not to the acknowledgment of the instrument. Zimmerman v. Willard, 114 Ill. 364. Nor does section 1 require the acknowledgment of an assignment embracing only personal property to be any different from one which embraces both real and personal estate, or real estate only, either as to the form of the acknowledgment or the character of the officer before whom it is taken. The features here noticed were new, and first appeared in the Act of 1877.

But the great object of all rules of interpretation is to discover the true intention of the law. In arriving at this intention the whole and every part of the statute must be taken and compared together. Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. p. 325; Dubuque Dist. Twp. v. Dubuque, supra. What was the intention of the Act as to the effect to be given to the recording of the assignment?

Section 1 requires the assignment to be recorded in the county where the maker of it resides, or where the business in respect of which it is made has been carried on, and also in the county where the land lies, if it embraces land. The place where it is to be recorded, under this section, is unquestionably the recorder's office of the county. But section 3 requires it to be also recorded in the county court. The assignee is therein directed to "file with the clerk of the county court where such assignment shall be recorded" a true and full inventory, etc. In Hanchett v. Waterbury, 115 Ill. 220, section 8 is interpreted as providing for filing and recording of the assignment in the county court. The county court, where it is recorded, must be the county court of the county named in section 1, that is, of the county where it is recorded in the recorder's office. This appears from the language used in section 5, where it is provided that the notice to the creditor, whose claim is excepted to, shall be served and be returnable "at the next term of the county court in said county." The words "said county" cannot be construed to refer to any other county than that in which the assignment is recorded in the recorder's office as specified in section 1. It certainly could never have been the design of the Act that the assignment should be recorded in the recorder's office of the county of the maker's residence, and also in the county court of another and different county where his business had been carried on.

It follows that the assignment must first be recorded in the recorder's office before it is filed in the county court. The county court, where it is to be filed, cannot be determined or designated until it is first recorded in the recorder's office. It must be recorded in the county court of the county where it has been placed on record in the recorder's office. Inasmuch as the assignment may be recorded in the recorder's office either of the county where the debtor resides, or of the county where he has carried on his business, then, if it is allowable to first record it in the county court of one of these counties, it might afterward be recorded in the recorder's office of the other county. I conclude, therefore, that the recording of the assignment in the recorder's office is a prerequisite to its record in the county court.

The assignor and assignee are not the only parties interested in the assignment. All the creditors of the former are interested in it. One of the objects of recording it in the recorder's office is to give the creditors notice not only that an assignment has been made, but notice also of the terms and provisions of the instrument. One of the evils designed to be remedied by the Act was the secrecy of assignments. The object of filing the assignment in the county court is to bring it and the assignee named in it under the jurisdiction and control of the court. The Act nowhere provides for bringing the assignee before the court by the issuance and service of process upon him. As was said in Hanchett v. Waterbury, supra, "upon the making, filing and recording of the assignment, with the lists and schedules annexed, the county court, wherein such assignment is filed and recorded . . . at once acquired jurisdiction," etc.

It is very evident that the provisions for the recording of the assignment, as contained in sections 1 and 8, must be mandatory, as the recording in the recorder's office is necessary to designate the court which is to take jurisdiction, and the recording in the court is necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the court so designated. A part of section 12, under which this proceeding was instituted, is as follows: "In case any assignee shall fail or neglect, for the period of twenty days after the making of any assignment, to file an inventory and valuation and give bonds as required by this Act, it shall be the duty of the county judge of the county where such assignment may be recorded, on the application of any person interested as creditor or otherwise, to appoint some one or more discreet and qualified person or persons to execute the trust embraced in such assignment," etc. In order that the court may know that the twenty days have passed, it must know when the assignment was made. Here again the necessity of holding the requirement as to the acknowledgment and recording of the instrument to be mandatory, is apparent. It may not be possible to show by oral testimony when the assignment was made, but such date can easily and at once be determined, if the assignment, with its accompanying certificate of acknowledgment has been recorded as directed in sections 1 and 8.

It will be noted that in section 12 the recording of the assignment is referred to for the third time. The new assignee is to be appointed by the "county judge of the county where such assignment may be recorded." If no assignment has been recorded, the power of appointment does not exist. It cannot be said that the person here referred to is the county judge of the county where it is allowable or permissible to record the assignment. The word "may" is here used in the same sense in which it is used in the last line of section 1, where it is said that the assignment "shall also be recorded in the county . . . in which said land may be situated." It there refers to the possibility that there may be land in more than one county. So in section 12, the assignment may be recorded either in the county where the debtor resides or in that where he has carried on business. The judge of that one of these counties, in which it may happen to be recorded, shall make the appointment.

But it is necessary that there should have been a previous recording of the assignment in both the recorder's office and the county court. Otherwise, the court would have no jurisdiction over the assignee and no power to remove him and appoint his successor. Section 12 gives the power to appoint a new assignee in case the old one fails or neglects "to file an inventory and valuation and give bonds as required by this Act," that is by section 3 of the Act. Section 3 requires the assignee to file an inventory and valuation "with the clerk of the county court where such assignment shall be recorded." This language presupposes that the assignment has been recorded in the county court before the inventory and valuation are filed there. The latter are filed in a court where the assignment has already been recorded for the purpose, among other things, of fixing the amount of the bond to be given.

I am, therefore, of the opinion that the power of appointment conferred by section 12 does not exist except in a case where the county court has obtained jurisdiction by the recording of the assignment in that court. If this be not the correct construction then either the Assignment Act is unconstitutional or section 12 is to be treated as nugatory for the want of machinery to carry it into effect.

It is claimed by counsel for appellants that the county judge may appoint a new assignee under section 12, even though the assignment has not been acknowledged or recorded, either in the recorder's office or the county court. If this be so, what follows? Under the construction thus contended for, every assignee in every assignment made in the state is peremptorily compelled to go into the county court and submit himself to the supervision of that court by filing an inventory and appraisal and entering into bonds, or in default of doing so, is subjected to the penalty of being removed by the county judge from his office and supplanted therein by a new assignee. This is vesting county courts with exclusive jurisdiction over the administration of trusts and the removal of trustees, so far as voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors are concerned. The administration of trusts and the removal of trustees are well established grounds of equitable jurisdiction. By section 12 of article 6 of the Constitution, "the circuit court shall have original jurisdiction of all cases in law and equity." The Legislature has no power to deprive them of this jurisdiction. Myers v. People, 67 Ill. 508; Darling v. McDonald, 101 Ill. 370; Howell v. Moores, 127 Ill. 67. It can only confer upon county courts concurrent and not exclusive jurisdiction in these matters. Therefore, if the construction sought to be put upon the Act by the appellants should be held to be correct, it would impose upon this court the necessity either of declaring the whole Act unconstitutional or of holding section 12 to be void, so as to eliminate it and leave the balance of the Act to stand.

The assignee named in the assignment by the debtor has an interest which he cannot be deprived of without being heard. He has become vested with the title to the property. Before the county court can remove him and appoint some one in his place, as provided in section 12, he must in some way be brought before the court. If he has filed no assignment therein nor in any way submitted to its jurisdiction before the appointment of a new assignee is applied for, how is the county court to bring him in and get jurisdiction over him? The Act provides no process and furnishes no machinery for that purpose. The citation mentioned in section 7 is to be issued against an assignee already under the control of the court.

It is true that section 14 confers upon the county court "full authority and jurisdiction . . . to execute and carry out the provisions of this Act." But under this general clause, the court would have no power to devise and invent for itself a mode of procedure by which it could stretch out its arms and bring before it the assignee and creditors, all of whom are interested in the appointment of a new trustee, and are necessary parties to an application for that purpose. It is the province of the Legislature to prescribe the mode of procedure to be adopted by courts in bringing parties before them. Chapter 22 of the Revised Statutes, which provides for the exercise of chancery jurisdiction by circuit courts, specifies what sort of a summons must issue and how it must be served and returned and how nonresidents may be brought in by publication, etc. Chapter 37 of the Revised Statutes, wherein county courts are vested with jurisdiction in certain common-law cases, uses these words: "The process, practice, and pleadings in said court in common law cases, shall be the same as in the circuit court in similar cases," etc. The Assignment Act contains no such provisions as these nor any provisions of any kind, as to the mode of exercising the power of appointment conferred by section 12.

In Burns v. Henderson, 20 Ill. 264, it was said by Mr. Chief Justice Caton: "Wherever it is possible we must so construe the statutes as to make them harmonize with the Constitution." The construction here given to section 12, namely that it contemplates the appointment of an assignee in the place of one who has already been brought under the jurisdiction of the county court by the recording of the assignment therein, makes that section, as well as the balance of the Act, harmonize with the Constitution.

I think that the judgment of the appellate court, which held the appointment of a new assignee in the place of Cohen to be erroneous, should be affirmed.

Wilkin, J., also dissenting:

In my opinion, the decision in this case gives the assignment statute of this state the effect of an involuntary assignment law, and vests county courts with the jurisdiction of involuntary insolvency tribunals. That Silverman did not attempt or intend to make an assignment under the statutes, and that the instrument executed by him is not such an assignment on its face, is, as I understand, conceded. It seems to me clear that the statute contemplated only a general assignment, viz., an assignment of all the debtor's property for the benefit of all his creditors. I think the illustration given in the foregoing opinion, of a debtor owning a store, etc.,

14 T. R. A.

and a farm, and making an assignment of the former, and retaining control of the latter, if carried to its logical conclusion will show that the construction placed upon the statute by that opinion would lead to endless confusion, and practically defeat the object of the statute. Besides, such an attempt on the part of a debtor would be unlawful. As I understand the Act, an insolvent debtor cannot make an assignment for the benefit of all his creditors of only a part of his property, (not exempt by law,) to be prorated among them. Treating the instrument executed by Silverman to Cohen as an assignment for the benefit of creditors, it must, in my opinion, be given the effect of a general assignment, to bring it within the jurisdiction of the county court. I find no authority in the statute or elsewhere giving county courts of this state jurisdiction to bring before them debtors who have made conveyances of property to secure creditors, not purporting or intended to be assignments under the statute, and, either with or without extraneous evidence, construe such conveyance into a general assignment for the benefit of all creditors of the grantor, and thus compel him to surrender his entire estate to be administered upon under the jurisdiction of such court; in other words, to force him into insolvency. We have frequently said: "Until a debtor is ready and determines to yield the dominion of his property, and makes an assignment for the benefit of his creditors under the statute, his right to dispose of his estate as he chooses is unaffected by the statute." Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208; Schroeder v. Walsh, 120 Ill. 403, 8 West. Rep. 501; Field v. Geohagan, 125 Ill. 63, 14 West. Rep. 387; Hulse v. Mershon, 125 Ill. 52, 14 West. Rep. 366; Hanford Oil Co. v. Chicago First Nat. Bank, 126 Ill. 584; Home Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Sanchez, 131 Ill. 330; Farwell v. Nilsson, 133 Ill. 45. That intention, in my judgment, must be manifested by the voluntary execution of a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, in substantial conformity to the statute. I do not hold that the validity of an assignment should be made to depend upon a strict compliance with the statute as to the form and manner of its execution. In this case, however, appellants attempt to bring the conveyance in question within the provisions of the statute, and the estate of Silverman within the jurisdiction of the county court, against his protest, without showing that the instrument upon which they rely for that purpose was executed or intended to be executed in conformity with the requirements of the law. If there is sufficient reason to be found in the statute for the construction of an instrument like the one in question into an assignment under the statute, it must be found in section 13, prohibiting preferences, etc.; and that I understand to be the ground upon which this decision is based. We have often held that section 13 does not prohibit preferences, except when provided for in the assignment itself, or where, as in Preston v. Spaulding, supra, the preference is made by the debtor after he has determined to make an assignment under the statute, for the purpose of evading that section, and does, in fact, afterwards attempt to avail himself of the provisions of the Act by making an assignment under it. Had Silverman given preference to the creditors named in the conveyance in question, by transferring, pledging, or mortgaging his effects to them, or if he had confessed judgments in their favor, thus creating liens upon such property, even though he had done so with the avowed purpose of giving preferences, and to evade said section 18, neither the county court nor a court of equity could have interfered on behalf of petitioners or other creditors; the common-law right of a debtor to prefer creditors in either of these ways having been sustained in many of our decisions above cited. But at common law a debtor might not only exercise his right to give preferences in any one of the above-named modes, but he might also do so by a partial assignment, viz., by transferring property to a third person in trust to hold and dispose of for the benefit of the preferred creditors. Burrill, Assignm. p. 231, § 161; also Id. (5th ed.) p. 226, § 164. Section 18 does not purport to take away that right. As before stated, our statute was manifestly intended to regulate general assignments. It was designed, doubtless, to secure creditors in such assignments against an unequal distribution of a debtor's estate. By availing himself of it, the debtor also obtains important rights and privileges.

A Statute of New Hampshire, in force July 5, 1834, provided that no assignment made for the benefit of creditors should be valid unless it provided for an equal distribution of all the debtor's property among his creditors, in proportion to their claims. It was held in Meredith Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 8 N. H. 347, that that act did not apply to an assignment made by a debtor of some part of his property, merely for the purpose of paying some particular debt; and Richardson, Ch. J., rendering the opinion of the court, after stating abuses growing out of the making of general assignments prior to the passage of the statute, said: "And it is manifest that the Statute of 1834 was intended to regulate those general assignments by debtors of all their property, and place, in such cases, all the creditors on equal footing, securing to each his just proportion, according to the amount of his debt, and to guard the creditors against the fraud of having only a part of the debtor's property assigned for their benefit, when contracted to assign the whole. Hence he is required to make oath that the assignment includes all his property not exempt from attachment. It could never have been the intention to prohibit a debtor from assigning any particular property he might possess, for the purpose of paying any particular debt or debts that he might owe." In Grubbe v. Morris, 108 Ind. 166, 1 West. Rep. 185, it was held that the Indiana statute concerning general assignments prohibited preferences; but Elliott, J., rendering the opinion, said: "Where there is only a partial transfer of property, as when part only of the debtor's property is conveyed, or where only one creditor is preferred, and there is no general assignment, a conveyance to a trustee will, according to our decisions, be sustained, as not in contravention of the statute." And he quotes from Cushman v. Gephart, 97 Ind. 46, as follows: "This statute only provides for a general assignment of all the debtor's property for the benefit of all his creditors, and when that is attempted the statute must be complied with, or the assignment, without regard to actual fraud, will be held fraudulent and void; but an assignment by a debtor for the benefit of part of his creditors, in order to be held void, must be actually fraudulent." He also points out some of the benefits which accrue to a debtor by statutes governing general assignments. Section 1556 of the Code of Alabama provided: "Every general assignment made by a debtor, by which a preference or priority of payment is given to one or more creditors over the remaining creditors of the grantor, shall be and inure to the benefit of all the creditors of the grantor equally." The supreme court of that state held, in Holt v. Bancroft, 30 Ala. 199, that the statute did not interfere with the debtor's common-law right to prefer creditors by a partial assignment; Walker, J., saying: "The object of the statute was to prohibit all discrimination by a debtor making a general assignment in favor of his creditors. It does not aim to deny, and does not deny, to a debtor, the power of securing a creditor's debt by a conveyance of a part of his property. The right of preferring creditors by partial assignments is untouched by the section of the Code quoted. It is not the preference itself, but the preference as a feature of a general assignment, that the statute condemns." The Iowa Code of 1851, § 977, said: "No general assignment of property by an insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, for the benefit of creditors of assignor, shall be valid, unless it be made for the benefit of all his creditors, in proportion to the amount of their respective claims." It was held in Lampson & Powers v. Arnold, 19 Iowa, 486, that this statute did not prohibit or interfere with the right of a debtor, as it existed prior to the statute, to make a partial assignment; holding that the statute applied only to general assignments. Other authorities to the same effect might be cited. These are, as I understand, in harmony with our former decisions construing section 18 of our statute. Our statute neither prohibits preferences, nor interferes with the mode of exercising the right, so long as a debtor does not seek to avail himself of its provision. Until then he may exercise that right in any mode authorized by the common law, and hence may make a partial assignment for that purpose. I have not attempted to elaborate the views indicated in the foregoing dissent. With deference to the opinion of my brethren, I am unable to concur in either the reasoning or conclusion presented in the opinion of Justice Baker. I think the judgment of the appellate court should have been affirmed.

Second rehearing denied.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.).

Robert DEELEY et al., Respts.,
v.
John DWIGHT et al., Impleaded, etc.,
Appts.

(.....N. Y.....)

A mortgage on chattels afterwards manufactured does not give the mortgagee a sufficient title to sustain an action for conversion.

(March 8, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendants John Dwight and John E. Dwight from an order of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York granting a new trial upon exceptions heard before it in the first instance which were taken during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain machinery in which a verdict was directed in favor of defendants. Reversed.

Statement by Follett, Ch. J.:

In the autumn of 1888, Joseph Gandolfo contracted to sell machinery to be manufactured, and thereafter delivered to the defendants, for $5,666. In performance of the contract, Gandolfo furnished additions and

NOTE.—Efficacy of mortgage on chattels to be manufactured or acquired as independent articles and not as the increase or fruits of existing property.

The law upon this subject seems to be comprised in a general rule and several exceptions or qualifications, more or less well defined which have in practice if not in theory almost wholly overcome and superseded the rule. Whatever the effect of the mortgage upon the after-acquired property may be the mere attempt to include such property in the mortgage will not render it wholly void. Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 488; Gardner v. McKen, 19 N. Y. 123; State v. Tasker, 31 Mo. 445; Voorhis v. Langsdorf, Id. 451.

Such a mortgage is not regarded as fraudulent per se. Petring v. Chrysler, 90 Mo. 649.

And it will bind the property in possession when it is given. Ross v. Wilson, 7 Bush, 34; Wagner v. Watts, 2 Cranch, C. C. 109; but see Carpenter v. Simmons, 1 Robt. 360.

At least it is not absolutely void where there is no arrangement permitting the mortgagor to deal with the goods mortgaged, and no knowledge of such dealing on the part of the mortgagee. Yates v. Olmsted, 56 N. Y. 632.

As to the effect of permitting the mortgagor to deal with the property, see note to Ephraim v. Kelleher, post. —

The general rule.

The general rule is that no chattel mortgage can be executed which will bind personal property which either is not in existence or does not belong to the mortgagor. Barnard v. Eaton, 2 Cush. 303; Henshaw v. Bank of Bellows Falls, 10 Gray, 573; Chesley v. Josselyn, 7 Gray, 489; Pettis v. Kellogg, 7 Cush. 456; Looker v. Peckwell, 38 N. J. L. 253; Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 493; Fisher v. Syfers, 109 Ind. 514; Letourno v. Ringgold, 3 Cranch, C. C. 108; Gale v. Burnell, 7 Q. B. 850; Chapin v. Cram, 40 Me. 561; Williams v. Briggs, 11 R. I. 476; St. Louis Drug Co. v. Dart, 7 Mo. App. 599.

A mortgage on property to be subsequently purchased is void for uncertainty. Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb. 118.

It covers only the property then in possession. Wagner v. Watts, 2 Cranch, C. C. 109.

A mortgage of a building "and also such tools and other property as is now contemplated to be placed in the building" does not create a lien on the property afterwards placed therein but is void for uncertainty as against a mortgagee of the property whose mortgage is executed after the property is placed therein. Winslow v. Merchants Ins. Co. 4 Met. 306, 38 Am. Dec. 368.

A mortgage professing to cover the "scythes, iron, steel, and coal" then owned by the mortgagor, and also "all scythes, steel, iron and coal which may be purchased in lieu of the aforesaid property," is, as respects the property to be subsequently acquired, void for uncertainty. Otis v. Sill, supra.

Where a mortgage was given upon the furniture of a hotel as security for rent, which contained a stipulation that if any of it should be sold and more purchased in its place the latter should stand as security in the same manner, and that the mortgagor should execute a new mortgage thereon, it was held that the after-acquired property would not be bound until a new mortgage was actually executed on it. Codman v. Freeman, 3 Cush. 309.

No verbal agreement between mortgagor and mortgagee can substitute future acquired property in place of that primarily covered by the mortgage as the same is from time to time acquired. Powers v. Freeman, 2 Lana. 181.

The result of this is that the mortgagee cannot maintain an action at law against a party interfering with the property. Hamilton v. Rogers, 8 Md. 301.

The Georgia Code, § 1864, however, permits mortgages upon stocks of goods which shall cover the stock as it changes from time to time.

Effect as between the parties.

Since the mortgagor has agreed to bind his after-acquired property in favor of the mortgagee, and it is right that he should keep his contract, the courts have, when the question has arisen simply between mortgagor and mortgagee and the rights of third persons were not involved, held the property bound and the mortgage sufficient to protect the mortgagee in dealing with the property according to the terms of the mortgage. Ludwig v. Kipp, 20 Hun, 235; Loth v. Carty, 85 Ky. 501; Leland v. Collier, 34 Mich. 418; Allen v. Goodnow, 71 Me. 420; Chidell v. Galsworthy, 6 C. B. N. S. 470.

The title when acquired inures to the benefit of the mortgagee. Marshall v. Stewart, 30 Ind. 191.

As between the parties a mortgage on a stock of goods may cover goods afterwards put in to keep up the stock. Cadwell v. Pray, 41 Mich. 307.

Effect of further act to perfect title in mortgages.

In justice one who has received a grant of chattels which the grantor did not at the time possess but which he has subsequently acquired should take title to them. The chief reason for denying such a right is the opportunity which it affords to defraud third persons. If the rights of strangers are protected there is very little reason for refusing to establish the grantee's rights. Therefore the courts quite early determined that if after the chattels came into possession of the grantor some new act took place sufficient to indicate to the world that the title to them had been placed in the grantee he should be protected in their possession even as performed labor, for which the defendants agreed to pay $557.50; making the full amount of the indebtedness $6,233.50, which the defendants paid, as follows: October 23, 1883, check, $2,250; November 22, 1883, check, $1,500; December 11, 1883, check, $2,478.50. The machinery was manufactured by the plaintiffs for Gandolfo, and was delivered to him at various dates in February, March, and April, 1884, for which he agreed to pay the plaintiffs $4,700. As the different pieces of machinery were delivered to Gandolfo, he delivered them to the defendants, who set them up in their factory. February 21, 1884, before much, if any, of the machinery was manufactured, Gandolfo gave his promissory note, due on demand, to Robert Deeley, one of the plaintiffs, for $4,700, the agreed purchase price, to secure the payment of which Gandolfo on that day executed, and delivered to Robert Deeley, a chattel mortgage upon the machinery then manufactured, and that which was afterwards to be made and delivered, pursuant to the oral contract theretofore entered into between them. The mortgage was in the usual form, and recited that the articles are "now in the possession of the said party of the first part in the building of Messrs. John Dwight & Co., First avenue, between 112th and 118th streets, in the city of New York." The mortgage contained the usual clause selling the goods to the mortgagee upon condition, and as security, and that, in case default was made in payment, power was given to take and sell the goods. Afterwards $1,500 was paid on the note, and May 13, 1885, the mortgagee indorsed a statement against the claims of third persons subsequently acquired. There has been some diversity of opinion as to the character of the act which was sufficient; but it is generally conceded that possession will complete the mortgagee's title. Hope v. Hayley, 5 El. & Bl. 830; Curr v. Allatt, 8 Hurlst. & N. 604; Gregg v. Sandford, 24 Ill. 1.

It was held in an early Massachusetts case that evidence that the mortgagee took possession of the goods for the purpose of foreclosing his mortgage is irrelevant and immaterial as against attaching creditors. Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 458.

But that doctrine would probably not be followed now. It is sufficient if the mortgagee takes possession of the property of his own motion, without any suggestion from the mortgagor and with full knowledge of the latter's insolvency. Chase v. Denny, 120 Mass. 569.

Taking possession of the property under an agreement that the mortgagee may sell it to pay his claim and account to the mortgagor for the surplus is sufficient to give the mortgagee a good title as against attaching creditors. Rowley v. Rice, 11 Met. 353.

Merely momentary delivery of the property to the mortgagee with immediate redelivery to the mortgagor and subsequent continuous possession by him is not sufficient to perfect the title of the mortgagee as against attaching creditors. Griffith v. Douglas, 73 Me. 532, 40 Am. Rep. 395.

Delivery of the property to a common carrier to be transported to the mortgagee is not such a delivery to the latter as to perfect his equitable title. Parker v. Jacobs, 14 S. C. 112, 37 Am. Rep. 721.

If the mortgagor, after the property is acquired, surrenders the possession of it by deed or otherwise to the mortgagee it would constitute such new act as to confirm the conveyance. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. v. Commercial Bank, 11 Wis. 207, 13 L. R. A.

Property contemplated as additions to other property.

The scope of this note does not include the validity of mortgages upon chattels which may be designated as the increase or products of property already in possession of the mortgagor. The subject of a mortgage on crops has already been treated in a note to Lofrin v. Hines, 10 L. R. A. 490, 107 N. C. 360, and the remainder of the subject will be treated in another place.

Nor does it include the general subject of railroad mortgages; but there are a few cases which are decided upon principles analogous to those governing those dealing with mortgages upon the increase of property already in the mortgagor's possession which it is deemed best to collect here.

In Morrill v. Noyes, 56 Me. 458, 96 Am. Dec. 492, in which the validity of a mortgage upon railroad equipments to be subsequently acquired was involved, the court makes a thorough examination of the question, and adopting much of the reasoning usually applied in case of mortgages of increase of property, it finally states the two following rules for determining the validity of such mortgages:

1. The contract must relate to some particular property described therein which, though not in existence, must be reasonably certain to come into existence, so that the minds of the parties may be in agreement as to what it is to be.

2. The vendor or mortgagor must have a present, actual interest in it, or concerning it. There must be something in present, of which the thing in futuro is to be the product, or with which it is to be connected, as necessary for its use, or as incident to it, constituting a tangible, existing basis for the contract.

It finally upholds the lien of the mortgage upon the after-acquired railroad equipments upon the ground that the mortgagors had an existing interest in and title to the road, franchises, etc., which were mortgaged, of which the after-acquired property was to be an essential part necessary to its use, to be added to it for the purpose of finishing it.

That case has been followed by a few cases in which mortgages upon a similar class of property have been involved. Thus, a mortgage of the upon the mortgage that there was then due and unpaid thereon $4,819.75, and on the same day filed it in the office of the register of the city and county of New York. The mortgage had not been previously filed, and the defendants had no notice of its existence, nor of the plaintiffs' claim, and before it was filed defendants had expended $5,855.27 in setting it up, in other machinery and improvements to be used in connection with that sought to be recovered.

Messrs. Forster, Hotelling, & Klenke, for respondents:

Assuming that all or some of the articles mortgaged were not in existence at the time the mortgage was given, it is still a valid mortgage, as it is a purchase-money mortgage; and as the plaintiffs finished the articles from time to time, the mortgage took effect as to each article immediately upon its completion or at least upon its delivery, as to any one not a bona fide purchaser for value from Gandolfo.

The exception established by equity.

The principal exception to the rule as above announced, and the one most far-reaching in its results, was evolved and established by courts of equity. The precise limits of this equitable exception are not yet fully defined, although many judges in many cases have labored to give it precise form. To what extent the old rule has been modified or overthrown by this exception can be determined only by a review of the authorities.

In Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, 647, which is usually regarded as the leading case in this country, the mortgage was partly on property to be afterwards acquired. After it had been acquired the mortgagee took possession of it, and a little more than a month afterwards the mortgagor made an assignment in bankruptcy and the controversy was between the mortgagee and the assignee in bankruptcy. The court, after reaching the conclusion that the assignee in bankruptcy was subject to the same equities which bound the assignor, stated that "the question is narrowed down to the mere consideration whether or not the mortgage of after-acquired property is valid as against the mortgagor," and, after reviewing numerous authorities, the matter is summed up as follows: "Wherever the parties by their contract intend to create a positive lien or charge upon personal property, whether owned by the assignor or not, or whether then in case or not, it attaches in equity as a lien or charge upon the particular property as soon as the assignor acquires title to it against him and all persons asserting a claim thereto under him, either voluntarily or with notice, or in bankruptcy."

It will be noticed that that case, outside of the reasoning of Mr. Justice Story, added very little to the law upon the question, because, first, the mortgagee had actually taken possession of the property, which, as shown above, was sufficient to perfect his title; and second, the court states that the question is as to the validity of the mortgage as against the mortgagor. The authorities cited above show it to have been valid, and the case might have been disposed of on either ground without the elaborate equitable argument.

In Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 191, which may be regarded as the leading English case upon the subject, a mortgage had been given upon the machinery in a mill and by its terms it was to include all machinery afterwards placed therein by way of addition or substitution. A conflict arose between the claims of the mortgagee and an execution creditor as to the right to property placed in the mill after the execution of the mortgage. The Lord Chancellor said if a mortgagor agrees to mortgage property of which he is not possessed at the time, and he receives the consideration and afterwards becomes possessed of property answering the description in the contract, equity will compel him to perform the contract if it was of a class that could be specifically enforced, and therefore the contract would in equity transfer the beneficial interest to the mortgagee immediately on the property being acquired, and from that time the mortgagor will hold in trust for the mortgagee; and he held that the mortgagee was to be preferred to the judgment creditor, although he had made no attempt to perfect his claim after the property was acquired. He further intimated that although the contract did not relate to specific goods it would attach to anything which was acquired by the mortgagor and which answered the description in the contract. Lord Chelmsford, during the course of his opinion in the same case, said the right of priority of an equitable mortgagee over a judgment creditor though without notice may now be considered to be formally established; and he further said that the notice provided by the recording of the mortgage was sufficient to charge persons who contemplated dealing with the property. In this latter case the mortgage is given precedence over an execution creditor who had simply constructive notice of the mortgage. Carried to its logical ultimate conclusion that case would establish the doctrine that a duly recorded mortgage would be valid as against all the world, even upon property to be subsequently acquired, if the property was described so that it could be readily recognized from the description as soon as it came into the mortgagor's possession, and that equity would protect the rights of the mortgagee against all claimants. It is apparent that such a rule would create immediate conflict between law and equity, and there has been much hesitation in adopting it to its full extent.

Gandolfo and the Dwights also by being in privity with him are estopped by the warranty of title in the mortgage from claiming that he had no title at the time the mortgage was given.

A chattel mortgage is valid without filing as against all persons except creditors having judgments or liens and subsequent purchasers in good faith.

The term "subsequent purchaser in good faith" does not include one who takes in payment of a precedent debt, or one who takes in performance of an executory contract of sale made prior to the acquiring possession or of some evidence of title by the vendor, although the price is paid at the time of the contract. It only includes those who part with value at the time the title or property is transferred or delivered and on the faith thereof.

Estoppel was not made out because the de-

The position of the courts is very well summed up in the quotation made in the principal case from Kribbs v. Alford, 120 N. Y. 524, where the court explains the different applications of the rule at law and in equity as follows: "Invalidity at law imports nothing more than that a mortgage of property thereafter to be acquired is ineffectual as a grant to pass the legal title. A court of equity, in giving effect to such a provision, does not put itself in conflict with that principle. It does not hold that a conveyance of that which does not exist operates as a present transfer in equity, any more than it does in law. But it construes the instrument as operating by way of present contract, to give a lien, which, as between the parties, takes effect and attaches to the subject of it as soon as it comes into the ownership of the party."

In Ludlum v. Rothschild, 41 Minn. 222, the court states the rule as follows: "Whenever the parties by their contract in clear terms express an intention to create a positive lien upon personal property, not then owned but to be subsequently acquired by the mortgagor, whether then in esse or not, the mortgage attaches as a lien on the property as soon as the mortgagor acquires it, as against the mortgagor, and all claiming under him either by voluntary transfer or with notice, precisely as if the property had been in being and belonged to the mortgagor when the mortgage was executed. Of course it is necessary, as in the case of any mortgage, that the property should be definitely pointed out, so that it may be distinguished or identified."

The doctrine that after-acquired property may in equity be subjected to a mortgage lien is applicable only where the contract of the mortgagor to transfer to the mortgagee is such as, under the circumstances, will be subject to a decree of specific performance. The mortgage will not attach to property which has been acquired under such fraudulent circumstances that the vendor may rescind as against the exercise of such right. Williamson v. New Jersey S. R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 320.

Equity treats a mortgage of property to be afterwards acquired as a contract binding, in consequence to execute the mortgage upon it at the very instant it comes into being, and will enforce specific performance. Or it will consider it as already done if no specific performance is requested and then by virtue of the equitable doctrine of notice bind everyone to respect the equitable lien who knows of it or without knowing of it has got the property without a valuable consideration. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Page, 35 Ark. 804.

In Williams v. Winsor, 12 R. I. 9, the court says, in reply to the objection that it is inconsistent and unjust, that equity should adopt a different doctrine from that at law, that this is only one of the many cases where a party has a remedy in equity where he has none at law, and we can see no greater inconsistency in it than in the fact that a party is at law obliged to adopt a particular form of action.

Applications of the equitable exceptions.

The mortgage was treated as valid without discussion, in Howell v. Frances (N. J.) Aug. 18, 1887; Hulsizer v. Opdyke (N. J.) April 30, 1888.

It is good between the parties and as against antecedent creditors. Zaring v. Cox, 78 Ky. 537.

As between mortgagor and mortgagee the latter will be vested in equity with the title to all the subjects within the scope of the mortgage as soon as they come into existence or become the property of the mortgagor. *McCaffrey v. The mortgage attaches as soon as the property is acquired and is good against a subsequent mortgage upon the same property executed after it is acquired. Stillers v. Lester, 43 Miss. 518.

A mortgage on furnishings which are to be placed in a store to fit it for business is good in equity and an equitable lien will attach to them as soon as they are put in which is good against the mortgagor and subsequent mortgagees with notice. Keating v. Hannenkamp, 100 Mo. 167.

It is good as against purchaser with notice. American Cigar Co. v. Foster, 86 Mich. 368; Robson v. Michman Cent. R. Co. 87 Mich. 70; Davis v. Marx, 55 Miss. 376.

The equitable lien will not prevail against the claim of antecedent creditors obtaining judgment and levying executions subsequently to the execution of the mortgage. Parker v. Jacobs, 14 S. C. 112, 37 Am. Rep. 727.

Equity will protect the right of the mortgagee against subsequent execution creditors. Smithurst v. Edmunds, 14 N. J. Eq. 415.

In Levy v. Welsh, 2 Edw. Ch. 443, 6 L. ed. 460, an equity case, the vice-chancellor restricted the lien of the mortgage to so much of the property as was in the store at the time the mortgage was given and so much as had been purchased and paid for out of its proceeds.

Where after the execution of the mortgage covering after-acquired property the mortgagor purchased furniture for which he did not pay and a judgment was recovered for the debt and execution levied on such furniture, in a contest between the mortgagee and execution creditor the court said equity will not interpose its assistance to hand over to the mortgagee this property which in all good conscience and justice should go back to the defendants never made any effort whatever to learn whether Gandolfo had possession of or a title to this machinery when they paid him, and never even at the time of delivery or afterwards made any search for mortgages or any effort to learn whether he had put any lien on it.

But another court has held that the fact that the judgment was for the purchase price of the goods levied on will not give the judgment creditor an equitable right superior to that of the mortgagee. Page v. Kendig (N. J.) Feb. 10, 1887.

The lien of the mortgage will not give precedence in equity over that of a landlord for rent. Beall v. White, 34 U. S. 382, 24 L. ed. 173.

The mortgagee acquires a better right than an assignee in insolvency. National Shoe & L. Bank of Auburn v. Small, 7 Fed. Rep. 637.

It is good against an assignee for creditors. Williams v. Winsor, 12 B. L. 9.

Assignees in bankruptcy acquire only the rights which their assignor had. Price v. Groom, 2 Exch. 542.

A mortgage on property to be acquired in futuro which does not specify any property to which it is to attach will not in equity create a specific lien on the property when it is acquired. Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb. 113.

A contract to mortgage after-acquired chattels will not be enforced in equity if no chattels are specifically described the only description being that contained in the general word "property." Borden v. Croak, 131 Ill. 76.

After-acquired chattels definitely pointed out as by reference to the place into which they are to be brought may lawfully be mortgaged in equity. Brett v. Carter, 2 Low. Dec. 461.

Property which never comes into possession of the mortgagor is not subject to the lien of the mortgage. Curtis v. Wilcox, 49 Mich. 425.

The mortgage can attach to the after-acquired property only in the condition in which it comes into the possession of the mortgagor. Hall v. Mullanphy Plan. Mill Co. 16 Mo. App. 454.

Where the equitable exception is not recognized.

If the contract can be upheld in equity it is only valid as a contract to assign when the property shall be acquired and not as an assignment of a present interest, and if enforceable in equity at all it can only be enforced as a right under the contract and not as a trust attached to the property. Ross v. Wilson, 7 Bush, 84; Otis v. Sill, supra.

A mortgage of property in which the mortgagor has no present interest, and which he must acquire if at all independently of any property he now has, is not valid to create a lien which equity will recognize or enforce. Wilson v. Seibert (Ky.) 8 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 608.

Where a mortgage was given upon a stock of goods which remained in possession of the mortgagor and was to some extent changed, the court refused to recognize the lien as against an attaching creditor further than upon the property originally mortgaged. Wedgewood v. Citizens Nat. Bank, 29 Neb. 165.

A mortgage of property to be acquired in futuro 18 L. R. A.

is void and cannot avail against claims of other creditors. Loth v. Carty, 85 Ky. 591.

There is no lien either at law or in equity. Hunter v. Bosworth, 43 Wis. 591; Case v. Fish, 53 Wis. 56; Titus v. Mabree, 25 Ill. 257.

The mortgagee derives no available right to the subsequently acquired property as against the creditors of the mortgagor. Ross v. Wilson, supra.

In Blanchard v. Cooke, 144 Mass. 224, in which a contract rather than a mortgage was under consideration, the court stated quite fully the Massachusetts law on the subject of mortgages of after-acquired property, and concluded that to enable a mortgagee as against an attaching creditor or an assignee in insolvency to hold chattels acquired after the execution of the mortgage there must be a delivery to him or possession must be rightfully taken by him and such possession must be retained until the chattels have been attached or levied upon or until proceedings in insolvency are begun.

Unless the mortgage is recorded or possession taken under it of the after-acquired property the title of the mortgagee will not prevail against that of a subsequent execution creditor. Gregg v. Sandford, 24 Ill. 17, 76 Am. Dec. 722.

Some further act by the parties after the property comes into existence is necessary to perfect the title of the mortgagee whether he seeks to enforce his rights at law or in equity. Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 81, 46 Am. Dec. 706.

In Hunt v. Bullock, 23 Ill. 325, the court said until possession is acquired by the mortgagee equity will not afford relief but will leave the party to his remedy at law (by action for breach of contract to execute the mortgage). If it was otherwise it would be to decree specific performance of an agreement for the sale of personal chattels which the court will rarely do as a matter of original jurisdiction. The cases which hold that such agreements create an equitable lien are in violation of the rules of equity jurisprudence.

The attitude of courts of law towards the equitable doctrine.

Courts of law cannot, nor are they disposed to, ignore the fact that courts of equity hold mortgages of after-acquired property to be valid, and they should give full effect to the decree in equity based upon the equity doctrine. To refuse to do so would produce interminable confusion. There does not seem to be any safe ground for courts of law but to hold the foreclosure of an equitable lien when made as effective for all purposes and against all persons as the foreclosure of a legal lien would be. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Page, 35 Ark. 304.

Where there is no distinction between law and equity it seems that all such mortgages are upheld. Page v. Gardner, 20 Mo. 512.

Courts of equity and under our practice courts of law also will recognize the rights of such mortgagee and enforce them as against all persons having notice of them. Scharfenburg v. Bishop, 35 Iowa, 66.

It was not necessary that Dwight should have known that Deeley held the mortgage or who it was; it was sufficient if he knew or suspected that a mortgage had been given.

Ellis v. Horrman, 90 N. Y. 466.

The Dwights having paid in advance for this machinery when Gandolfo, who was not in the machinery business, had no apparent title or possession or any indicia of title, were bound under the circumstances when he delivered these machines before expending money on them to have made some effort to learn the facts, and are chargeable with notice of all that such inquiry would have disclosed.

After-acquired property may be mortgaged. Stephens v. Pence, 55 Iowa, 258.

If the property was in existence at the time the mortgage was executed it may be covered by the mortgage although it was not then the property of the mortgagor. Hughes v. Wheeler, 66 Iowa, 642.

It is immaterial that the property mortgaged was not in existence at the time the mortgage was executed. Fejvary v. Broesch, 52 Iowa, 88.

But in some jurisdictions at least the right must be enforced by the appropriate legal or equitable procedure as the case may require.

The mortgage can be made effective unless the mortgagee has acquired possession under the mortgage only by a proceeding in equity against the mortgagee or persons claiming under or through him who had notice of the equity of the mortgagee before their title or liens attached. An action at law is of no avail. France v. Thomas, 86 Mo. 80.

The title of the mortgagee before possession taken is not such as will sustain an action of replevin. Gregory v. Tavenner, 88 Mo. App. 627.

Sufficiency of record notice.

Under the Illinois statute there must be a schedule of the property annexed to the mortgage which cannot be done in the case of property to be after acquired, hence the mortgage is not good as to that. Davis v. Ransom, 18 Ill. 402; Hunt v. Bullock, 23 Ill. 325.

The record of the mortgage will not charge a subsequent purchaser with notice. Single v. Phelps, 20 Wis. 368. See also Joseph v. Lyons, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 280.

The record of a mortgage is valid only to protect goods which at the time of the mortgage could be delivered and retained. Griffith v. Douglass, 78 Me. 582, 40 Am. Rep. 365.

The record of the mortgage is no sufficient notice of a legal incumbrance as to subsequently acquired property. Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 488.

In contrast with the above, it has been held that the record of the agreement is sufficient notice to bind a subsequent execution creditor. First Nat. Bank of Alexandria v. Turnbull, 32 Gratt. 665.

As between the mortgagor or his assignee having constructive notice of the existence of the mortgage and the mortgagee the mortgage will operate to create a lien in equity as to chattels afterward acquired. Kribbs v. Alford, 120 N. Y. 524.

The effect of Holroyd v. Marshall in England.

After Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 191, was decided an Act was passed in England which purported to abolish the distinction between legal and equitable remedies, and it seems to have been supposed that the combined effect of the decision and statute would be to render mortgages on after-acquired property valid at law. The question was 18 L. R. A.

Dunn v. Hornbeck, 72 N. Y. 80; Danforth v. Dart, 4 Duer, 101; Pringle v. Phillips, 5 Sandf. 157; Parker v. Conner, 93 N. Y. 124.

Follett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action to recover damages for the conversion of chattels is a strictly legal one, which cannot be maintained unless the plaintiff is entitled to the immediate possession of the property, if in existence. Except as provided by statute, possession by the lienor of chattels on which the lien is claimed is indispensable to support a com-subsequently considered by the court and it was decided that the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts 1873-75, have not abolished the distinction between legal and equitable interests; they merely authorized the high court to administer legal and equitable remedies and therefore the grant of future-acquired chattels confers only an equitable interest therein upon the grantee, and if when they come into existence but before the grantee takes possession the legal estate and interest therein without notice of the grantee's existing equitable interest become vested in another person the latter is entitled to the future-acquired chattels comprised in the grant both at law and in equity. And it seems that the record is not such notice. Joseph v. Lyons, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 280.

Where a bill of sale had been granted to one of after-acquired property, and after it came into the mortgagor's possession he granted it to another, the queen's bench division held that the title of the second grantee should prevail. Brett, M. R., said it is true that when the after-acquired property was brought on the mortgagor's premises the condition was fulfilled whereupon the property passed to the mortgagee in equity; but the mortgagor had the legal title and when he granted that legal title to another it cannot be ousted or displaced by the equitable title of the mortgagee of which the second grantee had no notice. The mortgagee is in the same position as the owner of goods who has parted with the property in them through the fraud of another person, and who finds that an innocent person has meanwhile acquired a valid legal title to them, in which case the person upon whom the fraud was perpetrated must suffer the loss. Hallas v. Robinson, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 288.

Further litigation would seem to be necessary to determine what the extent of the equitable exception is since the rendition of these last two decisions.

It is sufficient when the property becomes specific by being placed in the designated building or otherwise. Leatham v. Amor, 38 L. T. 785.

So a mortgage is good upon goods to be brought into a certain store. Lazarus v. Andrade, 43 L. T. 30.

A charge of "all my present and future personality" is too indefinite. Tadman v. D'Epineuil, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 768.

"All other the personal estate and effects whatsoever now being or hereafter to be upon or about the mortgagor's dwelling-house, farm, or premises, at R., or elsewhere in Great Britain," is too indefinite. Belding v. Reed, 3 Hurlst. & C. 955.

If it was only an agreement to mortgage furniture subsequently to be acquired then it would cover no specific furniture and would confer no right in equity. Mogg v. Baker, 3 Mees. & W. 197.

As to the validity of an assignment or mortgage of future earnings, see note to Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Robinson (Iowa) 14 L. R. A. 126. H. P. F.

non-law lien. One having such a lien can maintain trover if the property is wrongfully taken or withheld from his possession, but such an action will not lie to enforce an equitable lien as against the owner of the legal title who remains in possession of the property and has not contracted it to the lienor. The instrument under which the plaintiff claims to recover is in form a chattel mortgage. Gandolfo, who executed it, assumes to transfer the legal title to the machinery to Robert Deeley, the plaintiffs' assignor subject to be defeated upon the payment of $4,700. But the machinery not having been then manufactured, Gandolfo had no title to it, (Andrews v. Durant, 11 N. Y. 85; Comfort v. Kiersted, 26 Barb. 472;) and the instrument did not vest the legal title of the machinery in Deeley, nor did it create a legal lien upon the property described therein, (Gardner v. McEwen, 19 N. Y. 123; Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 481; Pettis v. Kellogg, 7 Cush. 456; Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb. 102; Conderman v. Smith, 41 Barb. 404; Thomas, Chat. Mortg. § 187; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 188.)

We find no case which holds that the legal title to property not in existence, actually or potentially, can be transferred either by way of sale or mortgage. That an equitable lien may be created on property to be brought into existence is well settled, and an action to foreclose the lien may be maintained. It was said in Coats v. Donnell, 94 N. Y. 177: "A contract for a lien on property not in esse may be effectual in equity to give a lien, as between the parties, when the property comes into existence, and where there are no intervening rights of creditors or third persons, seems to be established by several decisions in this court." Kribbe v. Alford, 120 N. Y. 519, which is relied on by the respondents, is not in conflict, but in harmony, with these views. It was there said: "Invalidity at law imports nothing more than that a mortgage of property thereafter to be acquired is ineffectual as a grant to pass the legal title. A court of equity, in giving effect to such a provision, does not put itself in conflict with that principle. It does not hold that a conveyance of that which does not exist operates as a present transfer in equity, any more than it does in law. But it construes the instrument as operating, by way of present contract, to give a lien, which, as between the parties, takes effect, and attaches to the subject of it, as soon as it comes into the ownership of the party. Such we deem the rule to be in equity in this state." McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, 22 Am. Rep. 644; Wiener v. Occumpaugh, 71 N. Y. 118; Coats v. Donnell, 94 N. Y. 168, 177; Hals v. Omaha Nat. Bank, 49 N. Y. 626, 632.

It follows from these views that plaintiffs failed to establish a legal title, either as general or special owners, and were not entitled to recover.

The order should be reversed, and the judgment entered on the verdict, and affirmed with costs.

All concur.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

J. Kennedy TOD et al.

v.

KENTUCKY UNION R. CO. *et al.*ROSSER & COLEMAN, Appts. No. 22.W. & A. C. SEMPLE et al., Appts. No. 29.

(22 Fed. Rep. 241.)

1. A statute giving a lien for lumber, materials, or teams furnished in the construction of railroads or other works of public or quasi public character is a legislative declaration that prior lien statutes did not cover such cases.

2. Contractors for building a railroad cannot be regarded as "employees" or "laborers" within the meaning of the Kentucky statute giving liens to laborers and employees for their services in carrying on the business of the railroad although the contract is to furnish laborers, tools, and teams by the day for which certain sums per day are to be paid with 10 per cent additional for the use of tools and superintendence.

3. One who has failed or neglected to comply with the requirements of the Kentucky Act of 1888 providing for a lien in favor of persons furnishing labor or material in railroad construction cannot claim a lien under the Act of 1876 giving a more extended lien in favor of laboring men and supply men in numerous kinds of business.

NOTE.—Who are laborers, employees, or servants within the meaning of statutes giving them preferences.

1. Definitions.

The word "laborer" in the statute exempting the wages of laborers from attachment in the hands of employers refers to one who is a manual laborer by profession and occupation. Heebner v. Chave, 5 Pa. 117.

"By laborers," says Woodward, J., in Seiders's App., 46 Pa. 57, "we mean those who perform with their own hands the contract they make with their employer."

The court in Dano v. M. O. & R. R. Co., 27 Ark. 567, said that the word "laborer" in the Act of 1868, giving a lien to laborers, was intended to be used according to its common acceptation as defined by Webster, and distinguished from mechanic or artisan as used in other Lien Acts.

The court, in Smith v. Brooke, 40 Pa. 147, defined "wages of laborers" to be the earnings of a laborer by manual toil.

Ex parte Meason v. Ashman, 5 Binn. 167, held servant's wages which under the Act of 1794 were to be treated as preferred debts in the settlement of decedent's estates, to be the earnings of such servants only as make part of a man's household—menial servants.

The term "wages of employees" in an order requiring a receiver of a railroad company to pay wages does not include the services of counsel employed for special purposes. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wilson, 138 U. S. 501, 34 L. ed. 1023.

Foremen, clerks, and time-keepers in the employ of a railway contractor are not laborers. Missouri, E. & T. R. Co. v. Baker, 14 Kan. 563.

One who performs a contract to draw lumber by hiring teams and drivers is not a "mechanic or laborer." Wentworth's App. 82 Pa. 471.

4. The mere fact of furnishing articles or supplies suitable or capable of being used in carrying on a designated business without any understanding or agreement that they should be so applied will not of itself, without actual application in the business, give the furnisher a lien under the Kentucky Act of 1876 upon the property and effects.

(October 4, 1892.)

APPLEALS by intervenors in an action brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky for the foreclosure of a mortgage from a judgment denying their right to enforce mechanics' liens against the mortgaged property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Brown, Circuit Justice, and Jackson and Taft, Circuit Judges.

Mrs. Stone & Sudduth, Dodd & Dodd, A. Barnett, and Thomas C. Bell, for appellants;

The appellants have made out a prima facie case when they proved that they were dealers in railway supplies, and that the supplies furnished by them were just such supplies as the railway company daily needed to enable it to carry on its business, and that they furnished them for that purpose. When this proof was made, the burden was cast upon the appellees to show the use to be different from that thus prima facie established by the appellants.

The secretary of a railway company is an officer and his salary is not a sum "due and owing any servant or employé." Wells v. Southern M. R. Co. 1 Fed. Rep. 270.

Pennsylvania & D. R. Co. v. Leuffer, 84 Pa. 168, decided that a civil engineer was not included in the class of "laborers and workmen" designated by the statute giving to such persons a lien on improvements by corporations.

In State v. Bunk, 55 Wis. 455, it was said that the word "laborer" as employed in the act empowering the governor to expend certain moneys in paying the claims of laborers, etc., for work on a line of railway, should be interpreted in the sense in which it is ordinarily used and understood when applied to men engaged in constructing railways. And it was held that engineers were not included.

The protection of the law giving a right of action for labor debts is limited to one who labors and is not extended to one who merely hires out the labor of others. Chicago & N. R. Co. v. Sturges, 44 Mich. 533; Martin v. Michigan & O. R. Co. 62 Mich. 458.

2. Who are secured by the Mechanics' Lien Law?

A mechanic is not within the protection of the statute unless he performs manual labor. Adams v. Goodrich, 55 Ga. 233.

An overseer and foreman of a body of miners, who performed manual labor upon the mine, is entitled to a lien, under the law of Utah giving a lien for labor. Flagstaff S. Min. Co. of Utah v. Cullins, 104 U. S. 178, 26 L. ed. 704.

The foreman of work in a mine is secured by the Lien Law. Capron v. Strout, 11 Nev. 304.

The manager of a company was held to be an employé, so that he might have a lien for his salary. Conlee Lumber Co. v. Ripon Lumber & Mfg. Co. 66 Wis. 481.

And a foreman in a mill. Ibid.

v. Green, 27 Kan. 287; Morris County Bank v. Rockaway Mfg. Co. 14 N. J. Eq. 192; Watts v. Whittington, 48 Md. 857; Singerly v. Doerr, 62 Pa. 13; Heckel v. Pettierow, 6 Ohio St. 251; 1 Best, Ev. § 274.

If the appellants were supply men, and as such furnished the articles in dispute for carrying on the business, then their entire accounts should have been allowed as preferred claims, under the Supply Men's Act upon which they have staked their rights. If, on the other hand, they were contractors within the meaning of the Contractors' Act, then their entire claims should have been rejected as preferred claims, because they have never, and could not have, complied with the conditions necessary to perfect their lien under the Contractors' Act.

The lien provided for in the Supply Men's Act arises by operation of the law for the whole amount due upon the happening of any of the contingencies specified in the Act.

Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Oxford Iron Co. 88 N. J. Eq. 195.

Both prior and subsequent to the passage of the statute the courts of the country have often, in the absence of any statute, formulated and applied the inherent equitable principle which this statute declared and enlarged.

Douglass v. Cline, 12 Bush, 608; Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 252, 25 L. ed. 842; Milttenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 106 U. S. 811, 27 L. ed. 126; Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 780, 28 L. ed. 597; Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland Co. 117 U. S. 454, 29 L. ed. 970.

The Contractors' Act is clearly and manifestly a statute exclusively for the benefit of contractors and in all of its features is essentially different from the Supply Men's Act.

In Fosdick v. Schall, supra, the supreme court stated that every railroad mortgagee in accepting his security impliedly agrees that the current debts made in the ordinary course of business shall be paid from the current receipts before he has any claim upon the income.

See also Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 135, 28 L. ed. 677; Milttenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. and Burnham v. Bowen, supra; Thomas v. Peoria & R. I. R. Co. 36 Fed. Rep. 818; Finances Co. of Pennsylvania v. Charleston, C. & C. R. Co. 48 Fed. Rep. 188.

The Kentucky statute merely affirmed and extended this principle to the corpus of the property by positive law.

Courtney v. Insurance Co. of North America, 49 Fed. Rep. 309, 4 U. S. App. 140.

The preference given by the statute does not rest on the nature of the debt, but grows out of the character of the creditor and the necessity of the service (or supplies) to the corporation.

Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. v. Central R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 256; Watson v. Watson Mfg. Co. 30 N. J. Eq. 590; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Oxford Iron Co. 88 N. J. Eq. 195.

Appellants Semple et al. come within the provisions of the supply statute.

Rosser & Coleman were employes within the meaning of the Act of the 20th of March, 1876, and entitled to a lien prior to the bondholders and all others.

And a carriage maker and a blacksmith is a laborer within the statute. Ibid.

And a master mechanic, or machinist is a servant or laborer. Sleeper v. Goodwin, 67 Wis. 590.

One who acts as overseer and assistant superintendent in the repair of a mill is entitled to a lien. Willamette F. & T. M. Co. v. Remick, 1 Or. 169.

House painters are entitled to the preference of the Mechanics' Lien Law. Martine v. Nelson, 51 Ill. 422.

A teamster is a laborer but not one who merely furnishes teams to work for the contractor. Mann v. Burt, 35 Kan. 11.

A claim for the labor of oxen cannot be included in a charge made by a laborer under a statute giving "to laborers on lumber a lien thereon." McCrillis v. Wilson, 34 Me. 286; Coburn v. Kerawell, 35 Me. 123.

A carter may have a lien under the Mechanics' Lien Law for hauling away dirt, etc., from a building. Hill v. Newman, 38 Pa. 151, 30 Am. Dec. 473.

But in Michigan it has been held that the labor done by a man's team may be fairly regarded as labor done by him within the meaning of the statute. Chicago & N. R. Co. v. Sturgis, supra.

The Amendment of 1874 to the Minnesota Mechanics' Lien Law, providing that whoever furnishes labor, skill, or material for a railway by virtue of any contract with the owner or any party authorized by the owner or by virtue of any subcontract with the original contractor, shall have a lien, applies to subcontractors generally, and not merely those standing in direct contract relation with the original contractor. Spafford v. Duluth, E. W. & S. R. Co. (Minn.) March 8, 1892.

The following have been held not to be entitled to the protection of the Lien Law:

One engaged to cook for laborers engaged in the 18 L. R. A.

construction of a reservoir. McCormick v. Los Angeles City Water Co. 40 Cal. 185.

One who furnishes labor and material in placing a lightning-rod on a house. Drew v. Mason, 31 Ill. 498, 25 Am. Rep. 238.

An agent employed to pay off laborers. Edgar v. Salisbury, 17 Mo. 271.

A laborer has no lien for wages earned on land which he has cleared and prepared for cultivation, under the Laborers' Lien Act of 1868. Taylor v. Hathaway, 29 Ark. 597.

An overseer of a plantation is not entitled to the lien of a laborer upon the stock, etc., of his employer. Whitaker v. Smith, 51 N. C. 940.

A Georgia Statute of 1858 gave the debts due masons and carpenters a preference. It was held in Fox v. Rucker, 30 Ga. 525, that a plasterer was not included in the law.

But under the Massachusetts Mechanics' Lien Law of 1855 a plasterer has a lien. Parker v. Bell, 7 Gray, 429.

3. Preferences of claims against insolvent corporations.

Under the Virginia statute giving the wages of the employes of an insolvent corporation preference, the president of an iron manufacturing company, designated as "general manager," is not entitled to such preference. Seventh Nat. Bank of Phila. v. Shenandoah Iron Co. 36 Fed. Rep. 436.

A superintendent at an annual salary, attorney-at-law, contractor for part of work who employs others, and salesmen on salary and commissions, are not entitled to preference under the statute. People v. Remington, 109 N. Y. 651.

A contractor with a corporation is not an employe of the corporation within the meaning of Indiana Rev. Stat., § 5226, giving a lien to employes for labor done for the corporation. An employe

Such an Act as that under consideration must be liberally construed.

Davis v. Alford, 94 U. S. 545, 24 L. ed. 238; Flagstaff S. Min. Co. of Utah v. Cullins, 104 U. S. 175, 26 L. ed. 704; Stryker v. Cassidy, 76 N. Y. 50; Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 358; Watson v. Watson Mfg. Co. supra.

Messrs. Humphrey & Davie and St. John Boyle, for appellees:

Rosser & Coleman cannot maintain a lien under this Act, because they were not employes within the meaning of the Act, nor did they furnish supplies.

The word "employé" is broader than the word "laborer," but it must be limited to one who is entitled to compensation for personal service, and the amount for which a lien is allowed must be limited to the amount of such compensation. The amount due to a contractor on account of the labor of others is not due to him as an employé.

Moreover the lien given by the Act of 1876 is limited to such employes as were engaged in the service of the insolvent at the time of the suspension.

Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Oxford Iron Co. 33 N. J. Eq. 196.

There are provided for in these various statutes two distinct and well-recognized classes of claims,—construction claims, and claims for operation.

Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 459, 20 L. ed. 199.

The claims were for articles furnished by the parties without any contract that they should be used in the one way or in the other.

The words "materials" and "supplies" in the Act of 1876 were never designed to refer to anything except such articles as are consumed in the ordinary conduct of the business of the factory or railroad, such things as oil, coal, wood, etc.

Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Oxford Iron Co. supra.

The burden is upon the person claiming the mechanics' lien to make out his case, and to show that he comes within and has complied with the terms of the statute.

Dodge v. Walsham, 16 R. I. 704; Chapin v. Perse & B. Paper Works, 30 Conn. 461, 79 Am. Dec. 265; Hunter v. Blanchard, 13 Ill. 324, 68 Am. Dec. 547.

Jackson, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions presented for decision in these cases relate to the respective rights and priorities of different lien claimants upon the property of the Kentucky Union Railway Company, which was chartered under the laws of Kentucky to construct, own, and operate a designated line of railway in said state, about 100 miles in length. Prior to 1883 about fifteen miles of its road was completed and in operation. In order to raise within the meaning of the statute is a servant, and not a contractor bound only to produce a certain result of labor, and free to dispose of his own time and personal effort according to his pleasure without responsibility to the other party. Vane v. Newcombe, 132 U. S. 220, 33 L. ed. 310.

A "superintendent" of a natural gas company, who is not a general manager, or a general agent, or an officer of the company, but whose principal duties are to superintend the construction of trenches and the laying of gas pipes, is a laborer within the meaning of that term as used in Elliott's (Ind.) Supp. § 606, giving a preference to laborers' claims for wages against corporations. Pendergast v. Yandes, 3 L. R. A. 849, 124 Ind. 159.

A claimant under N. Y. Laws 1885, chap. 336 (allowing preference to laborers, etc., for wages due from a corporation where a receiver has been appointed) who had been employed by a defunct corporation at an annual salary of $2,000 with a commission of 2 per cent, to sell goods in China, was not entitled to the preference, either as to salary or commission, within the meaning of the statute. People v. Remington, supra.

The statute was designed to secure the wages of those who, as a class, are dependent upon their earnings for their own and their families' support. Ibid.

An assistant bookkeeper employed for other services also is an employé, within the meaning of N. Y. Laws 1885, chap. 376, providing for the payment of the wages of employes of a corporation by a receiver thereof. Brown v. A. B. C. Fence Co. 52 Hun, 151.

Re Black, 38 Mich. 513, held that the claim of a head miller came within Mich. Pub. Acts of 1887, No. 94, enacting that all debts owing by a corporation at the time of its insolvency shall be preferred claims against the estate of the debtor.

In Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. v. Central R. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 255, the word "laborers" in the Act was construed as the equivalent of "employes;" and one who contracted with the company to furnish the labor of others was held not to come within the word or spirit of the statute.

New Jersey Rev. Stat., p. 138, § 63, provides that on the insolvency of a corporation the wages due the laborers shall be paid prior to any other debt; "and the word 'laborers' shall be construed to include all persons doing labor or service of whatever character for or as workmen or employes in the regular employ of such corporation."

In England v. Beatty Organ & Piano Co., 41 N. J. Eq. 470, it was held that the president of a corporation—who must be a director—was not a laborer within the contemplation of the Act.

And in Watson v. Watson Mfg. Co., 30 N. J. Eq. 568, under the same statute it was held that a drayman who had made a contract with the company to do all its carting in a certain city was entitled to the preference given by the statute, not only for his own labor, but also for the use of his horses.

In Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 58 N. Y. 367, a receiver had been directed to pay arrearages to "laborers and employes" of the corporation: It was held that this included the claim of an attorney for professional services. In delivering the opinion Church, Ch. J., said: "Aside from the difference of words, there is, I think, a distinction between the above cases [Ericsson v. Brown; Aikins v. Wasson; Coffin v. Reynolds, infra], and this, in the rules of construction, which should be applied. In those cases there was a statute liability created against stockholders, and such statutes are always strictly construed. Again, the courts held that it was the policy of the Legislature to protect those only who are the least able to protect themselves and who earn their living by manual labor for a funds with which to extend its line eastwardly and westwardly from the completed portion, said railway company, on July 2, 1888, executed a mortgage or trust deed upon its property then owned and thereafter to be acquired to the Central Trust Company of New York, to secure an issue of $3,000,000 first mortgage bonds. Said mortgage was executed under authority duly conferred, and was properly recorded. The bonds secured thereby were issued and used for the purposes of the company. Thereafter, on July 1, 1890, said railway company executed a second mortgage on the same properties to the Columbia Finance & Trust Company to secure a further issue of $1,800,000 of its bonds. This mortgage was also duly executed and recorded, and the bonds thereby secured were issued and used by the company. J. Kennedy Tod & Co. subsequently advanced the company $72,500, under an agreement that said sum should be secured by $140,000 of said second mortgage bonds, which were to be delivered to said firm as collateral security for said advance, with interest from January 6, 1891. The company failed to comply with its promise to deliver said collateral security, and in February, 1891, said J. Kennedy Tod & Co., in connection with said mortgagees, the Central Trust Company of New York and Columbia Finance & Trust Company, filed their bill in the circuit court for the district of Kentucky against said railway company, alleging that it had become and was entirely insolvent; that diverse persons, whose names were unknown to complainants, claimed mechanics' liens upon all or a portion of the company's property, which they threatened to enforce, and which, if enforced in separate proceedings, would cause a severance and disintegration of the railroad line, etc.; and praying that the court would appoint a receiver of said company's railway, property, assets, etc.; that it would foreclose said mortgage, and sell said railway, with its properties and franchises, as an entirety, and apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of the debt due complainants, J. Kennedy Tod & Co., and the debts secured by said mortgages, together with other lien debts, according to their respective priorities. A receiver was appointed, and a reference was directed to a special master to take proof and report upon "claims against said railway company incurred for materials and supplies furnished it for its ordinary operation." There was also a general order made in relation to intervening petitions.

The appellants Rosser & Coleman intervened by petition, and asserted claims as laborers and employees of said company to the amount of $2,806.88, which they contended constituted a lien upon the company's property prior and superior to that of the debts due to and represented by the complainants. They allege in their original petition and the amendments thereto that from about March 5, 1890, until about April 14, 1890, they performed work and labor in construction and repair of the railway company's road, on sections 74, 75, and 76 thereof, in small compensation, and not by professional services, and this supposed legislative policy exerted a controlling influence upon the courts. In this case it was entirely different. There was no question of policy. It was a scramble for payment of debts, against a defaulting corporation, and the terms of the order were fixed by negotiation and agreement between interested parties."

4. Who are laborers, servants, or employees under the statutes making stockholders individually liable?

The case of Alkin v. Wason, 24 N. Y. 482, arose under a statute making stockholders of corporations liable for debts owing by the corporation to "laborers or servants." It was held that the statute was designed for the protection of persons belonging to the class commonly known as laborers or servants, and performing manual labor merely, and that a contractor for building a portion of a railway was not within the Act.

And in Balch v. New York & O. M. R. Co., 46 N. Y. 521, it was held that the word "laborer" in the General Railroad Act of 1860 could not be construed to designate one who contracted for and furnished the labor and service of others, or one who contracted for and furnished one or more teams, whether with or without his own services or the services of others. See to the same effect Atherson v. Troy & B. R. Co. 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 329.

So in Coffin v. Reynolds, 87 N. Y. 640, it was held that the secretary of a corporation to whom the corporation was indebted for services in that capacity was not a laborer or servant within the statute. This case amounted to an overruling of Richardson v. Abendroth, 48 Barb. 168.

In Conant v. Van Schaick, 24 Barb. 87, it was held that all persons employed in the service of the company who had not a distinctive appellation, such as officers or agents, were embraced in the 18 L. R. A.

designation "laborers or servants;" and that the engineer, master mechanic, and condutor were as fully entitled to the benefits of the Act "as the man who shovels gravel."

By an Act of 1859 incorporating the New York & Liverpool United States Mail Steamship Company, the stockholders were made individually liable for debts owing by the corporation to laborers and operatives: a consulting engineer was held not to be within the language, or policy, or reason of the law. Erickson v. Brown, 38 Barb. 390.

In Short v. Medberry, 29 Hun. 89, one who acted as foreman, took part in manual labor required to manufacture stone, kept time of the men, collected bills, etc., was held to be a laborer or servant within the meaning of the Act of 1848 making stockholders individually liable.

In Krauser v. Ruckel, 17 Hun. 463, under the same Act, a superintendent of mining works, who hired and paid workmen, purchased supplies, made contracts for the company, etc., was held not to be a "laborer, servant, or operative."

In Dean v. De Wolf, 16 Hun. 196, affirmed in 83 N. Y. 626, an assistant to the superintendent of a mining company was held not to be a "laborer or servant."

Lott, Ch. C., in Hill v. Spencer, 61 N. Y. 279, in considering whether a general manager fell within the term "servant," said: "The context in which it is used, in the section referred to, being associated with 'laborers' and 'apprentices,' indicates that it was intended to apply to a person employed to devote his time and render his service in the performance of work similar in its general character to that done by those employees."

In Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 213, it was said that he who performs services for a corporation for which a stockholder is personally liable "must be of a class whose members usually look to the re-

Lee county, Ky., under a contract which was in substance as follows: That, having in their employ certain laborers, and owning carts, teams, and tools suitable for the purpose, the railway company agreed to employ them, with their said laborers, tools, and teams, by the day, to do work on the aforesaid sections of its road, under the direction and control of its engineer; that they were to be paid certain sums per day for foremen, for laborers, and for teams, consisting of carts and mules, and 10 per cent additional on the amount of said daily sums for the use of their tools, and for their superintendence of the work and hands, and be reimbursed the cost of powder necessary to be used in the work; that either party had the right to stop said work at the end of any day; that while the employment continued petitioners paid their said hands or laborers. It is then alleged that under this contract the railway company became indebted to petitioners in the sum of $2,806.66, for which it on October 15, 1890, executed to them its promissory note due at four months, which petitioners thereafter indorsed and negotiated to the Clay City National Bank, and at its maturity were required to take up, the maker having failed to pay the same. Petitioners claimed that under said contract they were laborers and employes of the railway company, and as such were entitled to a lien upon its property and the proceeds thereof for the amount due them, which was prior and superior to complainants'. Their petition was demurred to on the ground that it presented no case entitling them to the lien claimed. This demurrer was sustained, and the petition dismissed. From this judgment said petitioners have appealed.

Their contention for a lien is based on an Act of the Legislature of Kentucky approved March 20, 1876, entitled "An Act to Provide for Liens for Laboring Men and Supply Men," which provided (section 1) that "when the property or effects of any railroad company, or of any owner or operator of any rolling mill, foundry, or other manufacturing establishment, whether incorporated or not, shall be assigned for the benefit of creditors or shall come into the hands of any executor, administrator, commissioners, receiver of a court, trustee, assignee for the benefit of creditors, or shall in any wise come to be distributed among creditors, whether, by operation of law or by the act of said company, owner, or operator, the employes of said company, owner, or operator in such business, and the persons who shall have supplied material or supplies for the carrying on of such business, shall have a lien upon so much of such property and effects as may have been embarked in such business, and all the accessories connected therewith, including the interest of said company, owner, or operator in the real estate used in carrying on said business." By section 2 it is declared that "the said lien shall be superior to the lien of any mortgage or other incumbrance heretofore or hereafter created, and shall be for the whole amount due such employes as such, or due for such materials or supplies," ward of a day's labor, or service, for immediate or present support, from whom the company does not expect credit, and to whom its future liability is of no consequence; one who is responsible for no independent action, but who does a day's work, or a stated job, under the direction of a superior. And a general manager is not a 'laborer, servant, or apprentice.'"

A contractor who has built a section of a railroad has no remedy against stockholders under a constitutional or statutory provision making them individually liable for labor performed for the corporation. Peck v. Miller, 39 Mich. 566.

Nor has an assistant chief engineer. Brockway v. Innes, 30 Mich. 47, 33 Am. Rep. 343.

Nor a traveling salesman. Jones v. Avery, 60 Mich. 223.

One corporation cannot be the employe of another corporation, within Ind. Rev. Stat., § 8999, making stockholders individually liable. Dukes v. Love, 97 Ind. 341.

One employed by a corporation on a monthly salary, who is part of the time on the road selling goods, making collections, etc., as a drummer, and the rest of the time working in a store, shipping and receiving goods, moving and handling stock, etc., or making sales and collecting bills in the city,—is a "clerk," within the meaning of the Tennessee General Incorporation Act of 1875, § 11, making stockholders individually liable for moneys due "laborers, servants, clerks, and operatives" in case the corporation becomes insolvent. Cole v. Hand, 7 L. R. A. 96, 38 Tenn. 400.

A. Laborers whose earnings are exempted from attachment or garnishment.

One engaged to superintend the erection of a building is a "laborer or other employe" within the meaning of the Act of 1854, exempting the wages 18 L. R. A.

of such person from attachment. Moore v. Heaney, 14 Md. 559.

Iowa Code, § 8074, provides that the earnings of a debtor for his personal services at any time within ninety days next preceding the levy are exempt from execution and attachment.

McCoy v. Cornell, 40 Iowa, 457, held that professional men as physicians were included in this provision.

The Practice Act of California exempts from execution "his horses, etc.," "by the use of which a teamster or other laborer habitually earns his living." A teamster within this statute is defined to be one who is engaged in the business of hauling freight for other parties, by which he habitually supports himself and family. He need not drive the team in person but must be personally engaged in the business of teaming habitually for the purpose of making a living. By "other laborer" is meant one who labors by and with the aid of his team. Brusie v. Griffith, 34 Cal. 303, 91 Am. Dec. 695.

In Heebner v. Chave, 5 Pa. 115, it was held that the Act of 1845, which prohibited the attachment of laborers' wages, secured the fruits of his work to the manual laborer only, and did not embrace the earnings of a contractor.

Seymour v. Over River School Dist., 53 Conn. 502, held that a school teacher was not a public officer within the meaning of the statute exempting the salary of public officers from attachment.

The "boss" of a department of a factory, having the employment and discharge of the hands who work under him, who is not required to do manual labor, but to use his experience and knowledge in the direction of the operatives, cannot be regarded as a "journeyman mechanic" or "day laborer" within the statute exempting the wages of such persons from garnishment. Kyle v. Montgomery, 73 Ga. 343.

etc. The third section provides for the pro rata distribution of the net earnings at the end of each calendar month among lienholders, when the trustees or other persons having the administration of such property "shall continue the operation of the business." The fourth section provides that when the company, owner, or operator shall suspend, sell, or transfer such business, or when the property or effects engaged in such business shall be taken in attachment or execution, so that the business shall be stopped or suspended, the said lien shall attach as fully as is provided by section 1, and in such case may be enforced by proceedings in equity. The fifth section directs how the suit shall be brought, and provides "that such suit shall be begun within sixty days after the right of action shall accrue."

When this Act was passed there was in force the prior Statute of 1858, now chapter 70, Ky. Gen. Stat., which gives a person who performs labor or furnishes material in the erection, altering, or repairing a house, building, or other structure, or for the improvement in any manner of real estate by contract with or by the written consent of the owner, a lien thereon and upon the land on which such improvement may have been made: provided, the claimant, within sixty days after he ceases to labor or furnish material, files in the office of the clerk of the county court of the county in which such building or improvement is situated, a statement of the amount due him, with a description of the property intended to be covered by the lien, sufficiently accurate to identify it, and the name of the owner, and stating whether the materials were furnished or the labor performed by contract with the owner: and provided, further, that action shall have been brought to enforce the lien claimed within six months from the day of filing the account in the clerk's office as aforesaid.

By an Act of the Kentucky Legislature approved March 27, 1888, entitled "An Act to Create a Lien on Canals, Railroads, and Other Public Improvements in Favor of Persons Furnishing Labor or Materials for the Construction or Improvement thereof," called the "Contractors' Act," it is provided (section 1) "that all persons who perform labor, or who furnish labor, materials, or teams for the construction or improvement of any canal, railroad, turnpike, or other public improvement in this commonwealth by contract, express or implied, with the owner or owners thereof, shall have a lien thereon and upon the property and franchises of the owner or owners thereof for the full contract price of such labor, material, and teams so furnished or performed, which said lien shall be prior and superior to all other liens theretofore or thereafter created thereon." The third section declares that no lien provided for by the Act shall attach unless the person who performs the labor or furnishes the material or teams shall, within sixty days after the last day of the last month in which the labor was performed or materials or teams were furnished, file in the county clerk's office a statement in writing, verified by affidavit, of his account or claim, substantially as required under the Act of 1858;

This case criticised the decisions in Caraker v. Mathews, Butler v. Clark, and Claghorn v. Saussy, infra, as extremely literal if not loose constructions of the statute.

In Caraker v. Mathews, 26 Ga. 571, a statute of this sort was extended to overseers of plantations; in Butler v. Clark, 46 Ga. 468, to a shipping clerk; in Claghorn v. Saussy, 51 Ga. 576, to the forwarding clerk of a railway company; in Hightower v. Slaton, 54 Ga. 108, 21 Am. Rep. 273, to a teacher in a public school.

Lamar v. Chisholm, 77 Ga. 306, held a clerk or bookkeeper to be a day laborer within the statute.

Wages of a clerk for a railway company also come within the statute. Smith v. Johnston, 71 Ga. 748.

The wages of a private secretary to the president of a company are exempt from garnishment under the statute. Abrahams v. Anderson, 80 Ga. 670.

A railroad conductor is not one whose wages are exempt from garnishment under Ga. Code, § 3554, as "the daily, weekly, or monthly wages of a journeyman, mechanic, or day laborer." Miller v. Dugas, 77 Ga. 886.

In Epps v. Epps, 17 Ill. App. 196, it was held that the words "laborer or servant," in the statute did not include a traveling salesman. "A laborer" said the court, "is popularly understood to be a person who performs manual labor not requiring special knowledge or skill, and a 'servant' is understood to be one who is employed to perform an inferior and mental service."

In Brierre v. Their Creditors, 48 La. Ann. 423, it was held that a traveling salesman who received for his pay a share of the profits of the firm was not a clerk within La. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3191, granting a privilege in favor of "the salaries of 18 L. R. A.

the clerks, secretaries, and other persons of that kind."

One who sells goods by sample, as an agent, is not a "laboring man" whose wages are exempt from garnishment, under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 68, § 310, subd. 11. Wildner v. Ferguson, 42 Minn. 112.

But the wages of a telegraph operator are within the statute. Boyle v. Vanderhoof, 45 Minn. 31.

a. Seamen.

In Eddy v. O'Hara, 182 Mass. 56, Gray, Ch. J., citing Wentworth v. Whittemore, 1 Mass. 471, and Taber v. Nye, 12 Pick. 105, said: "Although the question has not been directly adjudged, seamen's wages have never been considered exempt from attachment by trustee process in the commonwealth." And in this case no definitive opinion was expressed.

Very shortly after, however, in White v. Dunn, 134 Mass. 271, it was held that the wages of seamen engaged in the coastwise trade of the Atlantic coast were subject to attachment by the trustee process.

And this is the rule in Maine, and it makes no difference that the wages have been collected and placed in the hands of an attorney as trustee. Ayer v. Brown, 77 Me. 195.

A federal court, however, has held that the wages of seamen are exempt from attachment for their debts basing the exemption on the peculiar need of protection to the seamen and not on statutory provisions. McCarty v. New Bedford, 4 Fed. Rep. 618.

and by section 4 it is provided that proceedings for the enforcement of such liens "must be begun within one year from the filing of the claims in the county clerk's office, as required by the third section of this Act." These three Acts comprise the legislation of the state upon the subject of statutory liens in favor of persons performing labor or furnishing material and supplies, and, under well-settled rules, should be construed together in their proper interpretation and application. When thus considered it seems clear that they were intended to provide for three distinct classes; the Act of 1858 covering the ordinary case of labor performed or material furnished in the erection, alteration, or repair of houses or buildings, or other improvement of real estate; the Act of 1876 applying to the case of services rendered or supplies furnished in or for the carrying on of certain designated business occupations, when they suspend, or their property or effects pass by assignment, by operation of law, or by order of court into the hands of some trustee, commissioners, or receiver for administration and distribution among the creditors of the owner or owners thereof; and the Act of 1888 embracing the case of labor performed, or materials or teams furnished, in the construction or improvement of certain works of a public or quasi public character. This latter Act may properly be regarded as a legislative declaration that the prior statutes did not cover the case of labor performed or materials furnished in the construction or improvement of railroads. It was indeed decided by the Supreme Court of Kentucky, after the passage of the Act of 1876, that neither under that statute, nor the General Mechanics' Lien Law of 1858, was there any lien against or upon a railroad for work performed thereon or materials furnished. Graham v. Mt. Sterling Coal Road Co. 14 Bush, 425. This denial of a lien upon railroads under the then existing statutes created the necessity for and led to the passage of said Act of 1888.

It admits of little or no doubt that appellants' petition presents a case within the purview of this latter Act; their labor or that of the hands in their employ having been performed, and their teams having been furnished, in the construction and improvement of certain sections of the defendants' railroad, which would have entitled them to a lien if they had complied with the requirements of said Act in filing a statement of their claim in the proper clerk's office for record, and bringing suit for the enforcement of the same within the time provided. They failed to allege any such compliance, and are clearly not entitled to any lien under either said Act or that of 1858. Having lost their lien under said Act of 1888, they now claim that they should be regarded as employés and laborers of the railway company, within the provision of section 1 of the Act of 1876, and as such be given a priority of lien for the amount of their debts. This position cannot be sustained. If the Act of 1876 has any application to labor performed in the construction or improvement of a railway, such as that set forth in the appellants' petition, the lien would exist, not in their favor, but in favor of the laborers in their employ, who actually performed the service. But we think it very manifest that said Act of 1876 has no reference to construction work such as appellants performed with their hands and teams. It has relation alone to certain specified industries or enterprises as existing and established concerns engaged in carrying on business, and the lien therein provided for is given, not to the contractor who constructs the road or erects the plant, but to those persons, other than president, chief officer, director, or stockholder, who furnish materials or supplies, or render service in "the carrying on of such business." The lien given such employés or furnishers of materials and supplies, in the contingency designated, is to be "on the property and effects embarked in the business." The persons in whose favor it is created are not required to file any notice or claim of lien, or take any preliminary steps as a prerequisite to the enforcement of such lien, which is more extensive in its operation than that conferred by either the Act of 1858 or 1888. As well stated by the learned judge who decided the case in the lower court, "it is clear that no lien is created at the time the labor is performed or the material furnished, but it only arises upon the stoppage or suspension of the business, either by the act of the party [owner] or by operation of law, and is given as a statutory preference in the distribution of the effects and assets of the business." In other words, the Act in its legal effect and operation provides that those who furnish material or render service as employés in carrying on the business of certain designated industries and enterprises shall, upon the stoppage or suspension of such concerns by operation of law, or act of the owner, have a prior lien upon all the owner's property and effects embarked in such business for the amounts due them. The lien thus created by the Act of 1876 is essentially different from that provided for by the General Mechanics' Lien Law of 1858, or by the Contractors' Act of 1888. It arises or comes into existence upon the contingency of the insolvency, embarrassment, or discontinuance of the business which the employé or furnisher of supplies has assisted in carrying on, and attaches upon all the property and effects of the owner embarked therein, and applicable for distribution among creditors. Under the other Acts the lien arises upon the commencement of the work, or relates back to that time, if the requirement as to filing notices or statement thereof is complied with by the claimant. The Acts of 1858 and 1888 apply respectively to cases of labor performed and material furnished in the erection or repair of houses, buildings, and other improvements on real estate, and in the construction or improvement of public or quasi public work, such as railroads, turnpikes, canals, etc.; while the Act of 1876 applies to labor performed and material furnished in the operation of companies or concerns already built or constructed. The Act of 1888 gives a lien for labor performed or material furnished in the construction of certain works of a public or quasi public character,—that is, in the establishment of such concern. The Act of 1876 confers a lien for labor performed and supplies furnished in keeping such designated establishment a going concern. The manifest purpose of this Act of 1876 was to provide such security to laborers and supply men as would induce them to continue established and going concerns in operation as long as possible. This construction harmonizes said Act and presents a consistent system of legislation on the subject of statutory liens. It would be most anomalous to provide a double lien. It cannot be assumed that the Legislature intended that a contractor, who had failed or neglected to comply with the requirements of the Act of 1888 in perfecting his lien, should nevertheless still have and be allowed to assert a more extended lien, under the Act of 1876, upon all the property and effects of the owner embarked in the business. We think it clear that the appellants Rosser & Coleman should be regarded as "contractors" under the Act of 1888, and not as "employees," under and entitled to the benefit of the Act of 1876. Neither the fact that their employment was a daily one, nor that their compensation was to be ascertained and settled by the method agreed upon, in any way affected or changed the character of their services, which were rendered as contractors. They cannot properly be regarded as "employees" and "laborers," within the purview of the Act of 1876.

In Vane v. Newcombe, 182 U. S. 220, 38 L. ed. 810, the plaintiff having contracted with the company to erect certain telegraph wires on the company's poles, and furnished the labor of himself and others in doing the work, claimed a priority lien, under a statute of Indiana which gave a lien to employees of corporations. The Supreme Court said: "It seems clear to us that Vane was a contractor with the company, and not an employee, within the meaning of the statute. We think the distinction pointed out by the circuit court is a sound one, namely, that to be an employee, within the meaning of the statute, Vane must have been a servant, bound in some degree, at least, to the duties of a servant, and not, as he was, a mere contractor, bound only to produce or cause to be produced a certain result,—a result of labor, to be sure,—but free to dispose of his own time and personal efforts according to his pleasure, without responsibility to the other party." The lien was accordingly denied; and in Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wilson, 138 U. S. 501, 34 L. ed. 1023, it was said that an employee implies continuity of service, and excludes those employed for a special or single transaction. In construing the New Jersey statute, which gave laborers of corporations in case of an insolvency a lien upon corporate assets for the amount of wages due them, the supreme court of that state held that the right conferred was strictly personal, inhering alone in the person who actually performs the labor or service, and that he who furnishes the labor or services of others under a contract to do the whole business of a corporation, or a particular branch of it, was neither within the letter nor spirit of 18 L. R. A.

the Act. It was further held by said court that the wages, to be within the protection of the statute, must be due to a person in the employ of the corporation at the time when it became insolvent; that only those in the employ of the corporation at the time of its insolvency were within either the words or policy of the statute. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Oxford Iron Co. 88 N. J. Eq. 196. We think the first of said propositions is the proper view to be taken of the Act of 1876. Whether the last proposition of the New Jersey decision is correct, it is not necessary in this case to decide, as said appellants do not bring themselves within the provisions of said Act. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the petition of Rosser & Coleman was properly dismissed.

The appeals of the supply claimants, W. & A. C. Semple, Fairbank, Morse & Co., and Andrew Cowan & Co., involved in record No. 29, heard with the case No. 22, depend upon the construction of the Acts of 1876 and 1888 already considered. Said claimants severally furnished supplies and material to the railway company, suitable for either the construction of its unfinished line, or for carrying on the operations of its finished portion. There was no contract, agreement, or understanding, express or implied, between the parties as to how the supplies furnished should be applied. A portion of them were used and employed in the construction of the unfinished parts of the company's road, and a portion were used in carrying on the company's business, or in operating the finished part of its line. For such portion of the supplies so furnished as were used and applied in and towards the construction of the road, the claimants would undoubtedly have had a lien under the Act of 1888 if they had filed the proper notice of their claim. They did not, however, comply with the requirements of said Act, and now insist that they have a lien, under the provisions of the Act of 1876, for the whole amount of their claims, without regard to how the supplies were apportioned as between construction and the carrying on of the business of the company. So far as anything appears from the testimony, there was no breach of duty or bad faith on the part of the company or its officers in applying portions of the supplies and materials furnished to the construction of unfinished portions of the road. It was in fact left to the discretion of the company and its officers what disposition should be made of the supplies and materials furnished by the claimants, who made no inquiry and gave no directions as to how they were or should be used or applied. It was affirmatively shown by complainants that certain portions of the said supplies and material had actually been used in construction. The court below allowed a lien for such portion of the claims as were for supplies furnished and used for the operation of the railway or in carrying on its business upon and over its completed line, and denied the lien for such portion of the supplies or material as were used and applied in its construction, and for which a lien could have been maintained under the Act of 1888. This action of the court is claimed to have been erroneous. No question is raised as to the correctness of the supply claimants' debts as against the railway company. The controversy presented is between such supply men and the mortgagees, whose contract lien antedates the creation of the former's claims. In this contest for priority we consider it well settled that the burden of proof is upon the claimants to establish whatever is necessary to confer a preference on their part.

In Davis v. Alford, 94 U. S. 545, 24 L. ed. 283, it is said that those who assert a statutory lien upon real property, and claim priority over mortgagees and others who have acquired rights and interests in the property, must furnish strict proof of all that is essential to the creation of the lien. It is further said in that case that the court cannot presume, in the absence of proof, that the requirements of the statute have been complied with. Under no fair construction of the Act of 1876 can it be asserted that the mere fact of furnishing articles or supplies, suitable or capable of being used in carrying on a designated business, without any understanding or agreement that they should be so applied, will of itself give the furnisher a lien upon all the property and effects embarked in such business, without reference to their actual application. The object and purpose of the Act, as already explained, as well as the language employed in conferring the lien, require that the supplies should be furnished,—at any rate, be used,—“for the carrying on of such business.

If the complainants had not shown affirmatively that the rejected portions of the several claims were used and applied in and towards the construction of unfinished parts of the road, the burden would have still rested upon the claimants of establishing the fact, as against prior mortgages, that the supplies furnished were either purchased for or were actually used in carrying on the business of the railway company, so far as it was an established and going concern. We are not called upon in this case to determine the question whether, if supplies should be furnished for the express and understood purpose of carrying on the business of any of the designated companies, and should thereafter be diverted to other use by the purchasers, the furnishers would have a lien under the statute, for there was no agreement or understanding, express or implied, as to the specific purpose for which these supplies were furnished, or as to where they were to be used. Under such circumstances the furnisher claiming priority of lien has devolved upon him, at least, the duty of showing that the supplies were actually used for carrying on the business, in order to bring himself within the meaning and intent of the Act. The several claimants have failed to do this, so far as the rejected portions of their respective claims are concerned. The rejected items were used in construction. They were covered by the Act of 1888, especially in the absence of any agreement or understanding that they should be applied in carrying on the business of the company. The furnishers could have asserted a lien for the same if they had complied with the provisions of that Act. This they failed to do. The Act of 1876 was not designed to give the same party a double lien, or an election as to which statute he would claim under. We think there was no error in the special master's apportionment of the several claims, as between construction and operation. Nor was there any error in the lower court's failure to give the claimants judgment for their respective debts against the railway company. No such personal judgment was sought, nor properly involved in the proceeding. On the question of interest on such portion of these claims as were allowed, there has been no action on the part of the lower court in either allowing or disallowing such interest; hence there is nothing in this question for review in this court. Our conclusion on the appeals presented by record No. 29 is that there were no errors in the action of the lower court upon the claims of the several appellants, and the judgments of the lower court thereon are affirmed. Said cause No. 29 will be remanded to the circuit court for the district of Kentucky for further proceedings in the administration and distribution of the property, franchises, and effects of said railway company in conformity with the opinion of this court in respect to the aforesaid claims.

2. Under that section the receiver of public money in a United States land office is ineligible to the office of notary.

3. That section applies to appointive as well as to elective officers.

4. Section 32 of article 4 of the Constitution, as it formerly stood, requiring the Legislature to provide for the election of certain state and county officers, “and other necessary officers,” refers, by the words quoted, to officers quoadem generis, with those enumerated, and not to other classes of officers.

A PPEAL by respondent from a judgment of the District Court for Ormsby County in favor of relator in a proceeding instituted to oust respondent from the office of notary public on the ground that he was possessed of an incompatible office as receiver of public moneys in the United States Land Office. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert M. Clarke, for appellant:

It is denied that a notary public is a "civil officer under the state of Nevada."

It is not a civil office within the definition of that term according to the courts or law dictionaries.

Anderson, Law Dict. p. 728; Hussey v. Smith, 99 U. S. 24, 25 L. ed. 815; United States v. Monat, 124 U. S. 807, 31 L. ed. 464.

The word "civil" when used in connection with "office" means pertaining to administration of government.

Anderson, Law Dict. p. 185.

A civil office is one that involves the exercise of some public function or power of government. One who is not charged with the performance of a public duty involving the exercise of a power of government is not a "civil officer under this state."

Anderson, Law Dict. p. 185; Hussey v. Smith, supra.

The Constitution includes only elective offices, and has no application to an appointive office, such as "notary public."

Nev. Const. art. 4, § 8, 32.

This view is strengthened by the etymology of the word "eligible" which, strictly defined, means "fit to be chosen," "capable of being chosen."

Webster, Dict. p. 385; 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 447.

If the position of notary public is a "civil office under the government of this state" within the meaning of art. 4, § 9, of the Constitution, it must be filled by election, and cannot be filled by appointment.

Nev. Const. art. 4, § 82; State v. Arrington, 18 Nev. 412.

In many of the states of the Union, the Constitutions of which limit the right to hold office to men, excluding women, the Legislature provides that women may hold the position of notary public, and in such states it has been decided that the law is valid.

A woman may be a member of a school board (Opinion of Judges, 115 Mass. 602), postmistress, or pension agent (Re Hall, 50 Conn. 131, 47 Am. Rep. 625), overseer of the poor.

Re v. Stubbs, 2 T. R. 395; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 73.

Mr. S. Summerfield, for respondent:

Notaries public are amongst the most ancient of civil officers, and have always been recognized and regarded as such by the "law merchant," a branch of the common law.

Notaries public are civil officers by appointment in the same sense that elective officers are civil officers.

Nev. Gen. Stat. par. 1636.

The words "civil officers" as used in constitutions are meant to contradict distinguish from the words "military officers."

Anderson, Law Dict. p. 185, § 8.

The argument that "the Constitution includes only elective offices and has no application to appointive office" because a strict definition of the word "eligible" means "capable of being chosen" is in direct contravention to the definition of this court which has extended the meaning of the word "eligible" to "capable of legally holding."

State v. Clarke, 3 Nev. 570; People v. Leonard, 73 Cal. 230.

Governor v. Gordon, 15 Ala. 72; Kirksey v. Bates, 7 Port. (Ala.) 529, 31 Am. Dec. 722.

Bigelow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While the appellant was legally exercising the office of notary public in this state, he was appointed receiver of public money in the United States land office at Carson City. The court below held that those two offices were incompatible, under the provisions of section 9 of article 4 of the Constitution of Nevada, which reads as follows: "No person holding any lucrative office under the government of the United States, or any other power, shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this state: provided, that postmasters whose compensation does not exceed five hundred dollars per annum, or commissioners of deeds, shall not be deemed as holding a lucrative office."

The appellant, however, contends that the office of notary is not a "civil office of profit, under this state," within the meaning of this section, and this is the only question presented in the case. The words "office" and "civil office" have several meanings. The sense in which they are used in any particular place can usually be determined by a reference to the context and the subject-matter of the instrument. Sometimes they would include the president and trustees of a corporation, executors, deputies, etc., but no such meaning can be attached to them here. They only refer to such officers as are connected with the civil administration of the government, and were doubtless intended to include all such, to the exclusion of military officers. In construing the words "civil officers," as used in the Constitution of the United States, Judge Story says: "The sense in which the term is used in the Constitution seems to be in contradistinction to 'military.'" 1 Story, Const. § 791. Again, in the next section, he says: "All officers of the United States, therefore, who hold their appointments under the national government, whether their duties are executive or judicial, in the highest or in the lowest departments of the government, with the exception of officers in the army or navy, are properly 'civil officers,' within the meaning of the Constitution." It has been frequently held that a notary is a public officer. Kirksey v. Bates, 7 Port. (Ala.) 529, 31 Am. Dec. 722; Governor v. Gordon, 15 Ala. 72; Smith v. Meador, 74 Ga. 416; Keeney v. Leas, 14 Iowa, 464. He is also recognized and called an "officer" in our statutes, is to be appointed for a definite term, is required to take the official oath, to give a bond the same as other officers, to keep a record of his official acts, and for his services may charge certain fees, which are regulated by law. Clearly, he is an officer.

Then, is he a civil officer? As there are but two principal divisions of officers—civil and military—known to our system of state government, it must be that all that do not come within one class are included in the other. As a notary is not a military officer, he must be a civil one. By statute, he occupies a position in the civil administration of the government, and one that is quite important. He is charged with duties to the public at large that constitute him a public or state officer. State v. Kirk, 44 Ind. 401, 15 Am. Dec. 239; Howard v. Shoemaker, 85 Ind. 111. The opinion of the judges in Re House Bill No. 166, 9 Colo. 623, is, upon this point, on all fours with the case in hand. It was there held that the office of notary was a "civil office," within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution, and that consequently a bill authorizing the appointment of one to that position who was not a qualified elector was unconstitutional. See also Mechem, Pub. Off. § 1 et seq.; Id. § 24; Shelby v. Alcorn, 86 Miss. 273, 72 Am. Dec. 169. In fact, we do not understand it to be particularly contended that a notary is not a public officer, nor even that he is not a civil officer, but rather, notwithstanding he may be such, that it was not the intention of the makers of the Constitution to include that office in the prohibition contained in this section. This position is based, first, upon the proposition that the office of notary does not come within the mischief intended to be guarded against, and consequently should not be held within its terms. In construing a constitution, the same as any other instrument, we are not always to be guided by the letter of the Act. We are to seek for the meaning that the words were intended to convey, and endeavor to carry out the intention of those adopting it. But a fundamental principle in all construction is that, where the language used is plain and free from ambiguity, that must be our guide. We are not permitted to construe that which requires no construction. It is possible that, when the convention adopted this section, they did not have the office of notary in mind, and that, if they had, it would have been excluded; but, on the other hand, it is also possible that it would not have been excluded, for there is really as much reason for including this office as that of many other minor positions which are admittedly covered by this section. At any rate, it was within the power of the Constitution makers, whether sufficient reason did or did not exist for their doing so, to include this office. The language they have used clearly does include it, and, under the circumstances, that is the end of the controversy. We are not permitted to speculate further as to what their real intentions were. Cooley, Const. Lim. 69; Ludlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 6; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 204, 4 L. ed. 520; Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 217, 6 L. ed. 75.

It is also contended that the word "eligible" only refers to elective officers, and consequently does not include those who held by appointment; but we are of the opinion that it was intended, as used here, to include both. It has been several times decided that the word includes capacity to hold, as well as to be elected to, an office, and, if such is the case, no distinction can be drawn between elective and appointive officers. If the incumbent is ineligible to hold an office, it can make no difference whether he obtained it in the first instance by election or appointment. If the Constitution read that certain persons shall not hold any civil office of profit, instead of shall not be eligible to such office, it would be clear that this point was untenable, and, as it appears that that is what it really means, the same result follows. State v. Clarke, 3 Nev. 566, 570; State v. Murray, 28 Wis. 96, 99, 9 Am. Rep. 459; Carson v. McPhetridge, 15 Ind. 327, 831; People v. Leonard, 73 Cal. 230, 233.

As a further reason for the belief that notaries public were not intended to be included in this section of the Constitution, it is urged that, if so, they must, under section 82 of article 4 of the Constitution, which requires the Legislature to provide for the election of certain state and county officers "and other necessary officers," be elected, instead of being appointed; and the case of State v. Arrington, 18 Nev. 412, is referred to as sustaining this position. This result might be conceded without militating particularly against the view we have taken, but we do not think it follows that such must be the case. By the Amendment of 1889, section 82 was changed so that the words "other necessary officers" no longer appear; but, even as it originally stood, they apply only to officers similar to those previously enumerated in the section, and not to legislative officers, officers of the militia, and other officers belonging to different classes from those mentioned. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 405-409; Edgecomb v. His Creditors, 19 Nev. 149, 152.

No error appearing in the judgment, it must be affirmed, and is so ordered.

(December 12, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged breach by defendant of a contract to build a motor railway. Reversed.

Statement by Bean, J.:

This is an action to recover damages for breach of contract. The facts are that on March 26, 1890, a written contract was entered into between plaintiff and J. H. Lambert and wife, by the terms of which he purchased of them about 255 acres of land near the town of Milwaukee, and some three or four miles south of Portland, for the sum of $150,000; he paying to them the sum of $10,000 in cash, and agreeing to pay the further sum of $15,000 on or before October 7, 1890, and the remainder of the purchase price on or before five years from the date last named. This property was purchased by plaintiff for the purpose and with the design of subdividing it into lots and blocks, and selling it for suburban residences. About the same time plaintiff, desiring to build a motor line from East Portland to the property, for the purpose of making it accessible and otherwise developing the same, purchased, for $5,000, all the subscribed stock of the Portland, Sellwood & Milwaukee Railway Company, a corporation organized to build such road, and the owner of certain franchises and rights of way on certain streets in East Portland and Sellwood, and along the county road between said towns, and commenced to have the route of such road surveyed and located for the purpose of constructing a motor railway to and across the land so purchased by him of Lambert. On the same day this survey was commenced, certain other surveyors, acting for defendants, who claimed a right to build a road along the same route, appeared upon the ground, and commenced to survey another line along the county road, covering the line staked out by the Portland, Sellwood & Milwaukee Railway Company. Plaintiff then sought an interview with defendants, and negotiations were begun between them which finally resulted in a written proposition, of date April 4, 1890, from defendants to the Portland, Sellwood & Milwaukee Railway Company, that if it would transfer to them its rights and franchises to construct and operate a motor line on certain streets in East Portland, and the right of way as surveyed by it from East Portland to the Lambert farm, except over two or three pieces of land, without any restrictions as to charges over said motor line, (except as to residents and property owners on lands of Lambert near Milwaukee which is limited to twenty tickets for $1, and to be completed by October 31, 1890,) they would pay to it, when the franchises and rights of way should be transferred free from all incumbrances, the sum of $6,000, (that being the amount plaintiff had paid for the stock and the company had expended for work on the proposed road,) and the costs of all labor in grading and clearing the right of way since April 1, 1890. This proposition was accepted by the company, and on April 5, 1890, a written contract was entered into between it and the defendants, by which the company was to sell and the defendants to purchase, on or before May 19, 1890, all its franchises and rights of way for said motor line, for the sum of $6,000 and the cost of all labor performed by it upon the road, in grading and clearing the right of way, until the defendants should take charge of the construction of the road. The defendants also agreed in said contract to complete and have in operation the said railway, along the line of survey as made by the said company, from its terminus in East Portland to the south line of the Lambert place, by October 31, 1890, and to furnish transportation to residents and property holders on said place, to and from Portland, to the south line of the Lambert place, at the rate of twenty tickets for $1, and to stop at three places on said land, to be designated by Lambert or his assigns; and the corporation agreed, on its part, to secure and convey to defendants, on or before the time fixed in the contract, said rights of way and franchises, without restriction, except as aforesaid, from the south boundary line of East Portland to the south line of the Lambert place, excepting the rights of way through two or three pieces of land, which the defendants were to secure for themselves. This executory contract between defendants and the corporation seems never to have been carried out, but for some reason it was thought best, in place of transferring to defendants the franchises of the company, as agreed upon, to sell and transfer to them all the stock in the company; and consequently,

on May 12, 1890, the contract, for the breach of which this action was brought, was entered into between defendants and plaintiff, Lambert, Brown, and Cake, who held certain stock in the corporation in trust for plaintiff, by which the latter sold to the former all the stock of the company, and agreed upon demand to transfer the same on the books, which contract, omitting the signatures of the parties, is as follows:

"Memorandum of agreement made between D. P. Thompson, J. H. Smith, and W. E. Post, the parties of the first part, and N. J. Blagen, J. H. Lambert, C. W. Brown, H. M. Cake, and B. F. Smith, the parties of the second part, witnesseth, that in consideration of $6,589.30, to them in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and in consideration of the covenants of the said D. P. Thompson, J. H. Smith, and W. E. Post, herein contained, the parties of the second part hereby sell, assign, and transfer their stock in the Portland, Sellwood & Milwaukee Railway Company, and agree to, upon demand, assign their stock upon the books of said company, to the said D. P. Thompson, J. H. Smith, and W. E. Post, hereby declaring that they own the number of shares as follows: N. J. Blagen, 1,403 shares; J. H. Lambert, 200 shares; C. W. Brown, one share; H. M. Cake, one share; B. F. Smith, — shares. And the said D. P. Thompson, J. H. Smith, and W. E. Post hereby agree, in consideration of the above, that they will construct, in a first-class manner, complete, and have in operation, a steam railway motor line along the route surveyed by the said railway company, from its terminus in the city of East Portland to the south line of J. H. Lambert's place, by the 31st day of October, 1890, (delays caused by unavoidable injunction proceedings excepted.) Second. That they will furnish transportation to residents and property holders in the said tract of land known as the 'Lambert Place,' by a railway motor line along the route surveyed by the said railway company to the city of Portland, from any stopping places or stations established on the said Lambert place on the line of the said motor road, and from the city of Portland to any of the stopping places or stations on the said Lambert place, at the rate of twenty tickets for one dollar, and that all trains shall stop at three places or stations on the said Lambert place, to be designated by the said J. H. Lambert or his assigns. Third. That they will carry out and fulfill all the obligations imposed upon the said Portland, Sellwood & Milwaukee Railway Company by the written and express terms of franchises granted to said company. In witness whereof, the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals this 12th day of May, 1890."

The plaintiff and his associates fully complied with the terms of this agreement on their part to be performed, and did on July 7, 1890, duly transfer on the books of the corporation all their stock to defendants, and the same has been ever since retained by them. The defendants wholly failed and neglected to build said motor line, or any part thereof, and on September 1, 1890, the city of East Portland, by ordinance, revoked the franchises theretofore granted by it to the Portland, Sellwood & Milwaukee Railway Company to construct its road upon the streets of the city. Meanwhile, however, plaintiff, relying upon the contract of defendants to build the road, had caused a large portion of the Lambert place to be cleared off and surveyed into lots and blocks, and had sold about 100 lots for the aggregate sum of $18,693.35; the purchasers paying therefor in cash a small part of the purchase price, and agreeing to pay the remainder thereof, to wit, $14,797.25, in deferred installments. Under these circumstances, the second payment from plaintiff to Lambert was about to fall due, and perceiving that defendants did not intend to build the road within the time agreed upon, and could not do so, because the franchises granted by the city of East Portland had been revoked, and that consequently he could sell no more lots, and would probably be bankrupt, unless he could induce Lambert to release him from his contract of purchase, he applied to Lambert for a release and cancellation of his contract, and did on September 30, 1890, obtain such release, upon the best terms possible, which was the forfeiture of the cash payment of $10,000 and the surrender to Lambert of all notes received by him for deferred payments on lots sold. After the time in which defendants agreed to construct and have in operation the motor line had expired, plaintiff procured from Lambert, Brown, and Cake an assignment to him of all their rights under the contract of May 12, 1890, and of their right of action against defendants for the breach of said contract, and thereafter commenced this action to recover $146,001.96 damages. In his complaint he avers that at the time of entering into the contract of May 12, and as a consideration and inducement for the execution thereof, the defendants were informed and well knew that he had purchased the Lambert land with the intention of subdividing the same into lots and blocks, and of causing said railway motor line to be constructed from Portland to and across the land, in order to enhance the value thereof, and to enable him to sell the same for a profit which would thereby accrue to him, and that relying upon the promise and agreement of defendants, as contained in said writing, he cleared, surveyed, and platted a portion of the land, and disposed of the lots mentioned; that, if the road had been built as agreed upon, the land would have been worth on October 31, 1890, the sum of $323,657.15, but, by reason of the failure of defendants to keep and perform their contract and construct said road, he was disabled from completing his contract with Lambert for the purchase of the land, and was forced to and did lose the sum of $17,189.66 paid on the purchase price, and was unable to sell any more of the property, by which he was further damaged in the sum of $128,862.30, which would have been the net profits on the remainder of said lots and land on 31st day of October, 1890, if defendants had built the motor line as they agreed to do. The defendants allege in their answer, as an excuse for not building this road as they agreed to do, that the contracts of April 5th and May 12th were executed for the same consideration and to accomplish the same purpose and impose the same obligations and liabilities upon the defendants, and that neither the plaintiff nor the corporation has received or transferred to them the rights of way mentioned in the contract of April 5th, and therefore, without any fault or neglect on their part, they were and are wholly unable to build the road as provided in said agreements. The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $25,000, from which defendants appeal, and assign error in the admission of testimony and the giving and refusal of certain instructions by the trial court.

Messrs. J. F. & E. B. Watson for appellants.

Messrs. E. C. Bronaugh, W. D. Fenton and Cake & Cake for respondent.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It is contended by counsel for defendants that the contract of April 5, 1890, between the Portland, Sellwood & Milwaukee Railway Company in its corporate capacity and defendants, in which the corporation agreed to procure the rights of way therein mentioned, should be construed and treated as part of the contract of May 12, 1890, entered into between defendants and plaintiff and his associates in their individual capacity, so as to hold them responsible for the failure, if any occurred, on the part of the corporation, to fulfill its agreement as to procuring such rights of way. When two written contracts are entered into between the same parties concerning the same subject-matter, whether made simultaneously or on different days, they may, under some circumstances, be regarded as one contract, and interpreted together. Dean v. Lawham, 7 Or. 422; Kruse v. Prindle, 8 Or. 158; Bishop, Cont. § 165.

But the two contracts in question here are not between the same parties, nor concerning the same subject-matter. The one is an executory contract, made by a corporation in its corporate capacity, for the sale to defendants of certain franchises then held and owned by it, and containing a stipulation on its part to secure and transfer to them additional rights of way over certain other designated portions of the route of the proposed motor line; and the other is an executed contract of sale of the stock of the corporation, made by plaintiff and associates as natural persons, and acting in their individual capacity. The two contracts are therefore entirely separate and distinct, between different parties and concerning a different subject-matter. In one a corporation is a party, in the other, private individuals. By the one, the corporation agrees to sell and transfer to defendants certain property belonging to it, while by the other the defendants purchased of plaintiff and associates certain property belonging to them as individuals; and while it may be true that plaintiff and his associates were the stockholders, directors, and officers of the corporation at the time the contract of April 5, 1890, was entered into, yet they did not assume any personal responsibility in that contract, or become obligated as individuals to procure these rights of way. Nor does the fact that the consideration paid by defendants for the stock was the same in amount as agreed by them to be paid for the franchises of the corporation in any way change or affect the liabilities or obligations of the parties, as contained in the written contracts. Defendants in place of requiring the corporation to comply with its contract to procure and transfer to them the stipulated rights of way, saw proper, by the consent of the corporation, to purchase and become the owners of all the stock, thereby obtaining control of the corporation and its property, with all its liabilities and obligations, among which was the agreement to procure and transfer the rights of way for the motor line, which was just as binding on the corporation after as before defendants became the owners of the stock. We think, therefore, the court below was clearly right in holding that the two contracts were not to be construed as one contract, and in instructing the jury that, under the contract sued on, plaintiff was under no obligation to procure or furnish the rights of way in question, or answer for the default of the corporation, if any occurred, in so doing.

2. It is also claimed by counsel for defendants that the loss sustained by plaintiff, if any, and sought to be recovered in this action as damages, arose, not directly from the breach by defendants of their contract of May 12, 1890, but indirectly out of the failure of the plaintiff to fulfill his contract with Lambert for the purchase of the land, which he claims to be collateral to the contract sued on, and that such damages are too uncertain, remote, and speculative to be recovered in this action. This question is presented by a demurrer to the complaint, exceptions to the admission in evidence of plaintiff's contract with Lambert, and to the giving and refusal of certain instructions by the trial court, which we shall not undertake to notice in detail, but for convenience shall consider together.

The difficulty in the determination of the question thus presented, and in like cases, lies, not so much in the ascertainment of the law of the subject, as in its application to the facts of the particular case. The broad general rule in such cases, as we gather it from the authorities, is that the plaintiff may recover such damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained, as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of both parties at the time of the making of the contract, as the proximate and natural consequences of a breach by defendants; and in determining what may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties, as the natural consequences of a breach, all the facts surrounding the execution of the contract known to both parties may be considered, even if these be such as would not necessarily enter into it, if unknown to the defendant. It is on this principle that an injured party is allowed to charge the other with loss on collateral contracts on proving notice, which, in the absence of such notice, would not be considered within the contemplation of the parties. 1 Suth. Damages, 79; 1 Sedgw. Damages, § 149; Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 841; Hammond v. Bussey, 57 L. J. Q. B. 58; Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489, 69 Am. Dec. 718; Booth v. Spruyten Duyvil Roll Mill Co. 60 N. Y. 487; Hammer v. Schoenfelder, 47 Wis. 455; Messmore v. New York Shot & Lead Co. 40 N. Y. 422.

These and other authorities on this question are carefully collated and discussed in 1 Sedgw. Damages, § 144 et seq., and in 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, title Damages, and we shall therefore attempt no review of them, but shall only refer to the admirable statement of the rule by Mr. Justice Selden in Griffin v. Colver, supra, "that the injured party is entitled to recover all his damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained; and this rule is subject to but two conditions: The damages must be such as may fairly be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract,—that is, must be such as might naturally be expected to follow its violation; and they must be certain, both in their nature and in respect to the cause from which they proceed." Now, in the case at bar, the damages sustained by plaintiff, and sought to be recovered, if any, are, it seems to us, in view of the known facts surrounding the execution of the contract, such as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was executed, as the proximate and natural consequences of a breach by defendants and may be recovered in this action. From the terms of the contract itself, as well as from all prior negotiations between the parties, it clearly appears that the defendants must have known at the time they purchased plaintiff's stock in the corporation, and agreed to build the road by a stipulated time, that the object to be accomplished by the building of the road, so far as plaintiff was concerned, was to enhance the value of the Lambert land so that he might derive some profit therefrom. The proposition of defendants made to the Portland, Sellwood & Milwaukee Railway Company, of which plaintiff was the president and sole stockholder, on April 4, 1890, to purchase the rights and franchises of the company, and in which they proposed to build the road by October 31, 1890, on its face, shows that the Lambert land was to be specially benefited by the proposed road; for the franchises were to be transferred without restrictions as to charges over the motor line, except as to residents and property owners on such land, which was to be limited to twenty tickets for $1. These same special privileges as to the Lambert land were carried through all subsequent negotiations and contracts between the parties, and clearly indicate that the sole object plaintiff had in view in making the contract was to enhance the value of such land; and defendants must have known that the natural and probable result of a failure on their part to build the road would be to prevent such enhanced value.

The complaint alleges, and the evidence tends to prove, both from the contract itself and the circumstances surrounding its execution, that defendants knew at the time they made the contract to build the road that plaintiff either owned or had some interest in the Lambert land, and that his object in securing the franchises and commencing to build the proposed road was to enhance the value of such land, and derive a profit therefrom; and under such circumstances, and with knowledge of the object and purpose of the proposed road, defendants agreed and contracted with plaintiff and his associates to purchase their stock in the company holding such franchises, and build the road, within a stipulated time, to such land, and have failed to do so, in consequence of which plaintiff was unable to complete his contract for the purchase of the land, but was compelled to cancel it, and was thereby prevented for realizing the profits or gains which would have accrued to him had the contract been performed. Under such circumstances the loss of such profits or gains may be reasonably supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made, as the reasonable and probable consequences of the breach, because they must be taken to have known these consequences. As the gains prevented or losses sustained by plaintiff by the failure of defendants to build the proposed road are represented by the profits which he would have received if such road had been built, and he enabled to keep his contract with Lambert for the purchase of the land, defendants are responsible for such losses, if they are chargeable with notice. As Mason, J., said in Messmore v. New York Shot & Lead Co., supra, "it affirms nothing more than that, where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of a contract, he shall so far as money can do it, be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed." Nor does the fact that plaintiff surrendered and canceled his contract for the purchase of the land after the franchises under which defendants proposed to build the road had been revoked by the city of East Portland prevent him from maintaining this action.

If, after it became apparent that defendants would and could not build the road according to their contract, and on account thereof plaintiff found himself unable to comply with his contract with Lambert, and purchase the land, he had a right, in order to save himself from greater loss, to make such terms with Lambert for the cancellation of the contract as he could, and then bring this action against defendants to recover such damages as he may have sustained by reason of the failure on their part; and this brings us to the measure of damages in this case. The court below held, and so instructed the jury, that the damages claimed in this case are damages connected with the land, and accrued to whoever may have owned the land at the time the contract of defendants should have been fulfilled, and that since Lambert, who was the owner of the land at that time, had assigned to plaintiff his right of action for a breach of defendants' contract, he could maintain the action, and recover whatever damages may have accrued to the land, and on this theory instructed the jury that the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the land on October 31, 1890, with the road built and in operation, and its value without the road. In this, we think, there was error, both in holding that plaintiff could in this action recover any damages which may have accrued to Lambert, and in giving the rule for the measure of the damages. This action is not brought to recover Lambert's damages, if any, nor does the complaint aver that he was in any way injured by defendants' breach of their contract to build the road, but it is prosecuted to recover the gains prevented or losses sustained by plaintiff; and the evidence and measure of damages would materially differ in the two cases, assuming, but without deciding, that Lambert ever had a cause of action for a breach of defendants' contract. Lambert did not in fact own the stock which he assigned to defendants, but held it in trust for plaintiff; and when he executed the contract of May 12, 1890, he was acting for and in behalf of plaintiff; and the assignment of his right of action for a breach of this contract only operated to transfer to plaintiff that which in fact already belonged to him, and enabled him to maintain this action unembarrassed by any apparently outstanding right of action in Lambert or the other parties to the assignment; and for this purpose it was competent evidence. But this action is maintained in plaintiff's own right, to recover such damages as he may have sustained; and the effect upon the value of the land, of defendants' failure to build the road, is only material as it affects the measure of damages and the amount he is entitled to recover. The rule for the measure of damages, as stated by the trial court, is erroneous, as applied to the facts of this case, because it fails to take into account the fact that plaintiff had agreed to pay for the land a stipulated sum, which, so far as he was concerned, fixed its minimum value; and his loss, if the land was not actually worth what he agreed to pay for it,—and there was evidence to that effect,—could certainly only be the difference between the price he was to pay under his contract and what its value would have been on October 31, 1890, with the road built and in operation. The prejudicial effect of the rule adopted by the trial court is apparent when it is considered that plaintiff was to pay for the land $588.23 an acre under his contract with Lambert, and he himself testified that the land was not worth, at the time he contracted for its purchase, to exceed $500 an acre, without a motor line or the prospect of one. So that the difference between its value, according to his testimony, without a road, and what he agreed to pay for it, was within about 18 L. R. A.

$2,500 of the verdict in this case. The true rule for the measure of damages for a breach of the contract sued on, as applied to the facts of this case, in our opinion, is the difference in the value of the Lambert land on the 31st day of October, 1890, without the road,—not less in amount, however, than the price plaintiff agreed to pay for it,—and what its value would have been on that day, with the road completed and in operation. This appreciation in the value of the land, if any, was, it seems to us, clearly within the legal, if not the actual, contemplation of the parties, at the time the contract was made; and the loss of this increased value is the proximate and natural consequences of defendants' breach, and is the fairest and closest approximation of the actual pecuniary loss sustained by plaintiff which the law is capable of furnishing. This view as to the measure of plaintiff's damages seems to be fully supported by the adjudged cases. Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Gilmer, 85 Ala. 422; Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Sumner, 106 Ind. 55; Watterson v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 74 Pa. 208; Wilson v. Northampton & B. J. R. Co. L. R. 9 Ch. App. 279; Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 385; Houston & T. O. R. Co. v. Molloy, 64 Tex. 607.

As defendants failed and neglected to build the road within the stipulated time, or at all, it may be difficult for plaintiff to prove with exactness what would have been the value of the land with the contract fulfilled, but such uncertainty does not prevent him from recovering such damages as he may be able to prove. He is only required to give such evidence as the nature of the case will permit, bearing upon the matter of his damages, and legally tending to prove such value. O'Brien v. Home Benefit Soc. 117 N. Y. 810; Huse & L. Ice & Transp. Co. v. Heinze, 103 Mo. 245.

Where one violates and entirely repudiates his contract with another, the damages sustained by the injured party are, as Earl, J., said, "nearly always involved in some uncertainty and contingency. Usually they are to be worked out in the future, and they can be determined only approximately upon reasonable conjecture and probable estimates. They may be so uncertain, contingent, and imaginary as to be incapable of adequate proof; and then they cannot be recovered, because they cannot be proved. But when it is certain that damages have been caused by a breach of contract, and the only uncertainty is as to their amount, there can rarely be good reason for refusing, on account of such uncertainty, any damages whatever for the breach. A person violating his contract should not be permitted entirely to escape liability because the amount of the damages which he has caused is uncertain." Wakeman v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. 101 N. Y. 209.

The rule that damages which are uncertain or contingent cannot be recovered does not embrace an uncertainty as to the value of the benefit or gain to be derived from the performance of the contract, but an uncertainty or contingency as to whether such gain or benefit would be derived at all. It only applies to such damages as are not the certain result of the breach, and not to such as are the certain result, but uncertain in amount. Now, in this case, it is certain, under the facts as he claims them to be, that plaintiff has sustained some loss as the proximate and natural consequences of the breach of defendants; and under such circumstances the law will adopt that mode of estimating the damages which is most certain and definite, and it seems to us the rule we have suggested most nearly meets the requirements of the law.

3. It is also claimed that the trial court erred in the admission of certain opinion evidence as to what the value of the Lambert place would have been on October 31, 1890, if defendants had complied with their contract, and built the motor line as they agreed to do. A number of witnesses were called by plaintiff, who were qualified to speak from business experience, from familiarity with the values of real estate in and about Portland, and the effect upon such values of the construction and operation of suburban motor lines, as well as from a knowledge and familiarity with the situation, location, character, and quality of the Lambert place, and were permitted by the trial court, against defendants' objection and exception, to give their opinions as to what that place would have been worth on October 31, 1890, had defendants fulfilled their contract, and constructed the motor line in accordance with their agreement. Two objections are urged to the competency of this testimony: First, that the fact sought to be proved is so remote and speculative as not to be a proper item of damages in this case; and, second, it is not a matter upon which opinion or expert testimony is admissible. In the view we have taken as to the proper measure of damages in this case, as already indicated, it is only necessary for us to consider the last objection stated.

It is undoubtedly true, as a general rule, that a witness is only permitted to testify as to facts within his own knowledge, and not to inferences or opinions. But to this rule there are certain exceptions; and one of these exceptions is that when the value of real estate, which is always largely a matter of opinion, is in controversy, persons who are acquainted with the property in question, and know the value of real estate in the same neighborhood, are competent to give their opinion as to its value. "These opinions are admissible," says Gray, J., "not as being the opinions of experts, strictly so called, for they are not founded on special study or training or professional experience, but rather from necessity, upon the ground that they depend upon knowledge which any one may acquire, but which the jury may not have, and that they are the most satisfactory, and often the only attainable, evidence of the fact to be proved." Swan v. Middlesex, 101 Mass. 177. Indeed, the courts are practically unanimous in following this rule. Rogers, Expert Testimony, § 155; Lawson, Expert Ev. 435; 8 Sedgw. Damages, § 1294; 1 Suth. Damages, 786, 798; 1 Rice, Ev. 335. Nor do we understand that counsel for defendants seriously controverts the rule as above stated; but he contends that such evidence must be confined to the present or past value of the land, and not to its value under other and wholly different circumstances, and in support of his contention relies upon a series of New York cases, all of which are founded on Roberts v. New York Elev. R. Co., 128 N. Y. 455, 18 L. R. A. 499, which was an action by an abutting owner to restrain the operation and maintenance of an elevated railroad in the street in front of his property. The trial court allowed and permitted a witness who was familiar with the plaintiff's property, and its value, to testify as to what, in his opinion, the property was damaged by the presence of the structure and operation of the road, and as to what it would be worth without the road; but on an appeal the evidence was held to be incompetent and inadmissible, but by a divided court. The majority opinion is based entirely upon the previous decisions in that state; and, after a careful and exhaustive review and examination of them, Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for the majority of the court, concluded, under the rule in that state, that while a competent witness might give his opinion as to the present or past value of real estate, because it is founded on facts that now exist or once existed, he could not testify as to its value under other or wholly different circumstances, because such evidence is uncertain and speculative, and would invade the province of the court or jury, whose duty alone it is to determine the amount of damages. Mr. Justice Gray, in an able and learned dissenting opinion, in which Chief Justice Ruger concurred, maintained that the evidence was competent, both on principle and the authorities of that state; and while the opinion of the majority of the court is in harmony with the former adjudications of New York, yet, as an original question, we are inclined to think the better reason, as well as weight of authority from other states, is with the minority opinion. This question has never been finally adjudicated in this state, although we understand the practice at the various circuits has been to admit such evidence; and we are therefore for the first time confronted with the question as to whether, in cases where the amount of recovery depends upon the difference in the value of land in its present condition and what it would be worth under different circumstances, such as the location of a railroad, street, or public highway over it, the opinions of witnesses qualified to speak upon the subject is admissible in evidence as to what the land would be worth in its changed condition. It seems manifest that such evidence, from a well-informed and intelligent witness, would materially aid and assist the jury in arriving at a just conclusion, and without its assistance the verdict would ordinarily be the merest speculation. The situation, location, and character of the land, and of the proposed improvement or burden, may be accurately and minutely described, and yet the jury be wholly unable from such evidence alone, to form an intelligent opinion as to the probable effect upon the value of the land of such proposed improvement or burden. As was said by Elliott, J.: "Of what assistance to a jury composed of clergymen, merchants, and bankers would be a description of the minutest accuracy without some estimate of value by a competent witness? Possibly it would enable such jury to form a crude conjecture. It would do but little more." Post v. Conroy, 92 Ind. 467. And in the language of Skinner, J., in Illinois & W. R. Co. v. Von Horn, 18 Ill. 259, "to describe to a jury a piece of ground, however minutely, with its supposed adaptations to use, advantages, and disadvantages, and demand of them, upon this information alone, a verdict as to its value, would be merely farcical; and this, indeed, is all that can be done to enable them to arrive at a conclusion as to the value, unless the witnesses are allowed to state their judgment or opinion, together with the facts upon which such opinion is founded." If, as the authorities all agree, skilled evidence is admissible to prove the value of land in its present condition, why should it be deemed inadmissible to prove its value under different circumstances? In the one case it is competent on the ground of obvious necessity, and because no more definite knowledge is to be had; and for the same reason, it seems to us, it should be admitted in the other.

It is suggested that such evidence is speculative and unreliable, but the same objection can be urged, with equal force, to the admission of expert or skilled evidence in any case; and, if we hold this evidence incompetent on that account, it seems to us we would be shutting the door against the admission of opinion evidence in all classes of cases, for, if the objection is valid in the one instance so it is in all. The jury are not bound to take such evidence as true, but must exercise their own judgment in determining from it and all the other facts in evidence before them what the real merits of the case are. They are only required to give it such weight and effect as they may think it deserves, in view of all the facts and circumstances of the case. The witness may and should be required to detail to the jury, so far as possible, the facts and circumstances upon which his opinion is founded, so they may judge of its value as evidence; and from these and all the other evidences in the case, together with the opinion of the witness, if they think it deserving of any weight, their verdict should be formed.

It is also claimed that such evidence invades the province of the jury, where the amount of damages depends entirely, as in the case at bar, upon the question of value. But this question is not directly presented by this record, for the evidence admitted was not the opinions of the witness as to the amount of plaintiff's damages, but their opinion as to the probable value of the Lambert place with the motor line built and in operation on October 31, 1890; and in no case that we have been able to find, except the one from New York, have the opinions of witnesses as to value been excluded because the questions of damages and value were identical. In many of the states, in such case, a witness is not allowed to state his opinion as to the amount of damages, but only as to the value of the land before and after the contemplated improvement or burden, leaving the subtraction to be made by the jury; but Mr. Rogers says the weight of authority as well as reason is in favor of allowing the witness to express his opinion as to the amount of damages, as it is but a mere mathematical calculation. Rogers, Expert Testimony, 389, where the authorities on both sides are collated. And this seems to be the rule in this state; for in Portland v. Kamm, 10 Or. 383, which was a proceeding to condemn land for a street, this court held (Watson, Ch. J., delivering the opinion) that it was competent to ask a witness the following question: "What, in your opinion, is the damage to that portion of the tract of land belonging to defendant, Kamm, which lies within 100 feet of the proposed street, by reason of the laying out of said street?" This case would also seem to recognize the rule that the opinion of a competent witness should not be confined to the past or present value of land, but may be given as to its value under other and different conditions; for the inquiry of the witness was not as to the present value of the Kamm land, but what would be its condition after the opening of the proposed street. A careful examination of the books and cases has satisfied us that in a case like the one at bar, where the amount of damages depends upon the value of the land with and without the contemplated improvement, a witness competent to speak upon the subject may state his opinion of the value of the land with and without the proposed improvement. Judge Redfield, in speaking of the competency of opinion evidence in similar cases, says: "One may enumerate some of the leading facts upon which such an opinion is based; but, after all, the testimony as to facts is excessively meager, without the opinion of the witness either upon the very subject of inquiry, or some one as near it as can be supposed. Hence, in those courts where the opinion of witnesses in regard to the value of property, real or personal, is not admitted, it leads to sundry shifts and evasions in the course of the examination of witnesses upon that subject, which, while it is not a little embarrassing in itself, at the same time illustrates the inconsistency, not to say absurdity, of the rule." 1 Redf. Railroads, 289. And in Mills on Eminent Domain (sec. 165) it is said that "the general rule is that witnesses shall not testify how much the property is damaged, or give their opinion as to the amount of damages. They may testify as to the value of property, and as to the value of property before and after the improvement, but not as to the effect of the change in adding to or taking from such value. The extent of damages is to be proved by facts, and estimated by the jury. Hence a witness cannot be asked the value of the land with the strip taken out. Notwithstanding the array of authorities above cited, there seems to be a growing tendency to allow witnesses to give an opinion on the amount of damages. It can hardly be seen how the jury can with any greater fairness arrive at the amount of damages by subtracting for themselves the present value from the former value than by allowing a witness to do the same thing." Mr. Pierce, in his work on Railroads, (p. 227,) says: "Opinions are admissible as to the amount of damages or benefit resulting to an estate from the construction and working of a railroad. The amount may also be calculated by comparing the valuation of the property before and after the taking as made by the witnesses,—a method which is relieved by the objection that the amount of the damages is the issue to be found by the jury." In support of the text the author cites cases from most of the states of the Union. In the case of Yost v. Conroy, 92 Ind. 464, which was an action to condemn land for a public ditch, it was held, in a well-considered opinion by Judge Elliott, that the opinion of one acquainted with the land, as to its value with and without the ditch, was proper evidence. So in Swan v. Middlesex, 101 Mass. 173, on the question of the injury to an estate by taking part of it to widen a street, it was held competent for a witness to testify as to "what, in his opinion, would be the effect, upon the value of the estate in question, of widening the street and cutting off the land and tree." And in Snow v. Boston & M. R. Co., 65 Me. 280, which was a proceeding to condemn land for railway purposes, it was held competent for persons acquainted with the land to state their opinions as to its value, or the amount of damages done, if all the land is not to be taken. The following authorities, in addition to those already cited, are also in point, and may be referred to in connection with this discussion: Whart. Ev. § 450; 1 Rice, Ev. 335; Hosher v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 60 Mo. 803; Indianapolis, D. & S. R. Co. v. Pugh, 85 Ind. 279; White Deer Imp. Co. v. Sassaman, 67 Pa. 415; Lehmicks v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co. 19 Minn. 464 (Gil. 406); Sexton v. North Bridgewater, 116 Mass. 200; Trucker v. Massachusetts Cent. R. Co. 118 Mass. 546; Keithsburg & E. R. Co. v. Henry, 79 Ill. 290; Snyder v. Western U. R. Co. 25 Wis. 60; Tate v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 64 Mo. 149.

In applying the view we have taken of the law of this case upon a new trial, the other questions suggested at the argument will perhaps be avoided, and therefore need not be considered at this time.

Judgment of the court below is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

MILLER & CO., Piffs. in Err.,
v.

GEORGIA RAILROAD & BANKING CO.

(.....Ga.....)

1. It is competent for a common carrier whose customers, at their option, have the privilege of unloading for themselves the vehicles in which their freights are shipped, to adopt and enforce a reasonable regulation as to the time within which the vehicles may be unloaded free of any expense for storage, and to fix a reasonable rate per day at which storage will thereafter be charged for the use of such vehicles so long as they remain unloaded.
2. A rate of $1 per day for each railroad car thus devoted to the use of storing freight is not necessarily unreasonable because cars are of different sizes and vary in capacity, nor because a fraction of a day is charged for as a whole day, nor because the customary rate of storage in warehouses or elevators is much lower; nor is it, as matter of law unreasonable for any cause.
3. A particular common carrier, though a corporation, makes a regulation its own by adopting it and acting upon it, irrespective of the source from whence it is derived;

*Head notes by SIMMONS, J.

and therefore, that it was promulgated by a person or board of persons representing a combination of such carriers would make no difference

4. As between the carrier and customers who have notice of the regulation before shipments are made, the regulation is operative, whether indicated upon bills of lading or not, and whether the shipments are made to the order of the consignor, with the customary direction to notify the customer, or directly to the customer himself.
5. In construing the phraseology of a regulation expressed in this language: "It being understood that said car or cars are to be placed and remain accessible to the consignee for the purpose of unloading during the period in which held free of demurrage, and that, when the period for such demurrage charge commences, they are to remain accessible to the consignee for unloading purposes."—the course and exigencies of business are necessarily to be regarded; and hence the cars, after their arrival at destination, though not kept accessible at every moment of time, are to be treated as being and remaining accessible if the carrier is always ready to render them so within the shortest practicable time—not longer than a few hours—after being notified that the customer is ready to unload.

(December 7, 1891.)

ERROR to the City Court of Richmond County to review a judgment in favor of NOTE.—It is very remarkable that not more cases have been decided as to the right of a railroad company to collect demurrage for cars not unloaded within the time allowed by the rules of the 18 L. R. A.

business, since the custom to make such charges is general and must have been exercised in multitudes of instances. The few decisions on the subject are cited and reviewed in the above opinion.

plaintiff in an action brought to recover compensation for the storage of certain grain and produce by plaintiff in its cars in which such grain and produce was permitted to remain after it had reached its destination and been tendered for unloading. Affirmed.

At the trial the defendants requested the giving of the following instructions, which the court refused:

1. Plaintiff cannot by rule fix upon any rate of storage or demurrage unless it is reasonable, and in arriving at what would be a reasonable charge the jury are permitted to examine what are the customary charges for the storage of grain.

2. In the absence of an express contract, or a stipulation for demurrage charges in the bill of lading, the consignee is not liable for demurrage.

8. Before the plaintiff could recover demurrage for the use of the cars, it would have to prove that the detention prevented its making profits by the use of the cars. The plaintiff must show a loss of service of the cars and the amount of damage by detention, in order to recover for demurrage.

4. Under the charter of the plaintiff it is not authorized to make charges for storage, except by rules established by the board of directors; and if you find that the rule under which the plaintiff makes the charge for storage or demurrage in this case was adopted and promulgated by any association or person other than the board of directors of the plaintiff, the same is illegal and does not entitle plaintiff to make any charge for storage or demurrage. (Plaintiff read the twelfth section of its charter (Act of 1853), authorizing it to charge for storage and to fix reasonable rates; defendants relied on section first of the Act of 1853, claiming that such rules could only be promulgated by the directors, and that the evidence disclosed that the rule was established and published by the Southern Railway & Steamship Association, (of which the plaintiff was a member), and was therefore invalid and illegal as contravening both the charter and the general law.)

5. If the jury believe that the known, certain, general and universal custom and practice of plaintiff and common carriers in the state and county prior to November, 1889, was not to charge either for storage in cars on the tracks or for demurrage in car or cars, then that custom becomes binding on carriers, shippers and consignees, and could not be changed by mere notice on the part of the carrier to the consignee that demurrage would be charged.

6. As a matter of law the plaintiff is not entitled to charge for demurrage on cars remaining loaded on its tracks. If the plaintiff desired the use of the cars, or to return those containing the grain, it was at liberty to unload the grain into its warehouse, or the warehouse of a third person, or into the elevator, and if it failed to do so it cannot make defendants liable for the detention of cars. Plaintiff, by the exercise of its legal rights, could have unloaded the cars, charged and collected storage, and avoided the detention of the cars, and if it failed so to do it cannot thereby render defendants liable for demurrage charge.

7. Demurrage in law is limited to the charges for the detention of ships. Railroad companies are not allowed to charge therefor.

8. The freight charges of a railroad include all usual expenses and charges for the goods from the time they are shipped until the relation of common carrier ceases by the delivery, or actual storage, of the goods. As long as the goods are left in the cars they are not stored, but the plaintiff holds them as common carrier.

9. Grain and ponderous articles may be delivered without being unloaded actually, but the relation of common carrier of grain in bulk continues until the goods are actually unloaded and stored, or until the car is placed at the usual place of delivery, or at a point accessible to the consignee where they can conveniently unload.

10. If the jury find from the evidence that, forty-eight hours after the notice was served, any or all of the cars mentioned were in the depot-yard of plaintiff at a point at which they were inaccessible to defendants, and thereafter they paid the freight, and subsequently to the payment of the freight the cars had to be hauled or carried by plaintiff from the yard to the usual point where the cars were delivered to the defendants, then I charge you the relation of common carrier continued up to the time when the cars were carried to the point of delivery; and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover either storage or demurrage for the time prior to the placing of cars at such a point. Nor would it be entitled to charge for the detention or use of the cars, until a reasonable time for unloading had elapsed after the car had been placed at such a point.

11. So long as the cars containing the grain have to be moved by the railroad company, or hauled or carried from one place to another, so as to be delivered to defendants, the relation of common carrier exists, and the railroad company has not become a warehouseman as to the goods therein and cannot charge for storage or for demurrage on the cars.

The parts of the charge of the court assigned as error are as follows:

"A regulation of the railroad company that such freights in bulk or otherwise, as to which it is the custom for cars to be unloaded by the owners of the property, shall be charged one dollar per car for each day such car is not unloaded, at the expiration of forty-eight hours, which forty-eight hours shall commence at ten o'clock A. M. of the day after notice of the arrival of the car is given to the owner of the property, is a reasonable regulation and binding upon the customers of the railroad company who have notice of the same.

"If the jury shall find that it was a regulation of the railroad company at the time to charge for storage or demurrage at the rate of one dollar per day for each car when freight like the defendants' was not unloaded in forty-eight hours after the commencement of the notice to the defendants, and if the jury shall find that the plaintiff gave the defendants notice of such regulation, and of the arrival of the cars containing defendants' freight, then the defendants are bound thereby, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action at the rate of one dollar per day for each car which plaintiff shows to you was covered by the regulation.

"I charge you that the rule and regulation was a valid one, that it was reasonable, and that if the railroad complied with its part of it by delivery at a point accessible to the consignee, or if it substantially complied, or what might be termed constructively complied, by notifying the consignee that the goods had arrived, and that it actually had them in position for prompt delivery, and that the defendants delayed complying with that rule, then they would be liable for the charges."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph R. Lamar, for plaintiffs in error:

Railroads cannot collect demurrage.

Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Jenkins, 103 Ill. 5:8; Burlington & M. R. Co. v. Chicago Lumber Co. 15 Neb. 391.

The right to collect demurrage is a matter of contract.

Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Jenkins, supra.

Demurrage is confined to maritime law.

Ibid.

Ordinarily it can only be collected from the consignor.

Gage v. Morse, 12 Allen, 410, 90 Am. Dec. 155.

In cases where it can be collected from the consignee it is because the bill of lading so provides.

5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 543, notes, 2, 3, citing many authorities.

The action is not ex contractu but ex delicto, and damages have to be proved in order to be recovered.

Williamson v. Barrett, 54 U. S. 13 How. 111, 14 L. ed. 73; Hutchinson, Carr. 474.

The bills of lading were in usual form and gave no reason for the price of freight being fixed at the rate named.

If it was the custom for the consignee to unload promptly there was no more binding force in that custom than in the other custom of the railroad to make no charge for the delay in unloading.

The bill of lading said nothing about who was to unload. The law did; it required the carrier to unload.

Southwestern R. Co. v. Felder, 46 Ga. 438; Pegler v. Monmouthshire R. & O. Co. 6 Hurlst. & N. 644; 2 Rorer, Railroads, 1224, 1225; Vincent v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 49 Ill. 33; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 56 Ill. 365, 8 Am. Rep. 690; Hutchinson, Carr. § 371.

Every moment of detention for which plaintiff sues in this case is for alleged detention before the cars were put on track 88 and while in the carrier's possession.

Until placed on track 88 the car was in plaintiff's possession as carrier, and "freight charges of railroad includes all charges, from time goods are shipped until relation of carrier ceases by actual delivery, or storage, or placing of car at usual point of unloading."

Pegler v. Monmouthshire R. & O. Co. supra; 2 Rorer, Railroads, 1233; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Nash, 43 Ind. 423.

Liability of carrier as such continues until the goods arrive at destination and are there unloaded and deposited in a place of safety and held ready to be delivered on demand.

Southwestern R. Co. v. Felder, supra.

In case of ponderous articles the liability of carrier continues until the car is placed on track at point where articles are usually unloaded.

Rorer, Railroads, 1233.

Proof of usage that car was at risk of consignee will not relieve carrier of liability, as nothing short of a special agreement can have that effect.

Id. 1281.

There is a difference between arriving and nearly arriving. The carrier's obligation is not only to carry but to deliver, and even in maritime law the lay days within which consignee is allowed to unload do not begin to be counted when the ship enters the harbor, but when she reaches the wharf. A car in the midst of a train 250 yards from a point accessible and usual for unloading has nearly arrived but not more so than a ship in the harbor.

5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 547; Hodgdon v. New Haven & H. R. Co. 46 Conn. 276, 33 Am. Rep. 21; Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Prewitt, 46 Ala. 63, 7 Am. Rep. 586; Rice v. Hart, 118 Mass. 201, 19 Am. Rep. 433.

Where consignee had notice of arrival in yard, and, finding it inconvenient to be unloaded, the car was ordered to be moved to a more accessible spot and in course of moving was, without negligence, burned, the carrier was held liable as such.

Mr. Joseph B. Cumming, for defendant in error:

A common carrier has also, under proper circumstances, the character, duties, and rights of a warehouseman.

Schouler, Bailm. 510, 516.

In Georgia, when the transit of the goods is ended—that is to say, when the goods are brought to their destination, unloaded from the cars and deposited in the railroad company's depot—the railroad company ceases, as to those goods, to be a carrier, and becomes a warehouseman, with the duties and rights which attach to the business of a warehouseman.

Southwestern R. Co. v. Felder, 46 Ga. 438.

The carrier, when he rightfully becomes a warehouseman, is entitled to be paid as such, and the compensation which he receives as such is in addition to his compensation as carrier.

Hutchinson, Carr. § 373; Norway Plains Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co. 1 Gray, 263; Miller v. Mansfield, 112 Mass. 260.

Common carriers have the right to make reasonable regulations for the conduct of their business.

Ga. Code, § 2069; Schouler, Bailm. 379.

The rule under which the charges sued for are made is a reasonable regulation, and can be sustained on that ground as well as on the ground that it is a reasonable warehouseman's charge.

Demurrage is "an allowance, which marine law makes by way of indemnity to the carrier, when the vessel has been detained unreasonably long in loading or unloading the cargo through the fault of the customer."

§ 913. See also note near top of page 122, 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas., commencing with the word "Inconvenience."

There would seem to be no ground of reason, why the safe keeping of property in cars should not be paid for as well as the safe keeping of property in warehouses.

Simmons, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Georgia Railroad Company sued Miller & Co. for the sum of $892, besides interest, the declaration containing two counts, as follows: (1) "On the 1st of January, 1890, and on various days thereafter up to the time of filing this complaint, petitioner stored on its tracks in said county certain carloads of corn, wheat, grain, and other produce, at the special instance and request of said Miller & Co., by means whereof said Miller & Co. became indebted to your petitioner for said storage at the rate of one dollar per day for each and every of said carloads, amounting to the aforesaid sum of $892." (2) "Your petitioner further shows that said Miller & Co. are further indebted to your petitioner in the sum of $892, besides interest, for that heretofore, to wit, before the 1st day of January, 1890, your petitioner, who is a common carrier of goods and merchandise, made and put in operation a reasonable rule or regulation for the conduct of its business, of which rule or regulation said Miller & Co. had notice, by virtue of which said Miller & Co. became liable to pay to your petitioner the sum of one dollar for every day commencing forty-eight hours after notice of arrival, on each and every carload of property stored by your petitioner on its tracks or elsewhere. Your petitioner shows that after said 1st day of January, 1890, and up to the time of filing this complaint, your petitioner has so stored a large number of carloads of property, a schedule of which is hereunto annexed; by means whereof said Miller & Co. have become indebted to your petitioner in the sum of $892, besides interest. Your petitioner shows that said Miller & Co. fail and refuse to pay said sum," etc. The rule or regulation here referred to is as follows: "Demurrage Rules. Concerning Loaded Cars to be Unloaded by Consignees. Bulk meats, bulk grain, hay, cotton seed, lumber, lime, coal, coke, sand, brick, stone, wood, and such other freights, in bulk or otherwise, as it may be a stipulation of the rates thereupon, or contract for the transportation thereof, or where it is the custom, for the cars to be loaded and unloaded by the owners of the property, which is not unloaded from the cars containing it in forty eight hours, not including Sundays or legal holidays, computed from ten o'clock A. M. of the day following the day of arrival, shall be subjected thereafter to a charge for demurrage of one dollar for each day or fraction of a day that said car or cars remain loaded in the possession of the company by whom to be delivered as the last carrier at interest; it being understood that said car or cars are to be placed and remain accessible to the consignee for the purpose of unloading during the period in which held free of demurrage, and that, when the period of such demurrage charges commences, they are to remain accessible to the consignee for unloading purposes."

The jury found in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and they excepted.

Without undertaking to discuss separately and in their order the numerous grounds of the motion, it is sufficient to say that, in addition to the general objection that the verdict is contrary to law and the evidence, they complain in substance as follows: (1) That as matter of law a railroad company is not entitled to charge "demurrage" or storage on cars remaining unloaded on its tracks, and hence the rule in question is invalid, and the defendants are not subject to the charges recovered; (2) that the charge fixed by this rule is unreasonable; (3) that the rule was not promulgated by the proper authority, but emanated from a combination of persons other than the board of directors of the Georgia Railroad; (4) that the regulation is inoperative, because not indicated upon the bills of lading; (5) that the cars were not accessible during the whole period for which demurrage was charged.

1. It is the undoubted right of a common carrier to adopt and enforce, as between itself and its customers, any reasonable regulation for the conduct of its business, the purpose and effect of which are the protection of the carrier and the benefit of the public. The rule in question, we think, falls clearly within the scope of this power. It seeks to prevent the diversion and detention of cars from the legitimate work of transportation, as well as to secure compensation for service not otherwise paid for, by prescribing, in case where by contract or custom the carrier is under no duty to unload the cars, but they are to be unloaded by the customer, a rate per diem in the nature of a charge for storage, to begin at a certain time after the cars have been delivered to the customer or placed at his disposal for unloading. Such regulation cannot be regarded as unreasonable so long as a reasonable time is allowed for unloading, and so long as the charge for the use of the cars beyond that time is not excessive. The law compels the carrier to receive the goods of the public, and to transport and deliver them within a reasonable time. Code 1892, § 2073; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, title, Carriers, p. 787. To do this it is necessary that the means of transportation shall be under the carrier's control, and that, after the duty of carriage has been performed, its vehicles shall not be converted into storehouses, at the will of consignees, to remain such indefinitely, and without compensation. If no check could be placed upon such detention, it is plain that the business of transportation would be at the mercy of private interest or caprice, and that carriers thus hampered in their facilities, and unable to foresee the time or extent to which their vehicles would be diverted from the work of carriage, could not provide properly for the demands of traffic, or perform with dispatch their legitimate function. It would place upon the carrier the burden and expense of supplying numerous vehicles not needed for the hauling of freights, thus requiring it to provide extra facilities, as well as to render extra service, without compensation beyond that received for transportation. It would result in the accumulation of cars on the carrier's tracks, and the obstruction in a greater or less degree of the movement and unloading of trains. Not only would loss ensue to the carrier, but consignees and shippers in general and the people at large must suffer seriously from this hindrance to the due and regular course of transportation. In this matter the public have rights paramount to those of any individual or class of individuals, and the business of the common carrier must be so conducted as to subserve the general interest and convenience. Especially is this true as to railroad companies, in view of the important franchises granted them by the public, and the use and control thus acquired of highways upon which the commerce of the country is so largely dependent.

The need of regulations of the kind in question is well illustrated by the evidence in this case. The general manager of the plaintiff testified that, before this rule was adopted, consignees were often dilatory in removing freight from the cars in which it was shipped, and "the cars were detained day after day, and days lengthened into weeks, until our transportation work was subjected to immeasurable embarrassment. The transportation of the company was well-nigh paralyzed,—not for lack of cars, for we had plenty, but because our cars were converted into warehouses. The trouble grew, and finally culminated in a threatened blockage throughout the country. It has been a part of our experience to be threatened with suit by the shipper for not moving the freight promptly. We are supposed to always have cars ready to transport any freight that is offered. We endeavor to make proper arrangements to do so; but the trouble was that, when A. had freight to ship, B. had our cars, and we could not get them."

It was contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the railroad company could unload the cars into a warehouse or elevator, and thus avoid detention. On the other hand, counsel for the railroad company contended that in the cases provided for by this rule—that is, where it is a stipulation of the rates or contract for transportation, or is the custom, for the cars to be loaded and unloaded by the owners of the property—it would be a breach of contract if the company were to unload, which would subject it to at least nominal damages. We do not think it material, as affecting the right to make a charge of this character, that the goods remain in cars instead of being put into a warehouse. It is well settled that the carrier, in addition to its compensation for the carriage of goods, has the right to charge for their storage and keeping, as a warehouseman, for whatever time they remain in its custody after reasonable opportunity has been afforded the owner to remove them. Hutchinson, Car. § 378; Southwestern R. Co. v. Felder, 46 Ga. 488. And we think, where the carrier's duty ends with the transportation of the car and its delivery to the customer, and no further service is embraced in the contract, the carrier, after a reasonable time has been allowed for unloading, is as much entitled to charge for the further use of its car as it would be for the use of its warehouse. We know of no good reason why it should be restricted to the latter method of storage. There is no law which inhibits the use of cars for this purpose, or which requires unloading and removal of the goods to some other structure before any charge for storage can attach. This method of storage may in many cases be as effectual as any other. Indeed, it may serve the customer's interest and convenience much better to have the car placed at his own place of business, where he may unload it himself, or where it may be unloaded by purchasers as the goods are sold, thus saving drayage and other expenses, than to have it unloaded by the carrier, and the goods stored elsewhere at the customer's expense. And a customer whose duty it is to unload, and who, failing to do so within a reasonable time, accepts the benefit of storage in a car, by requesting or permitting the carrier to continue holding it unloaded in his service, and subject to his will and convenience as to the time of unloading, cannot be heard to complain of the method of storage, and to deny the right to any compensation at all for this service, on the ground that some other method was not resorted to. He may insist that the rate fixed shall not be unreasonable or excessive, but the law cannot be invoked to declare that no compensation whatever shall be charged for such extra service.

It was contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that "demurrage"—which is the designation given to this charge by the rule in question—is allowed only in maritime law, and cannot be demanded by a railroad company in the absence of a stipulation therefor in the bill of lading; and in support of this view the cases of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Jenkins, 108 Ill. 588, and Burlington & M. R. Co. v. Chicago Lumber Co., 15 Neb. 891, are cited. In the former of these cases it is said: "The right to demurrage, if it exists as a legal right, is confined to the maritime law, and only exists as to carriers by seagoing vessels. But it is believed to exist alone by force of contract. All such contracts of affreightment contain an agreement for demurrage in case of delay beyond the period allowed by the agreement, or the custom of the port allowed the consignee to receive and remove the goods. But the mode of doing business by the two kinds of carriers is essentially different. Railroad companies have warehouses in which to store freights; owners of vessels have none. Railroads discharge cargoes carried by them; carriers by ship do not, but it is done by the consignee. The masters of vessels provide in the contract for demurrage, while railroads do not; and it is seen that these essential differences are, under the rules of the maritime law, wholly inapplicable to railroad carriers." The decision in the Nebraska case does not go into any discussion of the question, but merely cites and follows the holding of the Illinois court. In our opinion, the reasoning above quoted is inconclusive. We see no satisfactory reason why carriers by railroads should not be entitled to compensation for the unreasonable delay or detention of their vehicles as well as carriers by sea. What we have already said, we think, is a sufficient answer to the reason assigned, that railroads have warehouses in which to store freights. And the reason that "railroads discharge cargoes carried by them," and "carriers by ship do not, but it is done by the consignee," of course cannot operate as to the cases provided for by this rule, which by its terms applies only where the unloading is to be done by the owners of the property. Nor is it settled that the right to demurrage in maritime law exists only by express contract. In this country the courts have repeatedly declined to follow the rulings of the English common-law courts on this subject, and have held that the shipowner has a lien upon the cargo for demurrage, notwithstanding the absence of any stipulation therefor in the bill of lading. 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, title, Demurrage, p. 546; Port. Bills of Lading, § 356. See also Huntley v. Dows, 55 Barb. 810, and Haugood v. 1310 Tons of Coal, 21 Fed. Rep. 681, and cases there cited.

But we are not controlled by the principles which govern as to demurrage under the maritime law. The adoption by the railroad company of the term "demurrage" as a designation for this charge does not require us to resort to that law as a standard for testing the validity of the rule. We are to look to the real substance and effect of the rule, rather than to analogies suggested by the technical designation which the carrier in this instance has seen fit to adopt. To hold that, because the conditions of carriage by sea are different, no charge under this name can be enforced by a carrier by land, or that, if allowed, it must be governed by the rules of the marine law, would be to adopt a narrow and merely technical view, ignoring well-recognized grounds of public policy and the right of the carrier to prescribe reasonable rules and regulations for its own safety and the benefit of the public. The instances are few in which regulations similar to the one in question have been passed upon by the courts. The only cases we have found in which the right of a railroad company to make a charge of this kind is denied are the ones above referred to. On the other hand, the right is sustained by the supreme court of Massachusetts. Miller v. Mansfield, 112 Mass. 260. See also a full and able discussion of the question by Toney, J., of the law and equity court of Louisville, Ky., in a decision which has appeared since the judgment in the present case was announced. Kentucky Wagon Mfg. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Louisville, Ky. L. & Eq. Ct.) 11 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 49, note.

2. We cannot, as matter of law, say that the rate of one dollar per day for each car is unreasonable. It is not necessarily unreasonable because the cars vary in capacity, nor because a part of a day is charged for as a whole day. Nor can we hold that the customary rates for storage in warehouses and elevators must be the measure of compensation where the storage is in the cars on the tracks of a railroad. Indeed, if it be a legitimate object of this rule to prevent the diversion of cars from the work of carriage, it would seem but proper that the charge for their use when detained as a means of storage should not be such as to encourage customers to adopt that means, instead of the more regular and usual methods. Moreover, there was no evidence to show that the rate fixed by this rule was higher than those customary for storage of other kinds. On the contrary, there was evidence tending to show that storage in a car, at the rate fixed by the rule, might be much less expensive than storage elsewhere; the general manager of the railroad company testifying that the modern car carries from 50,000 to 80,000 pounds, and that storage in the company's depot of a carload of 50,000 pounds would amount to $1.25 per day. He testified further: "The rate of $1 per day does not compensate us for the detention of the cars, and it was simply to induce the shipper to unload that the rule was passed."

3. That the rule was promulgated by a person or board of persons representing a combination of carriers did not impair its effect as a regulation of this particular company. A common carrier, though a corporation, makes a regulation its own by adopting it and acting upon it, irrespective of the source from whence it is derived.

4. Where a regulation of this character is known to the customer before the contract for transportation is made, it is to be presumed, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the parties contracted with reference to it, (Miller v. Mansfield, supra;) and it is operative whether indicated upon bills of lading or not, and whether the shipments are made to the order of the consignor, with the customary direction to notify the customer, or directly to the customer himself.

5. The plaintiff's mode of delivery of the cars to the defendants was to place them on a certain track "designated as belonging to the Augusta & Summerville Railroad," and known as "Track 38," from which point they went "into the possession of the Central Railroad," upon whose side track, in another part of the city, the defendants' place of business was situated. Cars were not delivered on track 38 until the freight was paid and the bill of lading surrendered. Until then they were inaccessible for unloading, being kept elsewhere in the plaintiff's yard. After payment of the freight the defendants could at any time have their cars moved where they would be accessible, but sometimes it would take from one to five hours after the freight was paid before they could be placed at the point of delivery. It was contended that the time thus required for placing the cars in position should not be included in computing the time which should run against the defendants under the rule in question, the rule containing this language, to wit: "It being understood that said car or cars are to be placed and remain accessible to the consignee for the purpose of unloading during the period in which held free of demurrage, and that, when the period of such demurrage charges commences, they are to remain accessible to the consignee for unloading purposes." Certain instructions of the court on this subject, and the refusal to charge thereon as requested by the defendants, were the basis of several assignments of error, which will be found set out in the reporter's statement. Taking the whole charge, in connection with the evidence, we think the law applicable to this part of the case was fairly presented. The court, having instructed the jury in substance that, if the defendants had notice of this rule or regulation, and the goods were shipped under a contract that they were to be unloaded by the consignees, and the plaintiff notified the consignees of the arrival of the cars and of its readiness to deliver the goods, and the consignees did not receive and unload them within the time stipulated by the rule, the defendants would be liable for the charge fixed by the rule for the detention of cars, added the following: "The railroad will have complied with that rule and regulation if you find from the testimony that it placed these cars at a point where they were accessible to the consignees, and allowed them to remain there during the time fixed by the railroad when they would be free from demurrage, or where it gave notice that it was ready to place them in such position. The mere giving notice, if there was evidence that it was not ready to place them in that position, would not avail; but if you find that the cars were in a position where they could be placed in an accessible place, and the road offered to place them, by sending notice that it was ready, then that would be a substantial compliance with the rule and regulation. But if the consignees elected to delay and not receive them, they would be liable for the charges under the rule." Also: "If you are satisfied from the testimony that the cars, up to the time of actual delivery or taking possession, were inaccessible, that the railroad could not comply with its offer, and that the delay was not the fault of the defendants, then no demurrage under this rule could be enforced, and your verdict would be for the defendants." We think the instructions complained of as to substantial compliance with the rule, read in connection with the instructions above quoted, give a reasonable and proper interpretation of that part of the rule which relates to delivery at a point accessible to the consignee. In construing its phraseology, the course and exigencies of business are necessarily to be regarded; and hence the cars, after their arrival at destination, though not kept accessible at every moment of time, are to be treated as being and remaining accessible if the carrier is always ready to render them so within the shortest practicable time—not longer than a few hours—after being notified that the customer is ready to unload. There is no evidence in the record that the cars were not at all times accessible, in this sense, or that there was any undue or unnecessary delay in placing them in position for unloading, after notice from the defendants that they were ready to receive them.

6. The evidence is sufficient to uphold the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Re FINAL ACCOUNTING OF EXECUTORS OF Balthazar ALBRECHT, Deceased.

(.....N. Y.)

1. Tenancy by the entirety does not exist in a bond and mortgage executed to husband and wife for moneys of which each individually contributed a part, but upon the death of either his or her share vests in his or her personal representatives.
2. Costs of a contest on the accounting of a husband's executors to determine whether or not a husband and wife were tenants by the entirety in a bond and mortgage for moneys of which each contributed part should be paid out of the estate where the question is new and the executors have acted in good faith.

(November 29, 1892.)

APPPEAL by objectors from a decree of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a decree of the Surrogate's Court for New York County refusing to surcharge the executors' account with the alleged interest of decedent in a certain bond and mortgage which had been given to decedent and his wife. Reversed.

NOTE.—The above decision does not seem to have any direct precedent other than that cited in the opinion.

For the general doctrine as to tenancies and entirety, see Baker v. Stewart, 3 L. R. A. 434, and note, 40 Kan. 442; Mittel v. Karl, 3 L. R. A. 655, 133 Ill. 65; Steiz v. Schreck, 13 L. R. A. 825, and note, 123 N. Y. 253, 26 Am. St. Rep. 475.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Henry F. Lippold for Annie Linder-mann et al., appellants.

Mr. James P. Niemann, for Katharine Albrecht, appellant.

The case at bar is to be determined upon the intent of the parties, as gathered from the bond and mortgage—made payable to them, "their executors, administrators, and assigns," as well as from the evidence and the surrounding circumstances,—and an inference of such intent may reasonably be drawn from a variety of circumstances, however slight.

Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum v. Strain, 2 Bradf. 34, and cases cited; Orr v. McGregor, 43 Hun, 523.

The execution of the bond and mortgage to them in their names jointly was not any evidence of a gift by either to the other of his or her contributive share therein.

The same were executed to them as separate individuals in their own right, and not eo nomine to them as husband and wife.

1 Preston, Estates, 132; 1 Preston, Abstracts, 41.

And were made payable to them, "their executors, administrators, or assigns," which was inconsistent with a right of survivorship.

For agreements concerning or transfers of such estates, see Speier v. Opfer, 2 L. R. A. 345, 73 Mich. 25; Donahue v. Hubbard, 14 L. R. A. 123, 154 Mass. 537, 26 Am. St. Rep. 271.

For effect of divorce on such estate, see Steis v. Schreck, supra.

Neither the rule, nor the reason of the rule, applicable to real estate—i. e., the common-law fiction of unity of husband and wife—applies to a case of personal property, held by husband and wife. In such cases the survivor takes the whole not by right of survivorship but by virtue of the original grant or estate under or by which they held.

Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 156, and cases cited.

From all the cases cited by the learned referee it is apparent that the question of intention to be derived from the acts of the parties, or other indicia of intention, entered materially, if not wholly, into the reasoning of the various courts in reaching the conclusion they did, viz.: that it is presumed to have been a gift and advancement to her by the acts of her husband, and that the direct question of the right of survivorship, as between husband and wife, holding personal property in their joint names, and to which each had contributed, was not squarely determined.

See Bryant v. Bryant, 43 N. Y. 17; Geary v. Page, 9 Bosw. 290; Jacques v. Short, 20 Barb. 269; Dillenbeck v. Dygert, 97 N. Y. 303, 812, 49 Am. Rep. 525; Yerkes v. Salomon, 11 Hun, 471; Syracuse Sav. Bank v. Hess, 23 N. Y. Week. Dig. 280; Mulcahey v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank, 89 N. Y. 438.

The tendency of the courts should be towards that inference—if reasonably to be drawn—which favors, as between man and wife, a separate and individual ownership of their property.

See Power v. Lester, 23 N. Y. 527; Jooss v. Fey, 129 N. Y. 17.

It cannot be fairly presumed that the old common-law fiction of unity of husband and wife, applied to real estate, applies with equal force to personal property—like a bond and mortgage—which latter is but a mere security for the former, and an incumbrance on land, for the reason that since the Married Woman's Acts, a husband may make a gift, or a transfer of such property, directly to the wife.

Maynard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the final accounting of the executors in this case the legatees in the will objected to the account upon the ground that it did not include the interest of the decedent in a bond and mortgage executed to him and his wife in 1878 for the payment of the sum of $6,000, money loaned, which was outstanding at the time of his death in 1886, and also at the time of the death of the wife, which occurred some two months later.

It was claimed by the executors that upon the death of the husband the title to the bond and mortgage and to the moneys secured by it vested wholly in the wife by virtue of her survivorship, and upon her death belonged to her estate to be distributed to her next of kin, and that no part thereof passed under the will of the husband to the legatees named therein. The surrogate sustained this claim and overruled the objections of the legatees, and his decision has been affirmed by the supreme court. It appeared from the evidence, and was found by the referee, that the husband and wife each invested the sum of $3,000 in the bond and mortgage, and the money which was loaned to the mortgagor was drawn from the savings banks, where each had deposits to his or her individual credit. Under these circumstances we think it was a joint investment by the husband and wife, and that each had an interest in the security taken therefor to the extent of the amount contributed by him or her, and that upon the death of either such interest vested in the personal representatives of the deceased party.

There is no room here for the application of the doctrine which prevails where husband and wife take an estate in property as tenants by the entirety. That relation can only exist where there is a conveyance of a vested interest in or title to real property. Since the adoption of the Revised Statutes it has been the law of this state that a mortgagee acquires no title to the mortgaged property; that the mortgage is simply a chose in action, held as collateral security for the payment of a debt, and until foreclosure the mortgagor has the entire fee subject to the lien of the mortgage. Here the bond is the principal obligation, and the rights of the joint creditors as between themselves upon the collection of the debt are not affected by the existence of the mortgage as collateral security for its payment. It might be observed that if this was a case governed by the same principles which determine the rights of husband and wife where real property is conveyed to them during coverture, it would not necessarily follow that they would become tenants by the entirety. If nothing was shown to evince a contrary intent such would undoubtedly be held to be the relationship of the parties, as was decided in Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152. But this court has held in the recent case of Miner v. Brown, 133 N. Y. 308, that such tenancy is not created where it appears from the character of the transaction that it was the intention of the parties that the grantees should take as joint tenants or as tenants in common. To the same effect is Jooss v. Fey, 129 N. Y. 17. What would be the legal rights of the parties where upon a purchase of real property the husband and wife each has contributed from their separate estates equally or in any other ascertained proportion, to the payment of the consideration, does not as yet seem to have been the subject of judicial decision. It is not necessary, however, to further pursue this mode of reasoning, for it has no value, except as it may be instructive by way of analogy. The rights of husband and wife in the personal property of each other, or in that which may be transferred to them jointly, rests upon different grounds than those which support a tenancy by the entirety. We cannot affirm the decree of the surrogate without, in effect, ruling that if the wife had pre-deceased the husband he would have taken her share of the investment by virtue of his survivorship. But under the Married Woman's Acts, she is to be regarded as if she were sole with respect to her property rights, and she may unite with her husband in the purchase of personal property with her separate funds, and the interest which each will acquire in the subject of the purchase will not be affected by the marital relation. The law now regards them as standing upon the same plane of equality as if they were strangers to each other.

We are aware that there are many authorities holding that where the husband purchases a security or makes a deposit, or subscribes for stock in the joint name of himself and wife, and pays therefor with his own funds, upon his death the entire security belongs to the wife if she survives him. But the decision in all these cases is put upon the ground that it is apparent from the character of the transaction that the husband intended to give the property to his wife in the event of her survivorship, and hence the transfer possesses all the essential qualities of a gift causa mortis which he may revoke in his lifetime, and which does not take effect until his death if not previously recalled.

While he lives, his control over it is unlimited, and at his death it becomes her absolute property, if she survives him, but if she does not, the gift is not consummated and the husband retains the entire title. This was the rule laid down by Lord Eldon, in Wilde v. Wilde, (cited in 1 Roper, Husb. & W. Jacob's ed. p. 54), where it was held that if the husband purchased stock in the joint names of himself and wife it was prima facie a gift to her, in case of her surviving, unless evidence was produced of contemporaneous acts showing a contrary intention. But if the husband and wife each contribute to a joint investment or to the purchase of a security, and the title is taken in their joint names to be held by them, their executors, grantors, administrators or assignees, as was the bond and mortgage in the present case, no presumption can properly arise from the nature of the act that either intended to make a gift of his or her share to the survivor. The just inference is that each regarded it as a loan of individual property upon the strength of the security taken, and they became tenants in common of the bond and mortgage, with all the rights and incidents of such relationship.

We are unable to find any reported case in this state where the question has been presented in this form, but the Supreme Court of Michigan held in 1877, in the case of Watt v. Bovee, 35 Mich. 425, that where husband and wife, being each possessed of means, had made investments, jointly, each supplying half, and had taken the securities in their joint names, the wife, on the decease of the husband during her lifetime, did not take the whole by the right of survivorship; and that the rule which prevails as to the right of survivorship in the case of united holdings of real estate by husband and wife is not applicable to personality. This view is supported by the principles of justice which should prevail in the determination of the rights of parties, and is in accord with the spirit of modern legislation which has striven to place the parties to the marriage contract upon the same footing with respect to the acquisition and control of their individual properties as if the conjugal relation did not exist.

The decree should be reversed and the executors required to account for the interest of the testator in the bond and mortgage; but as the question is new, and it is apparent that the executors have acted in good faith, the costs of both parties should be paid out of the estate.

All concur.

CHURCH OF ST. MICHAEL, Appd.

(.....N. Y.)

1. The power of a court in equity to compel a vendor to execute another deed where one has been lost so as to clothe the purchaser with the record title has its sanction in the general jurisdiction of a court of equity.
2. The living owners of an estate in whom is vested the whole estate subject only to the contingency that other persons may be born who will have an interest therein represent the whole estate for all purposes of any litigation in reference thereto and affecting the jurisdiction of the courts to deal with the same, and stand not only for themselves but also for the persons unborn.
3. A judgment requiring the execution of a deed to the real owner of land by persons having the record title to the whole estate subject only to the contingency that other persons may be born who will have an interest in such record title is effectual to cut off the rights of such persons subsequently born.

NOTE.—So little can be found in the decisions of the courts as to the power of a court to cut off the interest of persons not in esse that the above decision with its clear statement of law on the subject is one of interest and value to which little if anything could be added.

4. A vendee who after discovering a defect in the title makes an oral agreement by which he remains in possession until the record title can be perfected in his vendor and never offers to surrender the premises thereby waives a provision requiring the execution of a deed within a specified time.

(November 29, 1892.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for Dutchess County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to enforce specific performance of a contract to purchase real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John J. Delany, for appellant:

The court will not decree specific performance of a contract for the purchase of realty where the title of the vendor is doubtful.

Adams v. Valentine, 88 Fed. Rep. 1; Cooper v. Denne, 4 Bro. Ch. 80; Fleming v. Burnham, 100 N. Y. 1; Moore v. Williams, 115 N. Y. 586; Aldrich v. Bailey, 28 N. Y. S. R. 571; Irvine v. Campbell, 8 L. R. A. 620, 121 N. Y. 358; Vought v. Williams, 8 L. R. A. 591, 120 N. Y. 253; Abbott v. James, 111 N. Y. 673; Sloper v. Fish, 2 Ves. & B. 145; Rogers v. Waterhouse, 4 Drew. 329, 6 Week. Rep. 828.

The title offered by the plaintiffs is doubtful.

The unborn remaindermen named in the will of Helen L. R. Stewart are not concluded by the judgment establishing the alleged lost deed made by said Helen L. R. Stewart to the plaintiffs' intestate.

A purchaser cannot be compelled to take title founded on matter of fact not admitting of satisfactory proof or which cannot be well proved.

Shriver v. Shriver, 86 N. Y. 585; Smith v. Death, 5 Madd. 871; Lowes v. Lush, 14 Ves. Jr. 548; Argall v. Raynor, 20 Hun, 267; Fleming v. Burnham, supra.

It cannot be contended that any afterborn grandchildren could be concluded on the ground of privity by an action in which their parents were made parties.

The judgment cannot bind the contingent interests of unborn children.

Monarque v. Monarque, 80 N. Y. 826, and cases cited; Kilpatrick v. Barron, 125 N. Y. 753; Hotaling v. Marsh, 132 N. Y. 29; Harris v. Strod, 182 N. Y. 392; Lockman v. Reilly, 95 N. Y. 64; Moore v. Appleby, 86 Hun, 368, affirmed 108 N. Y. 287.

The living infant remaindermen who were made parties are not forever barred from questioning the title rendered.

Under the principle in the case of Fleming v. Burnham, 100 N. Y. 1, the title here tendered does not meet the obligation assumed by a vendor under an ordinary contract of sale to tender a marketable title and one free from reasonable doubt.

Kilpatrick v. Barron, supra.

The failure of the plaintiffs to tender a clear and marketable title within the six months specified constituted such a breach of the 18 L. R. A.

agreement of sale as justified its rescission by the defendant, and this court will not now decree specific performance.

Tilley v. Thomas, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 61; Dominick v. Michael, 4 Sandf. 374; Smith v. Wells, 7 Paige, 22, 4 L. ed. 48; Baumann v. Pinckney, 118 N. Y. 604, and cases cited; *Nokes v. The plaintiffs elected to consider the contract of June 2, 1890, as broken by defendant's refusal to take the title tendered on November 25, 1890, and they cannot now assert a right to reconsider that election for their own benefit.

Selleck v. Tallman, 87 N. Y. 106.

The fact that defendant remained in possession of the premises after the six months does not affect the contract nor the rights of the parties thereto.

Messrs. Tillotson & Kent, for respondents:

The undisputed fact that defendant remained and still is in possession of the premises in question under the contracts alleged in the complaint would of itself constitute a waiver of any default of the plaintiffs in nonperformance of the contract within the time specified therein.

Tompkins v. Hyatt, 28 N. Y. 347; Stenson v. Maxwell, 2 N. Y. 415; Gale v. Nixon, 6 Cow. 445; Schiffer v. Diets, 88 N. Y. 808. See also Arnold v. Green, 116 N. Y. 572.

In an action brought to obtain a conveyance of any part of the trust property sold by Mrs. Stewart prior to her decease, the trustee and life tenants under that clause of her will represent the entire estate in such property, and are the only necessary parties defendant to such an action.

The grandchildren of Mrs. Stewart have simply a remainder contingent upon their surviving their respective parents, and also contingent on the birth of other children subsequent to the death of testatrix, who would share with them, and coupled with a power to enforce the trust in equity.

Taggart v. Murray, 53 N. Y. 233; Dodge v. Stevens, 105 N. Y. 590.

That contingent remaindermen were ever necessary parties was questioned in Mead v. Mitchell, 17 N. Y. 310, 72 Am. Dec. 455.

But the question has been definitely settled in this court in two recent decisions.

United States Trust Co. v. Roche, 116 N. Y. 120; Townsend v. Frommer, 125 N. Y. 446.

N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 2845, subd. 2, provides that an action may be maintained against an infant directing a conveyance of real property.

In Brerort v. Grace, 58 N. Y. 252, the court says: "Doubts were expressed in some of the cases whether this power extended to those not in being, who might thereafter be entitled to some estate in the premises. The reasons upon which the rule is based, as to the former [children in being], apply with equal force as to the latter. In both there is a want of capacity to manage and preserve the property, so as to protect the interest of those who are or may become entitled thereto, and hence the necessity of devolving this duty upon the sovereign."

Mead v. Mitchell, 17 N. Y. 210, 73 Am. Dec. 455; Brown v. Snell, 57 N. Y. 299.

In Bowman v. Tallman, 27 How. Pr. 272, the court says: "Infants unborn are not seised, hence courts cannot sell their interests, because such interests do not exist. They can sell only interests existing."

If a life estate be devised to one with remainder to his children if there be a child in being at the death of the testator the whole remainder in fee simple vests in such child liable to be partially divested by the coming in esse of other children.

Baker v. Lorillard, 4 N. Y. 266; Hayes, p. 29. See also Hannan v. Osborn, 4 Paige, 336, 3 L. ed. 460.

In such a case the child in being or coming into being and taking a vested remainder in fee subject to open and let in the afterborn children might be regarded in some sense as holding the legal estate not only for its own benefit, but as trustee of afterborn children.

Moore v. Little, 41 N. Y. 66; Jenkins v. Falcy, 73 N. Y. 355; Dodge v. Stevens, 105 N. Y. 385. See also Livingston v. Greene, 52 N. Y. 116; Smith v. Scholts, 68 N. Y. 42; Sheridan v. House, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 218; Brevcoort v. Brevcoort, 70 N. Y. 140.

Earl, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs are executors under the will of James Kent, deceased. The testator devised all his property to his executors, as trustees, in trust to pay the net income thereof to his wife during her life, and he authorized and empowered them to sell any of his real estate. It is not questioned that a valid trust was thus created; that the legal title to the real estate devised was vested in the trustees; and that they had a valid power of sale. In April, 1890, in the exercise of the power of sale, they entered into a written contract with the defendant by which they agreed to convey to it certain real estate, of which they claimed their testator was seised at the time of his death, and they agreed to execute to it an executor's deed on the 2d day of June thereafter, "containing the usual covenants, and assuring to them the fee simple of the said premises free from all incumbrances." At the time and place named in the contract it was ascertained that the testator had no record title to one half of the land contracted to be sold, and no deed to him for that half could be found. The defendant, therefore, refused to take a deed of that half of the land, but took a deed of the other half and paid therefor; and then another written contract was made between the parties by which the plaintiffs, for the consideration named, should, within six months thereafter, convey to the defendant an indefeasible title to the one half of the land mentioned. The plaintiffs' testator had in fact purchased that half of Helen L. R. Stewart, and paid for it, and taken a deed thereof, which had not been recorded, and was lost. She had died leaving a will in which she devised to trustees all her real estate, to be by them divided into three equal parts, directing them to pay the income of one part to each of her three children during the lives of her children respectively, and after the death of any child to pay over and "divide the said share to and among his or her children then surviving, and the lawful issue of any such child or children who may have died leaving issue, in equal proportions, per stirpes." After the making of the second contract, the plaintiffs commenced an action in which they made defendants the trustees under the will of Mrs. Stewart, her three children and only heirs, and also her grandchildren who were infants, alleging in their complaint that in October, 1877, Mrs. Stewart conveyed the land in question to James Kent by deed properly acknowledged; that at that time Kent paid to her substantially all the purchase price, and went into the possession of the land, and remained in possession until November, 1896, when he died seised and possessed of the land in fee simple absolute. They then alleged the will of James Kent; the death of Mrs. Stewart, and her will; the contract of sale with the defendant, and the loss of the deed from Mrs. Stewart unrecorded, and the fact that it could not be found after diligent search; their belief that it had been lost; that they and their testator had been in possession of the land for twelve years, claiming the same absolutely in fee, and that owing to the loss of the deed there is a cloud on the title to the land, and that thus the defendants have on the record an unjust claim to the same; and they prayed judgment that the defendants in that action execute and deliver to them a good and sufficient deed, so as to vest and confirm the title to the land absolutely in them as the representatives of the estate of Kent, and for such other and further relief as the court should deem proper. The defendants were all adults but the grandchildren, and for them a special guardian was appointed. The adults answered the complaint, admitting the allegations thereof, and the infants, by their guardian, answered the complaint by putting in issue the allegations thereof. The action was brought to trial, and the facts alleged in the complaint were established and found, and judgment was given to the plaintiffs, pursuant to the prayer of the complaint. In compliance with the judgment, the adult defendants in their own names, and the infant defendants by their special guardian, executed a deed of the land to these plaintiffs, and all the devisees and heirs-at-law of James Kent, deceased. The parties of the second part in that deed then united in executing a deed of the land to the defendant, and it refused to accept the same when tendered to it by the plaintiffs, on the ground that the title tendered was still defective.

Under the will of Mrs. Stewart, her grandchildren took vested remainders in the shares of their parents, liable, however, to open and let in after-born grandchildren. Thus the trustees, children, and living grandchildren represented the entire estate of Mrs. Stewart, subject, however, to the contingency that there might be after-born grandchildren; and it was upon this contingency that the defendant based its objection to the title tendered to it, the claim being that after-born grandchildren would not be concluded by the judgment which had been rendered, and that their rights would not be affected by the deed given in pursuance of that judgment. The sole question for our determination is whether that claim is well founded. There is no doubt that if the defendants, in the action brought by these plaintiffs against Mrs. Stewart's executors, children, and grandchildren, represented the whole title to her real estate, then the action was proper, and the conveyance given in pursuance of the judgment would carry a good title to the defendant. The deed from Mrs. Stewart by some accident had been lost after James Kent had paid for the land, and had been in possession of the same for many years claiming title thereto, and, on account of the loss, his executors could not make a good record title to the land in pursuance of their contract with the defendant. Under such circumstances, there can be no question that a court of equity had power and jurisdiction to relieve the persons who represented the grantee, and who in fact had title to this land, from the dilemma in which they were placed by the loss of the deed, by compelling Mrs. Stewart, if living, and after her death those who represent her title, to execute another deed. A purchaser under a valid contract of purchase, who has performed the contract on his part, and is entitled to a deed from his vendor, can compel specific performance of his contract by the delivery of the deed to him in pursuance thereof; and that can be done in the exercise of the jurisdiction of a court of equity to compel the specific performance of contracts, but where the contract has been performed, and the deed given, which the purchaser by some accident or misfortune has lost, so that he has no record title to the land which was conveyed to him, it is well-settled that a court of equity will compel the vendor to execute another deed so as to clothe the purchaser with the record title; and an action for that purpose is not dependent upon any provisions of the Code contained in sections 1638, 1650, and 2845, to which our attention has been called. It has its sanction in the general jurisdiction of a court of equity. Under such circumstances, it would be inequitable for the vendor to retain the record title, and to refuse to execute a new deed, and the purchaser can be relieved only by the execution of a new deed. Sugd. Vend. chap. 2, § 4, subd. 15; Adams, Eq. 166, 337; Willard, Equity Jurisp. 52, 301; Cummings v. Coe, 10 Cal. 529. Therefore the judgment against the trustees and heirs of Mrs. Stewart was in a proper action, and proper in form, and the question is whether it will bind the after-born grandchildren, if any, of Mrs. Stewart. We think it will.

The trustees, children, and grandchildren of Mrs. Stewart could not cut off or affect the title in the land of unborn grandchildren by any conveyance in pais. Rev. Stat. pt. 2, chap. 1, title 2, art. 1. By such a conveyance they could convey no greater title than they had. The effect of such a conveyance was under consideration in Kilpatrick v. Barron, 125 N. Y. 751, and Harris v. Strodt, 132 N. Y. 392. If the title to this land had actually been devolved under the will of Mrs. Stewart, and an action was brought to partition it, or to foreclose a mortgage upon it, or in some other way to change or extinguish the title, it would be the duty of the court to protect the rights of unborn grandchildren by setting apart land or the proceeds of the land to represent in some form their interests. Cheesman v. Thorne, 1 Edw. Ch. 629, 6 L. ed. 271; Mead v. Mitchell, 17 N. Y. 210, 73 Am. Dec. 455; Brevort v. Grace, 53 N. Y. 245; Monarque v. Monarque, 80 N. Y. 820. Where an estate is vested in persons living subject only to the contingency that persons may be born who will have an interest therein, the living owners of the estate for all purposes of any litigation in reference thereto, and affecting the jurisdiction of the courts to deal with the same, represent the whole estate, and stand, not only for themselves, but also for the persons unborn. This is a rule of convenience, and almost of necessity. The rights of persons unborn are sufficiently cared for if, when the estate shall be sold under a regular and valid judgment, its proceeds take its place and are secured in some way for such persons. Calvert, Parties to Suits in Eq. 48; Mitt. Pl. 178; 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 707; 1 Smith, Ch. Pr. 92; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 144, 148; Wills v. Slade, 6 Ves. Jr. 498; Gaskell v. Gaskell, 6 Sim. 648; Nodine v. Greenfield, 7 Paige, 544, 4 L. ed. 267.

But here this land did not pass under the will of Mrs. Stewart. All that these plaintiffs asked in their suit against the trustees, children, and grandchildren of Mrs. Stewart was a judgment confirming the title to the land which she had conveyed to Mr. Kent. The living parties defendant in that action were all opposed in interest to the plaintiffs, and the grandchildren belonged to and represented the class to which the unborn persons would belong. In such a case it is safe to permit the living to represent the unborn, and the unborn must be bound by the judgment confirming the title. There is no occasion for the court to make provision in the judgment for the persons not in esse, as [they, by the adjudication of the court, never could have any interest in the land. The general rule that no person shall be bound by an adjudication in an action to which he is in no way a party has some exceptions, and does not inexorably apply to a case where at the time of the adjudication persons are not in esse who may be affected thereby. In Monarque v. Monarque, supra, the parties had a vested title to the land sought to be partitioned, subject, however, to open and let in after-born children. But no notice was taken of such after-born children in the judgment, and no provision whatever was made for them, and hence it was decided that a good title could not be given to a purchaser under the sale made in pursuance of the judgment. It was held, in harmony with what I have herein stated, that a judgment and sale in partition only concludes contingent interests of persons not in being when the judgment provides for and protects such interests by substituting the fund derived from the sale of the land in place of it, and preserving the fund to the extent necessary to satisfy such interests. In that case there had been an action for the construction of the will by which the land was devolved, and to that action all the persons living who were interested were made parties, and it was there decided that the provisions of the will giving interests to persons unborn were involved, and it was held in this court that that adjudication could not conclude or affect the persons not in esse, for the reason that the action was not a proper one for the construction of the will; that the court took jurisdiction of the action only by consent; and that, therefore, its adjudication bound only those who consented, and could not bind persons not in being. That case did not determine that, in a proper action for the construction of a will, persons not in esse could in no case be concluded by the judgment rendered therein. That they could be concluded I have no doubt, if the parties to the action properly brought were vested with the whole title, subject merely to the contingency that it might open and let in persons thereafter to be born. The adjudication in such a case, as well as that in the case brought by these plaintiffs against the trustees, children, and grandchildren of Mrs. Stewart, is in the nature of an adjudication in rem, and binds everybody. Therefore the title tendered to the defendant was good, and so free from any reasonable doubt that it should be compelled to perform its contract and take the title.

It is also objected, on behalf of the defendant, that the plaintiffs were not ready and able to give a proper deed to it at the time stipulated in the second contract, to wit, within six months from the date of that contract. After the making of that contract, as the learned court found, the parties made a verbal agreement by which the defendant was to take possession of the land, and use, occupy, and enjoy the same until such time as the record title of the plaintiffs could be perfected, paying as rent therefor interest at the rate of 5 per cent on the purchase price. Under that agreement the defendant took possession of the land, and has continued in possession thereof, never having offered to surrender the same. These facts, found by the trial court, have support in the evidence, and we must take them as established and true, and they constitute in law a waiver of performance of the contract on plaintiffs' part at the time stipulated. The defendant could not retain possession of the land under the agreement, and at the same time repudiate the agreement, and refuse to take a deed tendered in pursuance thereof.

Our conclusion is that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Andrews, J., absent.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Timothy MAHONEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

DETROIT STREET R. CO.

(.....Mich.....)

A passenger who fails to ask or obtain any written transfer or other evidence of his right to ride in a street-car which he enters after leaving one in which he has paid fare may be lawfully ejected if he refuses to pay fare therein and the conductor is not obliged to take the passenger's statement as evidence of his right to ride.

(December 2, 1892.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment allowing plaintiff only nominal damages in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged wrongful ejection of plaintiff from defendant's cars. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James H. Pound, for plaintiff in error:

Upon plaintiff resting his case, the defendant by its counsel moved for a directed verdict in his favor, on the ground that the conductor of the first car of the defendant had no power to allow plaintiff to get off his car and pledge the defendant to carry plaintiff further.

Hufford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 6 Mich. 681, is an authority on the contrary holding that the record in this case presents a question for a jury to be determined inquest of damages.

See also Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co., N. Y. 25.

Mr. John C. Donnelly, with Mr. Sidney T. Miller, for defendant in error:

Conceding for the purposes of the argument that a technical trespass and right of action existed, the circuit judge in his charge to the jury was clearly right.

Chandler v. Allison, 10 Mich. 480; Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542.

A passenger who has no ticket or other token showing him to be entitled to a ride may be ejected by a carrier, and cannot recover damages for the ejection.

Peabody v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 21 Or. 121; MacKay v. Ohio River R. Co. 9 L. R. A. 182, 84 W. Va. 65; Hall v. Memphis & O. R. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 57; Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. 185 Mass. 408, 46 Am. Rep. 481; Pine v. St. Paul City R. Co. (Minn.) 16 L. R. A. 347.

This is so, although the passenger claims that he has given his ticket up or paid fare to another conductor, as "conductors of street-cars cannot be required to take the mere word of a passenger that he is entitled to be carried by reason of having paid his fare to the conductor or of another car."

The plaintiff frequently rode in street-cars in Detroit and knew their customs; knowing their customs and being asked by the conductor for an additional fare, it was his duty as a citizen of Detroit, and therefore interested in its good government, not to make trouble, but to pay the additional fare and ask the company for it afterward.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff entered one of defendant's cars on Michigan avenue, going west, intending to go to Thirty-Third street. He paid his fare, five cents, to the conductor. The car he took did not go to Thirty-Third street, but stopped at defendant's barns, near the railroad crossing. This was near the city limits, and it appears that only certain cars went the entire distance. Upon the stoppage of the car the driver unhitched his horses, and was driving them to the opposite end, when plaintiff, perceiving this, said to the conductor that he desired to go further. To this the conductor replied, "You can go back in this car, and take the next car up, or get off here, and take the next car up." Plaintiff decided to get off there. A car soon came from the barns, and started westward. Some employé of the road asked him if he was going on that car, meaning evidently to ask whether he intended to return to the city on the same car. The terminus of the road was but a short distance from the barns, and plaintiff's destination was only five blocks from where he alighted from the first car. Plaintiff replied, "No;" that he had come up on another car. He was then informed that he would have to pay. This he declined to do. Meanwhile the car had gone about two blocks. He was then told that he must pay or get off. One of plaintiff's employés then approached him, took him by the lapel of his coat, and thereupon he alighted from the car. No force was in fact used other than this, and plaintiff claims no injury except to his feelings. Plaintiff did not ask for a "change off" from the first conductor, nor did the conductor offer him one. Plaintiff brought an action of tort to recover for his alleged unlawful and forcible ejection from the car. The learned court sustained his right of recovery, and directed a verdict for nominal damages, holding that it was the plaintiff's duty to pay his fare, and save any injury to his feelings.

It is insisted by the plaintiff that he had a valid contract for carriage from the point where he took the car to Thirty-Third street, and that his ejection from the car was therefore unlawful and tortious. If it be granted that he had such a contract, still he had no evidence of it except his own statement, and the question is, What was his duty under the circumstances? If the conductor were under legal obligation to accept his statement that he had such a contract, then his removal was unlawful; otherwise it was not. Counsel has cited no authority, nor have I found one, which holds that a stranger may enter the car of either a railway or street-car company without any evidence that he has paid his fare, and secure passage, by his own statement to the conductor that he has previously paid it to some other authorized agent. It is the duty of the passenger to secure evidence of such payment, or to pay when his fare is demanded. The business of such companies cannot be carried on upon any other basis. This certainly is common sense and experience. Plaintiff's counsel cites the following authorities in support of his position: Hufford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 64 Mich. 631; Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 25; Carsten v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 44 Minn. 454, 9 L. R. A. 688; Pennsylvania Co. v. Bray, 125 Ind. 280; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Fize, 88 Ind. 384, 45 Am. Rep. 464; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. McDonough, 53 Ind. 259; Palmer v. Charlotte, O. & A. R. Co. 8 S. C. 580; Burnham v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 68 Me. 298, 18 Am. Rep. 230; Eddy v. Rider, 79 Tex. 57; Erie R. Co. v. Winter, 143 U. S. 60, 36 L. ed. 71. An examination of these cases shows that in all except Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co. the plaintiff had procured and showed to the conductors either tickets or stop-over checks, showing that they had paid their fare, and the disputes arose over the right to ride upon such checks or tickets. It is unnecessary to review these authorities. In Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co. the plaintiff was transferred from one car to another by the conductor, the first car, for some reason, not going through to the passenger's destination. It does not appear just how the transfer was made, but it is quite apparent that when the cars were near together the transfer of passengers was made, and the dispute was whether plaintiff was one of the passengers so transferred. In that case no evidence of transfer was required except the knowledge of the second conductor, whose duty it was to see and know who were so transferred. Under those circumstances, the passenger had the undoubted right to insist upon his passage without further payment. If plaintiff had purchased a "change off" or transfer, and lost it, or if he had purchased a ticket and lost it, or if either had been accidentally destroyed, it would be absurd to hold that he was entitled to a ride upon stating to the conductor that he had such transfer or ticket, but had lost it, or that it was accidentally destroyed. It is apparent that in the present case plaintiff possessed no other or different right from that which he would have possessed had he procured evidence of payment which had been lost or destroyed. In the one case his contract to ride would be complete, but the only written evidence he had would be lost; while in the other his contract might be equally good, but he had neither asked nor obtained any evidence thereof, to show to the conductor in charge of the other car or train, which must serve as a voucher in his settlement with the company. It is a novel doctrine that one may compel the agent of another to accept without question, and without opportunity to investigate, his verbal statement that he has a contract with his principal, and especially where frequent frauds upon the principal must inevitably result as the consequence of such a doctrine. It was the plaintiff's reasonable and clear duty to pay his fare, and seek redress from the defendant for a violation of his contract.

In the case of Frederick v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co., 37 Mich. 342, 26 Am. Rep. 531, Justice Marston said: "There is but one rule which can safely be tolerated with any decent regard to the rights of railroad companies and passengers generally. As between the conductor and passenger, and the right of the latter to travel, the ticket produced must be conclusive evidence, and he must produce it when called upon, as the evidence of his right to the seat he claims."

In Hufford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., supra, plaintiff paid his fare. The language of the court in that case, that "it was the duty of the conductor to accept the statement of the plaintiff until he found out that it was not true," must be held to apply to the circumstances of that case, where the plaintiff had a ticket. That statement would be most unreasonable in the case of one having no ticket. Several authorities in support of the rule above stated will be found cited in Frederick v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. The rule, and the reason therefor, are very ably stated in Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co., 135 Mass. 407, 46 Am. Rep. 481, and are also supported by the following cases: Yorton v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 54 Wis. 234, 41 Am. Rep. 28, and authorities there cited; Peabody v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 21 Or. 121; MacKay v. Ohio River R. Co. 34 W. Va. 65, 9 L. R. A. 132.

Inasmuch as the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant, it is unnecessary to discuss the question of damages.

Judgment affirmed.

defendants in an action brought upon a sheriff's bond to recover the amount which plaintiffs were alleged to have been damaged by reason of the failure of the sheriff to properly execute certain process. Reversed.

Joseph W. Chaddock and Hiram A. DeLano commenced a suit against John H. Eppink and William Kohlman, before a justice of the peace. They recovered a judgment a transcript of which was duly filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court. They thereupon issued an execution which was delivered to a deputy sheriff and returned unsatisfied. Plaintiffs then brought suit upon the sheriff's bond claiming that during the life of the execution defendant Eppink had property, both real and personal, in the county which could have been applied in satisfaction of the execution. The sheriff defended on the ground that the justice's judgment was void for the reasons stated in the opinion.

Mr. Philip Padgham, for plaintiffs in error:

Under S. Laws 1840, p. 53, where a writ of attachment was to be served "three days at least before the return day thereof," it was held that three full days were meant. But this was on the authority of Mich. Rev. Stat. 1838, part 1, title 1, chap. 1, § 8, subd. 2.

Douman v. O'Malley, 1 Dougl. 450.

Under Comp. Laws, § 4997, where a summons was required to be served "at least two days before the return day thereof" the return day was excluded.

Sallee v. Ireland, 9 Mich. 154.

Under the charter of the city of Grand Rapids (Laws 1871, vol. 2, p. 883, title 6, § 5,) which provided that notice to open a street was to be served and return to be made "at least six days before the day appointed in said resolutions for the hearing of said petition," it was held there must be six "clear days."

Re Powers, 29 Mich. 504.

Under Laws 1875, p. 92, § 1253, notice of meeting to determine on the necessity of a highway was to be served "at least ten days before the time of said meeting." Held, that required ten full days.

People v. Clay Twp. Highway Comrs. 88 Mich. 247; Coquard v. Boehmer, 81 Mich. 445; Cox v. Hartford Highway Comrs. 83 Mich. 193.

Under Mich. Act 140 of Laws of 1875, a drain commissioner was to serve notice of examination of application "at least five days before the day appointed as aforesaid." Held, five clear days were required.

Lane v. Burnap Drain Comrs. 89 Mich. 786; Taylor v. Burnap Drain Comrs. Id. 789.

Where notice of condemnation proceedings were required to be published, the first publication to be "at least thirty days before the time fixed for the application," it was held that last day was excluded, as the settled rule in condemnation proceedings.
